Finally, in a best-case scenario, the EU will implement an assimilation program guided by the lessons learned from our failed attempts at multiculturalism. It will acknowledge that the basic tenets of Islam are a major obstacle to integration. In practice, Muslims will continue to enjoy religious freedom, as long as exercising that precious right does not infringe upon the freedoms of others, including daughters and wives.

In a best-case scenario, EU policymakers will invest in girls and women, protect them from violence and punish those who try to limit their freedoms. Those policymakers will reform the welfare state; regulations pertaining to the hiring and firing of employees will be made more flexible, making it easier for migrants to enter the labor market.

The combined vision of the ostrich and the owl is indeed possible in Europe, but it requires a great deal of willpower, leadership and, above all, the recognition that tolerating oppressive cultures and encouraging more mass migration from Islamic countries often hurts precisely the people we seek to help.

A misguided vision brought Europe to its current predicament; an idealistic vision convinced of the inherent superiority of enlightened values over the values of oppressive cultures, a vision steeped in individual rights, the rule of law and the equality of men and women can help guide Europe out of it.

Schroeder: Bush's Faith Raised Suspicion (AP)

By Melissa Eddy

AP, October 22, 2006

Ex-Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose second term was marked by vehement opposition to the war in Iraq, described in an advance copy of his memoirs how he was suspicious of President Bush's constant references to his Christian faith.

In an excerpt of his book, "Decisions: My Life in Politics" published in the German weekly Der Spiegel Saturday, Schroeder discusses the key political choices that marked his seven-year term in office, including the decision to call early elections and his split with Bush over the Iraq war.

"I am anything but anti-American," Schroeder told Spiegel in an interview to accompany the excerpt of the more than 500-page book that goes on sale Thursday.

In it Schroeder, who led the Social Democrats to power in 1998, recalls the tears in his eyes as he watched television footage of people jumping from the burning World Trade Center on Sept. 11.

He knew Germany would have to react.

DOJ_NMG_0084618

"It was important to me that Germany fulfill its requirements as an ally" of the U.S., he wrote. "It was also fully clear to me that this could also mean the German army's participation in an American military mission."

Several months later, during Bush's 2002 visit to Berlin, Schroeder wrote he was surprised at what he described as Bush's "exceptionally mild" speech to the German parliament.

While meetings with Bush at that time were friendly, Schroeder said he could not reconcile himself with the feeling that religion was the driving force behind many of Bush's political decisions.

"What bothered me, and in a certain way made me suspicious despite the relaxed atmosphere, was again and again in our discussions how much this president described himself as 'God-fearing,'" Schroeder wrote, adding he is a firm believer in the separation of church and state.

Schroeder accused some elements in U.S. as being hypocritical when it comes to secularism in government.

"We rightly criticize that in most Islamic states, the role of religion for society and the character of the rule of law are not clearly separated," Schroeder wrote. "But we fail to recognize that in the USA, the Christian fundamentalists and their interpretation of the Bible have similar tendencies."

Panama Steams Ahead On Vote To Expand Canal (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The $5.2-billion project is expected to pass. Critics find their voices drowned out by the government campaign.

Voters are likely to approve a $5.2-billion project to expand the Panama Canal today, according to polls, despite warnings of an accumulation of debt, competition, technical miscalculations and possible environmental damage.

Only scattered opposition has developed to the proposal to expand the 92-year-old canal to allow transit of a new generation of larger container ships. If voters approve, construction will begin next year, with completion expected in 2014, in time for the 100th anniversary of the canal's opening.

Opponents, who include a former Panamanian president, a onetime canal administrator and a number of engineers and financiers, say the expansion amounts to fixing something that isn't broken, and that the nation is risking its most important asset on dubious engineering and financial assumptions. Revenue from the canal accounts for 8% of the national budget.

The contrarian views have been obscured by the well-oiled campaign by the government of President Martin Torrijos to sell the expansion as a competitive necessity. Polls indicate that support for expansion has grown and that the referendum could pass by a as much as a 2-1 margin.

Canal administrators and many shipping experts argue that the canal could become irrelevant unless it is modernized, because of the enormous increase in container cargo traffic bound to and from the U.S. East Coast since the emergence of China as a world trader.

The growth in volume has lengthened the waiting time for ships at either end of the canal. Alternative projects, including a waterway in neighboring Nicaragua, have been proposed to handle the extra traffic. An expansion of the Suez Canal is also being considered, as are several projects to hurry freight across North America from new Canadian and Mexican ports.

If the referendum passes, the canal expansion will involve digging a third shipping lane and construction of a parallel set of locks for ships 50% larger than those that currently travel the 51-mile canal.

The project would be entirely self-financed by doubling tolls over the next 20 years, said Francisco Miguez, master plan coordinator at the Panama Canal Authority, the quasi-independent body that has run the canal since the United States turned it over at the end of 1999. The authority would manage the expansion as well.

But skeptics say that cost overruns are inevitable and that they will be shouldered by taxpayers. Walter Molano, an analyst with BCP Securities in Connecticut, said Panama was already burdened with high debt and poverty and was underestimating the pressure from competition to keep prices down in coming years.

"This is an extensive project with limited payoff for all but a small group of people involved in the construction," said Molano, a specialist in Latin American bonds.

Carlos Guevara-Mann, a Panamanian who is a political science professor at the University of Nevada in Reno, said the project still lacked a thorough economic impact study or final construction plans.

"I was a credit manager at an international bank before I became a professor, and if someone sent me a proposal like this for a loan, I'd have turned it down," Guevara-Mann said. "The whole plan is sloppily done, poorly prepared."

Several experts doubt that the expansion can be done for $5.2 billion. A previous plan for expansion developed in the early 1990s envisioned the construction of new reservoirs west of the canal. The current plan, however, avoids those reservoirs, and the displacement of about 8,000 people, by recycling 60% of the water needed to fill the new locks. The plan also foresees raising the level of Gatun Lake, the main water source for the canal's locks, by a foot and a half.

Paul Labonte, a Tustin civil engineer who helped develop an alternative canal water recycling plan financed by the Inter-American Development Bank, said the final plan badly underestimated the amount of water the new locks would require.

The canal authority vigorously disputes the criticism, saying technical and financial assumptions were given three rounds of independent scrutiny and that the $5.2-billion cost estimate includes a margin for "everything going wrong," in Miguez's words.

The canal authority talked to all the operators who use the 114 shipping routes that pass through the canal and came away convinced that its competitive position was strong and would remain so, Miguez said.

Fare increases totaling 60% since Panama took over the canal operation have failed to dent market demand, he said.

In Cuba, 'On The Left' Means A Flourishing Black Market (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Guile and Caution Employed to Counter Chronic Shortages

HAVANA -- Most mornings a woman with darting brown eyes lingers here in the sticky hot corner of an open-air vegetable market.

She effects a casual stance, elbow propped nonchalantly against a cigar stand, waiting for the regulars. If she nods, her customers follow her to a side street.

A few quick, nervous glances and the woman reaches inside her blouse. From her bra, she removes her contraband -- neatly folded plastic grocery sacks, illegal except in state-run stores.

Five for one cent.

The transaction, like countless others each day in Havana and throughout this island nation, takes place " por la izquierda ," or "on the left." Cubans use the phrase to describe back-alley deals both large and small. They scheme on the left to cope with chronic shortages and to skirt myriad rules that prohibit most forms of private enterprise and govern the minutiae of their daily lives.

Cubans go to the left for almost anything: for staples, such as rice and beans; for quotidian items, such as the plastic grocery sacks; and for forbidden delights, such as lobster or scarce beef. On the left, Cubans risk fines or jail sentences to watch soap operas captured by illegal satellite dishes, to prowl restricted Internet sites and to boil "secret potatoes" bought after reaching limits on the ration cards that dictate the buying habits of everyone in the country. Mothers of children under the age of 7 -- the only Cubans allowed to buy discounted milk at state stores -- even sell their allotments at inflated prices to collect money for extra food.

The thriving underground economy functions as a pocket of capitalism, prescribed by supply and demand, within the Western Hemisphere's only communist state. Observers say it may be the precursor of a push for a market economy, one that could accelerate after President Fidel Castro dies; on the other hand, they say, the black market may simply be the byproduct of a system that rewards the wily and well-connected.

"They're very entrepreneurial," Wayne Smith, a former chief of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, said in an interview. "When I go down to Cuba, I've had the impression that everyone is waiting for something to happen. There's a sense that changes are going to come."

While the world wonders what a post-Castro Cuba might look like, the resiliency of the island's black-market culture demonstrates how far Cubans are willing to go to circumvent Castro's dictums. But it also exposes a certain elasticity in government control of the island.

Some of the deals made on the left, though illegal, are clearly tolerated. They sometimes take place in plain sight of uniformed police, or in view of the less obvious, but equally pervasive, network of neighborhood informers.

The sense of tolerance, however, can vanish abruptly. In August, shortly after Castro underwent stomach surgery and relinquished power during his recovery, government authorities swept through neighborhoods in a crackdown on illegal satellite dishes. The agents were presumably bent on blocking outside news broadcasts -- rife with rumors that Castro was dead or suffering from terminal cancer -- that might cast doubt on the rosier official accounts.

As word spread, Cubans scrambled to dismantle satellite dishes that had been open secrets, squirreling them under floorboards and in attics.

"There used to be dishes there, there, there," a man who lives in a Havana suburb said recently, pointing at his neighbor's homes.

"The funny thing is that they think we want to watch the news from Miami," said the man, a government port worker who, like dozens of others interviewed, spoke on condition of anonymity. "But all my wife wants to see are the soaps."

The Castro government says the restrictions that push so many Cubans to the left are, in some cases, necessitated by the U.S. trade embargo and, in others, a counteroffensive in the nearly half-decade propaganda war between the countries.

Satellite dishes are banned in order to block the U.S. government's TV Marti, which broadcasts programming critical of Castro, National Assembly President Ricardo AlarcÃ³n said in an interview. Internet use is restricted, he said, because the embargo prevents Cuba from tapping high-speed cables in international waters.

When the subject of food rationing comes up, AlarcÃ³n invariably points again to the U.S. embargo and to a declassified U.S. State Department memo written shortly before the trade embargo was enacted in the early 1960s. "The only foreseeable means of alienating internal support," the memo states, "is through disenchantment and disaffection based on economic dissatisfaction and hardship." The memo proposes "a line of action which makes the greatest inroads in denying money and supplies to Cuba, to decrease monetary and real wages, to bring about hunger, desperation and overthrow of government."

"It's equivalent to genocide," AlarcÃ³n said of the memo and of the subsequent embargo.

Even Cubans who are critical of the Castro government tend to have similarly heated reactions to the embargo. Their trips into the black market unspool as quiet acts of rebellion against both U.S. policy and the restrictions imposed by Castro.

Entire networks have developed to feed the black market system. There are suppliers, who skim materials from state-run enterprises. And there are middlemen, who buy the stolen goods and resell them.

DOJ_NMG_0084621

One recent afternoon in Cojimar, a town outside Havana famed as a hangout of Ernest Hemingway's, a middleman sat shirtless in his living room, flashing signals at passersby. He gave a thumbs-up to a man looking for chicken; he shook his head at a woman looking for milk.

"Here, everything is on the left," he said, sweeping his arm across his modest home and shouting to be heard over a Steven Seagal movie that he'd picked up from an illegal DVD vendor.

The house, once half its current size, had grown wider and longer because of several dozen bags of cement that he had collected one at a time from "some guys" over more than a year. His guys would stuff their pockets with cement at the end of each workday until they had accumulated enough to fill a bag. The family's freezer bulged with chicken waiting to be resold, and the refrigerator held three large flans, because the middleman had come into a windfall of eggs.

"This is an art," he said, sagging back into a recliner. "Not everyone can sell like me."

That same afternoon, in another town near Havana, a 30-something Cuban went out in search of videos to rent. He walked down a street lined by homes with peeling facades, then stopped at an entrance that stood out because of its fresh paint job.

A gaunt man cracked the door open a few inches, and tersely asked: "What do you want?"

After poking his head out and looking each way down the street, the man ushered his customer inside. The floor was brand-new faux marble, the recliners plush velvet -- more signs of prosperity amid the street's decay.

"I've got some Julia Roberts, I've got some Al Pacino," he said.

But he had no intention of handing them over. Instead, he would relay a message to a courier, who would inform "the old man." The customer would have to wait six hours, then go to the old man's house to retrieve the movies.

"Things are tight now," the movie dealer said, explaining that police had been more vigilant since Castro's illness.

A few days later, back at the market where izquierda culture might be strongest, a customer was on the lookout for lobsters. A man stepped up to him and whispered, "Meet me two blocks down the street."

Lobsters, abundant in Cuban waters, are illegal in all but a few of the most expensive state-run restaurants. The rest of the catch is exported.

The lobster vendor hopped in the customer's car and directed him through a labyrinth of city streets to a colonial-era home. A man on the rooftop flashed a caution signal, and the vendor instructed the customer not to move.

The vendor slipped out of the car and disappeared through a door, reappearing 10 minutes later to wave the customer inside. At the top of the stairs, a woman appeared with a dozen beautiful lobster tails.

The customer handed over six dollars, grabbed the lobsters and dashed down the stairs. He wheeled his car back toward the market. Three blocks away, the vendor yelled, "Stop!"

He jumped out of the car, and in a moment, he was gone.

Mexican Gangs Displaying Severed Heads (AP)

By Will Weissert

The drug lords at war in central Mexico are no longer content with simply killing their enemies. They are putting their severed heads on public display.

In Michoacan, the home state of President-elect Felipe Calderon, 17 heads have turned up this year, many with bloodstained notes like the one found in the highlands town of Tepalcatepec in August: "See. Hear. Shut Up. If you want to stay alive."

Many in Michoacan's mountains and colonial cities are doing just that: They are tightlipped, their newspapers are censoring themselves and in one town, 18 out of 32 police officers quit saying they had received death threats from drug smugglers.

In the most gruesome case, gunmen burst into a nightclub and rolled five heads onto the dance floor. In another, a pair of heads were planted in front of a car dealership in Zitacuaro, a town best known until now as a nesting ground for monarch butterflies.

By a highway outside Tepalcatepec, suspected drug smuggler Hector Eduardo Bautista's tortured body was dumped on July 10. Near a black metal cross put up by his family at the spot, killers apparently avenging his death have been leaving severed heads — five so far — each with a threatening message.

Beheadings and accompanying notes in sometimes cryptic and misspelled Spanish are becoming a ghoulish vogue among the gangs that grow marijuana, cook methamphetamine and run cocaine in Michoacan. There have been 420 homicides in the state this year, including 19 police chiefs and commanders, and Juan Antonio Magana, the state's attorney general, says well over half the killings were drug-related — the work of smuggling gangs reorganizing after authorities captured some of their top leaders.

"These are groups that are very big, very strong and are out to dominate territory," Magana said in an interview.

Drug smuggling in Michoacan has traditionally been controlled by a syndicate known as Los Valencia. Police arrested its leader, Armando Valencia, in August 2003 and one of his lieutenants, Carlos Alberto Rosales Mendoza, a year later.

Now, anti-narcotics investigators say, the Gulf cartel based in northern Mexico is battling its way into Los Valencia territory, relying on "Los Zetas," ex-Mexican army operatives-turned hit men. Los Valencia loyalists have fought back fiercely.

Many notes attached to slaying victims are signed "The Family," a possible reference to Los Valencia. Some mention "La Chata," a known alias for a top reputed Gulf cartel hit man.

"They don't need to leave written messages. The mere fact that they are using such high levels of violence is sending messages of intimidation, causing fear," Magana said. "But doing it shows other gangs they can act in even more gruesome and violent ways than their rivals."

With a vast and sparsely populated Pacific coast and the rugged Sierra Madre del Sur Mountains, Michoacan is good territory for producing and smuggling drugs.

Many farmers have abandoned avocado, coffee and corn in favor of marijuana in the highlands, where roads are few and police can't easily penetrate. Smuggling gangs have cleared forests for airstrips. Small planes crammed with Colombian cocaine streak in, leaving loads that are ferried to the coast and stowed on fast boats that speed north toward the U.S. border.

Michoacan also has become a den for hidden meth labs.

Journalists statewide have covered the murders but some have avoided digging further after receiving death threats. On Oct. 13, police recovered the body of an unidentified man who had been shot 38 times and dumped outside the town of Tacambaro. An attached note in fluorescent yellow marker appeared to directly threaten the media: "The family and the ZZs are the same thing. Media outlets, don't sell out."

Calderon, who will be sworn in as president on Dec. 1, wants a new, better trained federal police force to investigate drug smuggling, longer prison terms for drug convicts and more extraditions of kingpins wanted in the U.S.

He says Mexico also needs more help from U.S. law enforcement, since Mexican smugglers are serving American drug users.

Attorney General Magana denies Calderon's contention that Mexican law enforcement is overwhelmed. But in Villa Madero, a logging town of crowing roosters and stray dogs asleep on cracked asphalt streets, the abrupt mass departure of police officers suggests a different picture.

"There's an enormous pressure here," said former officer Reyes Alberto Gamino, now retired at 21. "It's very dangerous."

Mayor Alberto Villasenor has said the police were fired for failing to show up to guard a municipal dance Sept. 16. The former officers claim they quit because gunmen were waiting to kill them for arresting a reputed drug boss.

One of the officers who resigned is Gildardo Villa. Interviewed in front of his home, Villa seemed nervous, looking over his shoulder constantly and answering questions in hushed tones.

"The threats had been coming for a long time," he said. "That's why we left."

Inside his cramped City Hall office, Justice of the Peace Apolinar Yanez acknowledged that police are afraid of the gangs, whom he described as "very well armed and very dangerous."

"I'm not going to tell you who they are, not going to give you names or tell you what kinds of activities they are involved in. I don't want problems," Yanez said. "But they were threatening the police."

Since the police officers quit, many in Villa Madero say they are afraid to leave their homes.

"There's a fear that affects everyone," said Enrique Acerra, 70, who runs a used-clothing store. "It's hard to feel safe."

Torrent Of Mud Swamps Indonesia (WP/AP)

By Chris Brummitt, Associated Press

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Sludge Unleashed By Rig Accident Displaces 10,000

PORONG, Indonesia Factories that once produced watches and shoes lie under a sea of thick, stinking mud. Villagers stand on hastily constructed dams and gaze at the thousands of homes swallowed by brown sludge.

Four months ago, a torrent of hot mud from deep beneath the surface of Indonesia's seismically charged Java island began surging from a natural gas exploration site following a drilling accident.

The "mud volcano" pours out about 165,000 cubic yards of mud every day -- enough to cover a football field about 75 feet deep. Often spewing out in geyser-like eruptions, the mud has left about 665 acres swamped or abandoned as unsafe, forcing more than 10,000 people from their homes.

Experts say the mud volcano is one of the largest ever recorded on land. Geologists fear the technology may not exist to stop the eruption, saying mud could flow for years or even centuries -- or stop on its own at any time.

The mud is believed to come from a reservoir 3 1/2 miles below the surface that has been pressurized by shifts in the crust or by the accumulation of hydrocarbon gases.

The calamity has underscored the patchy safety record of mining companies exploiting the natural resources of this Southeast Asian nation made up of thousands of islands.

Police seized the drilling rig involved in the accident and are investigating whether to bring criminal charges against the principal well owner, PT Lapindo Brantas.

Lapindo, which is linked to the wealthy family of Indonesia's welfare minister, is paying for an ever expanding network of earthen dams to contain the mud, but many people fear the resulting slimy ponds will overflow during the approaching rainy season.

"The volume of mud that is coming out of the hole is not just large, it's enormous," Earl Hunt Jr., an engineer from Woodward, Okla., said while supervising dredging operations.

"We are running out of room up here, period," he said. "If they don't pump it to sea or something soon, then there will be more villages lost."

The government recently gave permission to dump the mud into the sea via a local river. But experts question whether that will get rid of the sludge faster than it gushes from the hole, and environmentalists are opposing the plan as a threat to the marine ecosystem.

The mud, which stands as deep as 16 feet in places, has submerged or washed into houses in four villages. At least 20 factories and many acres of rice fields and prawn farms have been destroyed.

The sludge has repeatedly washed over a major road, closing it for weeks at a time, and now it is threatening a rail line in the industrial area just outside Surabaya, Indonesia's second-largest city.

The mud, which is not toxic, first appeared several days after a blowout deep in Lapindo's well shaft May 29.

Police claim the company mishandled the accident by failing to cap the hole properly, allowing the mud to surge to the surface from several cracks close to the well.

Independent analysts also have said the company's activities were a factor in the torrent.

"This is a natural disaster induced by drilling activity," said Andang Bactiar, a consultant for the oil and gas industry who is working with authorities investigating the case. "Somehow, or somewhere, several mistakes occurred that caused the mud to come from the hole."

The company declined to give its version of what happened or the steps it took to stem the mud, citing possible legal liability. But spokeswoman Yuniwati Teryana said drilling activity had not been proven to be linked to the eruption.

The well is 50 percent owned by Lapindo. Another Indonesian firm, PT Medco E&P Brantas, has a 32 percent stake and Santos Ltd. of Australia holds the remaining 18 percent.

Lapindo has made emergency payments to those who have lost homes and promises to compensate their losses.

But in a country where mistrust of government runs high after decades of dictatorship that ended only in 1998, many people fear the company will try to dodge its responsibilities. The involvement of Welfare Minister Aburizal Bakrie's family in Lapindo has only added to worries.

"We are just poor people, our rights will be torn up as usual," one resident, Sukararji, said as he stood on a dam gazing at mud that reaches the second-floor windows of his house. "We are being stepped on like ants."

After two unsuccessful attempts to stop the flow, Lapindo is digging three shafts alongside the hole, hoping to kill the eruption by pumping in concrete.

Experts are skeptical that will work.

"If they manage to stop it, it will be the first time in the world that it has been done," said geologist Arif Munsyawar.

A New Tack On Darfur (WP)

By Morton Abramowitz

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Instead of saving Darfur's people, their advocates may be prolonging their agony. They need to consider whether a different message is required to get urgent action from the Bush administration on ending the violence. Specifically: Is it not time to go beyond urging greater pressure on Sudan and using force in the region to seek immediately an effective negotiated peace settlement between Sudan's leader and the rebel groups in Darfur? That is a necessity in any event.

For three years nongovernmental organizations and the media have pursued a relentless campaign to persuade Western governments to stop the killing in Darfur, protect and feed its people, and get millions of refugees out of camps and back home. The recent renewed military carnage in Darfur has prompted continuing ads in major newspapers and on television imploring President Bush to get a United Nations force into Darfur to "stop the genocide."

This advocacy has rested on two assumptions: First, that only outside pressure will persuade Sudan's government to reverse course; the country's leader, Omar al-Bashir, will do nothing without a gun to his head. Second, if his government resists, Western governments can ultimately be persuaded to do the right thing -- to take aggressive measures to force Khartoum to capitulate. Such measures include a no-fly zone in Darfur, a blockade of Sudan's ports, NATO intervention and sending a U.N. force (whether or not Khartoum accepts it).

What have advocacy efforts accomplished so far? They have caught the attention of Sudan's government, brought in money to keep people alive and made it difficult for governments to avert their gaze. But they have not stopped Sudan's marauding or gotten Western governments to change the situation decisively. International officials say violence is worsening again. Meanwhile, 2 million displaced people remain warehoused.

What is the problem? While public pressure for aggressive military measures has sometimes worked in persuading Western democracies to take actions they prefer not to take, as in the Balkans, those governments interested in Darfur -- in Africa, Arab countries and NATO -- are divided. Robust military measures are, unfortunately, simply not acceptable to governments, whatever they may say about "never again." The United States, which could catalyze strong action, is hampered by its involvement in Iraq.

Indeed at times the advocates for Darfur have accepted half-hearted measures. Sending in an ill-equipped, understaffed and underfunded African Union force, however useful, did not end the killing, but it made the world believe that the problem was heading toward resolution.

When pressure is applied to the Sudanese government, there is always the perceived sense, much as there was in Vietnam, that just a little more and Khartoum will cave. Perhaps. But Bashir, admittedly no Ho Chi Minh, is sitting on growing oil revenue, and he can see that the international community is divided and that the demands for more aggressive action are going nowhere.

Moreover, many measures the advocates demand for bringing pressure on Bashir, such as targeted sanctions, an investigation of Sudan's business holdings or a threat of action by the International Criminal Court, hardly meet the standard of urgency, however much these things may be worth doing.

So how do we change course if the situation is so dire? Clearly regime change would be the best approach, though it's hard to believe we know how to do this without force. Failing that, we must accept that the Darfur Peace Agreement, reached in May, has collapsed and it is time to talk once again to Bashir about a more effective peace agreement.

To begin, the five foreign ministers of the permanent U.N. Security Council members and the head of the African Union should visit Khartoum immediately and tell Bashir that they intend to work with him to correct the flaws in the agreement and strenuously seek to get rebel groups on board. They will put trusted representatives at the negotiating site until a revised agreement is reached.

Bashir, in turn, must immediately stand down his forces, confine the Janjaweed militias and allow outside aid to flow to the displaced. China's government, no great humanitarian institution and a financier of Sudan, should be more willing to do this, since countries would be trying to work with Bashir, not pummel him.

This sort of effort is no easy matter. The diplomats might not like it, and it might not thrill the Sudanese government, even though Sudanese forces are performing badly in the Darfur area. Numerous practical problems would have to be worked out between the government and the fractious rebels, who are hard to corral. There is an unhappy history with the perfidious Bashir on negotiations. And even if an agreement can be forged, its durability is uncertain.

But this would constitute a serious and uncontentious effort to end immediately what we are told is a rapidly deteriorating situation. If it's not in the cards or doesn't work, Darfur advocates can again raise the decibel level, and perhaps part of the international community will finally get angry enough to match words with deeds.

Speaking To Syria (LAT)

The isolated country could hold the key to Middle East peace, if only the U.S. would start talks.

'KEEP YOUR FRIENDS CLOSE, and your enemies closer." It's an adage the Bush administration surely knows, yet it continues to insist that merely talking to nasty regimes legitimizes and empowers them. This stance is impeding progress on Middle East peace. The U.S. should sit down and talk to Syria — and encourage Israel to do the same.

For years, the Syrians refused even to recognize, let alone negotiate with, Israel, or they set impossible preconditions. But lately Syrian President Bashar Assad keeps saying he wants peace talks.

Israel is internally divided on the wisdom of taking Assad up on the offer, knowing that Syria is weak and that the price of peace would almost certainly be the return of the Golan Heights. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ruled out peace talks, but Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, Defense Minister Amir Peretz and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni are in favor of finding out what kind of a deal Assad might have in mind — or of calling his bluff. The White House, however, is reportedly pressuring Israel not to negotiate with Damascus, arguing that to do so would undermine U.S. efforts to isolate and punish Syria.

Assad is certainly no democrat, and the U.S. relationship with Syria is unquestionably difficult. Syria has a strategic partnership with Iran, supports the terrorist group Hezbollah, was gleeful over Israel's setbacks during last summer's war in Lebanon and has not been helpful to the U.S. in Iraq — though its record on that score is improving.

But productive diplomacy is not simply talking to your like-minded friends. The need now is for the U.S. to press for peace in the Middle East rather than dwell on the undeniable faults of the Assad regime. For more than 30 years, the U.S. has endeavored to coax, cajole and browbeat Arabs and Israelis into forging a durable Middle East agreement. But with a global Islamist revival and a terrorist challenge — and with anti-Western sentiment raging in Arab nations — could the White House pick a worse moment to back away from its commitment to bring all parties to the negotiating table? Isn't it worth at least exploring whether Syria might be persuaded to recognize Israel or to stop supporting Hezbollah? The administration should realize that the mere act of talking to your adversaries is not a sign of weakness.

Talking to Assad does not require the United States to lift economic sanctions against Damascus. It doesn't prejudice the U.N. investigation of the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, for which Syrian officials, if implicated, should be brought to justice.

President Bush should send former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to Damascus. Baker, a veteran of many rounds of bruising negotiations with Assad's father, has said he favors talking to Damascus. An Israeli-Syrian breakthrough is attainable, and it could jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Baker also appears to believe that a peaceful future for Iraq will require the negotiation of regional security arrangements among Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran. He'd best get started.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

Muslim Scholar Denied Entry To U.S. (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

An Islamic scholar from South Africa has been denied entry into the United States, prompting questions from Bay Area Muslims who had invited him to participate in activities marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

Fazlur Rahman Azmi was detained by officials from U.S. Customs and Border Protection when he arrived at San Francisco International Airport from London on Friday afternoon, according to the Council on American-Islamic Relations, a civil liberties group.

Azmi, who made previous visits to the country as recently as April without problems, was questioned for hours before being denied entry and sent on a plane out of the country Saturday, the group said.

Michael Fleming, a Customs and Border Protection spokesman, confirmed Saturday that Azmi was forced to leave the country after a brief detainment. He refused to give any details of the case.

"His application for entry into the U.S. was determined to be inadmissible," he said.

The Islamic Society of East Bay had invited Azmi to lead prayers at mosques around the Bay Area and speak at a celebration in Fremont on Saturday night marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan.

"There's nothing suspicious about him," said Nawaz Khan, a member of the East Bay group. "He is not involved in any political groups. All he does is teach at the mosque and pray."

About 1,000 people are denied entry into the United States daily for reasons that include inadequate travel documents or because their names appear on a U.S. government watch list.

BYU Scholar, Sept. 11 Theorist, Resigns (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

A Brigham Young University physics professor who suggested the World Trade Center was brought down by explosives has resigned, six weeks after the school placed him on leave.

"I am electing to retire so that I can spend more time speaking and conducting research of my choosing," physics professor Steven Jones said in a statement released by the school.

His retirement is effective Jan. 1, 2007.

Jones recently published theories about U.S. government involvement in the events of Sept. 11, including one suggesting that explosives inside the World Trade Center — not airplanes striking the twin towers — brought the complex down.

BYU stripped Jones of two classes and put him on leave in early September. It also began investigating his research.

The school abandoned its review Friday after reaching a retirement agreement with Jones, BYU spokeswoman Carri Jenkins said.

Jenkins said the school did not pressure Jones to retire.

Jones, who helped found a group called Scholars for 9/11 Truth in 2005, said he plans to continue researching and speaking about his Sept. 11 theories. That includes completing an analysis of soils and metals from the towers that led him to the conclusions in his paper "Why Indeed Did the World Trade Center Collapse?"

Jenkins said Jones, not BYU, owns the materials.

Jones has not apologized for his remarks and declined comment on whether he regretted his disagreement with the school.

"I have a stewardship for my research and my teaching and my work, and I'm doing my best on that," he said.

Jones began teaching at BYU, which is owned by The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints, in 1985.

More Human Remains Found At Ground Zero (AP)

AP, October 22, 2006

Workers recovered more human remains Saturday from several manholes as the city began a new search for Sept. 11 victims.

The search was ordered after the surprise discovery of dozens of bones in an abandoned manhole this week.

Utility and city officials on Saturday hand-removed material from other manholes after tearing into the pavement on a service road along the site's western edge. It was then sifted onsite by forensic officials for fragments of human remains, said deputy mayor Edward Skyler.

City officials said that about 15 more pieces of remains had been recovered, bringing the total to nearly 100 this week.

Upset relatives of some Sept. 11 victims called for a federally led new search for remains in and around ground zero after construction workers discovered bones in one manhole excavated as part of work on a transit hub, officials said.

The 80 bones and fragments found earlier this week ranged from a little less than an inch to 12 inches long, said Ellen Borakove, spokeswoman for the city medical examiner's office. The bones possibly include ribs, arms, legs and vertebra, she said.

The active search for the dead ended at the site in 2002 after a massive cleanup of 1.5 million tons of debris. About 20,000 pieces of human remains were found, but the DNA in thousands of those pieces was too damaged by heat, humidity and time to yield matches in the many tests forensic scientists have tried over the years.

More than 40 percent of the 2,749 Sept. 11 victims in New York have never been identified.

WAR NEWS:

U.S. To Hand Iraq A New Timetable On Security Role (NYT)

By David S. Cloud

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — The Bush administration is drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and assume a larger role in securing the country, senior American officials said.

Details of the blueprint, which is to be presented to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki before the end of the year and would be carried out over the next year and beyond, are still being devised. But the officials said that for the first time Iraq was likely to be asked to agree to a schedule of specific milestones, like disarming sectarian militias, and to a broad set of other political, economic and military benchmarks intended to stabilize the country.

Although the plan would not threaten Mr. Maliki with a withdrawal of American troops, several officials said the Bush administration would consider changes in military strategy and other penalties if Iraq balked at adopting it or failed to meet critical benchmarks within it.

A senior Pentagon official involved in drafting the blueprint said Iraqi officials were being consulted as the plan evolved and would be invited to sign off on the milestones before the end of the year. But he added, “If the Iraqis fail to come back to us on this, we would have to conduct a reassessment” of the American strategy in Iraq.

The plan is being formulated by General George W. Casey Jr. and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, the top military and civilian officials in Iraq, as well as by Pentagon officials.

General Casey has been in close consultations with the White House as the debate over the way forward in Iraq has intensified in recent weeks. And he and Mr. Khalilzad took part by videoconference on Saturday in a strategy meeting with President Bush and senior administration officials, including Vice President Dick Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Gen. John P. Abizaid, the top American commander in the Middle East, and Gen. Peter Pace, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

“We’re trying to come up with ways to get the Iraqis to step up to the plate, to push them along, because the time is coming,” a senior administration official said. “We can’t be there forever.”

Until now, the Bush administration has avoided using threats of deadlines for progress, saying conditions on the ground would determine how quickly Iraq took on greater responsibility for governing the country and how soon American troops could withdraw. CBS News has reported that the Pentagon was studying these questions, but the broad scope of the steps under consideration and the benchmarks that are being contemplated have not been disclosed.

The idea of devising specific steps that Mr. Maliki would have to take was described by senior officials who support the plan but would speak only on condition of anonymity. Their willingness to discuss a plan that has not been fully drafted appeared intended at least in part to signal renewed flexibility on the part of the administration, and perhaps also to pre-empt the recommendations of the bipartisan Iraq Study Group, a commission led by James A. Baker III and charged with formulating a new strategy in Iraq. It is expected to issue recommendations late this year or early next year.

The plan also moves the administration closer to an idea advocated by many Democrats, who have called for setting a date for beginning phased withdrawals of American troops from Iraq as a way to compel Iraq's government to resolve its internal divisions and take on more responsibility.

In a statement issued Saturday, a White House spokeswoman, Nicole Guillemard, said the Times's account was "not accurate," but did not specify what officials found to be inaccurate. "We've been coordinating with the Iraqis for months on a series of measures they can take to assume more control of their country," the statement said, "and to form the basis for a national compact between all communities in Iraq on the way forward."

Frustration is growing among senior American military officers and civilian officials in Iraq and at the Pentagon with Mr. Maliki for his failure to move decisively against Shiite militias and on a wide range of other fronts. Even the implied threat that the administration would reassess its presence in Iraq may not be enough, senior officials said.

In Baghdad, Iraqi leaders have been watching the discussions carefully and expressing uneasiness over the growing political pressure in the United States for a troop pullout.

Tensions between Washington and Baghdad reached a new point on Monday when Mr. Maliki, who took office in May, used a telephone call with Mr. Bush to seek assurances that the United States did not intend to oust him. The White House said after the call that Mr. Bush had pledged full support for the Iraqi.

Mr. Rumsfeld alluded to discussions about benchmarks on Friday at a Pentagon news conference, noting that Mr. Khalilzad and General Casey "are currently working with the Iraqi government to develop a set of projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility."

He emphasized the urgency of transferring more security and governing responsibilities to the Iraqis. "It's their country," he said. "They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

But Mr. Rumsfeld was quick to play down expectations: "There's no doubt in my mind but that some of those projections we won't make; it will be later, or even earlier in some instances. And in some cases, once we meet the projection, we may have to go back and do it again."

Mr. Maliki's government has already announced its own set of benchmarks, including the establishment of a mechanism to disarm private militias. This week, the government removed commanders of the special police commandos and the public order brigade, both widely criticized as being heavily infiltrated by Shiite militias, in the first broad move against the top leadership of Iraq's unruly special police forces.

But the surge in violence in Baghdad and other places recently has prompted consideration of even more far-reaching steps. An American official said that one proposed plan was to give the Iraqi Army the lead role in domestic security, downgrading the role of police units.

The Bush administration has emphasized building up the police this year so that they can take on the main role in providing security in many cities. The move would be another acknowledgment that the increase in sectarian violence in Baghdad and elsewhere has exposed deep problems with some police units, which have been blamed by Sunnis for carrying out sectarian attacks.

The American strategy in Iraq was thrown into disarray this week by attacks carried out by a Shiite militia in Amara, a town south of Baghdad, and by the acknowledgment from an American military spokesman that the latest plan to secure Baghdad was faltering.

In his radio address on Saturday, Mr. Bush emphasized that the administration was staying flexible in its planning and would "make every necessary change to prevail."

Saying the goal of victory was "unchanging,"" he added: "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal. Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Officials said they were still debating which benchmarks to include and how long the Iraqis should be given to achieve them. The plan is likely to cover a number of Iraqi ministries, including Finance, Interior and Defense, which have struggled to varying degrees with corruption and with delivering even the most basic services, officials said.

General Casey said this month that he hoped by the end of the year to have six or seven provinces under Iraqi administrative control. Currently, there are only two. But the plan is also likely to include timelines for turning over American-run military bases, an official said.

The decision about how far-reaching to make the blueprint is likely to be influenced by what Mr. Maliki and his ministers say they can reasonably accomplish. But American officials are discussing if they should specify whether Iraqi officials deemed incompetent or corrupt should be replaced, one official said. Officials are also considering a timetable for the Iraqi Defense Ministry to have in place systems for paying, feeding and equipping its units, jobs that are still overseen to a large degree by American advisers and by contractors, some of whom have not performed well, officials said.

U.S. Encourages Iraqi Government To Take More Responsibility (MCT)

By John Walcott

McClatchy Newspapers, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - The Bush administration will intensify its efforts to prod the government of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al Maliki to take greater responsibility for governing and pacifying the country, senior U.S. officials said Saturday.

The new plan, which is still being developed, calls for Maliki and other Iraqi leaders to agree to a series of milestones in 2007 for disarming Iraq's sectarian militias, restoring its economic infrastructure, rooting out official corruption, expanding government services and strengthening local governments, the officials said.

President Bush discussed the plan, as well as broader strategic and tactical issues in Iraq, with his top military commanders on Saturday, and the officials stressed that any effort to step up the pressure on the Iraqi government would be consistent with the president's longtime strategy.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld alluded to the evolving plan on Friday, when he said of the Iraqis: "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it, they're going to have to provide security for it, and they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

The U.S. officials, all of whom agreed to speak only on the condition of anonymity because the negotiations with the Iraqi government are sensitive, said the plan is likely to be backed by an explicit economic carrot and an implicit military stick.

They said that if the Iraqi government agrees to what one official called "reasonable and measurable benchmarks", the administration would be prepared to ask Congress to approve millions of dollars in additional aid to Iraq, much of it earmarked for economic and political purposes.

If Maliki and other officials balk or continue to drag their feet, one of the officials said, the administration would be forced to "reconsider all its options." Asked what that meant, the official said that one option might be to announce plans to begin a gradual withdrawal of American troops from Iraq. That, he said, would give Maliki both time and an added incentive to reconsider his own options.

The new tactic could take some pressure off Republican candidates in next month's elections at a time when many are finding it increasingly difficult to defend the administration's "stay the course" rhetoric. It also could blunt Democratic calls for a new direction in Iraq or for a phased withdrawal of American forces.

However, U.S. military officers, diplomats and intelligence officials acknowledged that applying pressure to the Maliki government would carry some risks. They said that those include:

-While their intention is to work cooperatively with the Iraqis, the officials said, overt U.S. pressure could reinforce the impression among Iraqis and other Muslims that the Iraqi government is a U.S. puppet. That could undermine Maliki's legitimacy and aid recruiting by foreign terrorist groups and sectarian militias.

-The administration could ask the Maliki government to do more than it's capable of doing. For example, said one military officer who's served in Iraq, an effort to disarm the country's increasingly powerful Shiite militias could trigger even more violence and invite what the officer called "even more meddling by the Iranians".

Iran backs two major Shiite militias, the Badr Organization, which is allied with a major Shiite political party, the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, and the Mahdi Army of firebrand Shiite cleric Moqtada al Sadr.

But with many Iraqi Sunnis long since convinced that much of the Iraqi military and security force is allied with Shiite militias and death squads, Maliki would have no hope of dismantling the largely Sunni insurgency or defeating foreign terrorists, most of whom also are Sunnis, without confronting the Shiite militias.

"It's not clear whether al Maliki and his government could survive a campaign against the militias," said one senior official. That could drag American troops even deeper into Iraq's sectarian violence.

-The plan may not be enough to stem rising U.S. casualty rate in Iraq or the erosion of public support for the administration's Iraq policies. Democrats now appear poised to win control of the House of Representatives in the Nov. 7 congressional elections, and with it power over the federal budget.

A new Newsweek poll released on Saturday found that 65 percent of Americans think the U.S. is losing ground in Iraq, an all-time low in the Newsweek Poll, and that 54 percent think it was a mistake to take military action against Iraq, compared to 39 percent who think it was the right thing to do. The poll of 1,000 adults has a margin or error of plus or minus four percentage points.

The Pentagon Saturday reported the deaths of three more Marines in Iraq's violent Anbar province, making this the costliest month for U.S. troops in Iraq in two years, with 78 Americans killed so far.

In his weekly radio address on Saturday, the president acknowledged that "the last few weeks have been rough for our troops in Iraq, and for the Iraqi people" but likened the conflict to World War II and the Cold War. "The fighting is difficult, but our nation has seen difficult fights before," Bush said. "In World War II and the Cold War, earlier generations of Americans sacrificed so that we can live in freedom. This generation will do its duty as well."

However, said one senior administration official on Saturday, the Iraqi government must do its duty, too.

At White House Meeting, No Big Changes On Iraq (WP)

By Michael A. Fletcher

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

President Bush met with his top advisers and military commanders on Iraq yesterday in a White House session that, senior officials said, weighed options for forging a way forward amid the surging violence but did not contemplate any major shifts in strategy.

The participants in the 90-minute video conference -- who included Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad and Gen. George W. Casey Jr., the military commander in Iraq -- talked about tactical changes that could overcome the severe challenges posed by the war, officials said.

"The participants focused on the nature of the enemy, the challenges in Iraq, how to better pursue our strategy, and the stakes of succeeding for the region and the security of the American people," said White House spokeswoman Nicole Guillemard.

The meeting, which the White House called the third in a series Bush has held with this group to consult on the war, did not consider any significant policy changes, a senior official said, speaking on the condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss private meetings. And in his Saturday radio address, Bush offered no indications on any major shift, even as he acknowledged the increasing violence in Iraq.

"Our goal is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," he said. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal. Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

The high-level meeting came amid growing U.S. frustration with the deteriorating state of affairs in Iraq, where both civilian and U.S. military casualties have sharply increased in recent weeks. The surge in violence, coupled with the growing antipathy among the American public toward the war, is feeding a sense that the Bush administration will be forced to retreat from its open-ended support of the war.

In a news conference Friday, Rumsfeld emphasized that U.S. officials are pressing the Iraqi government to offer projections about when it will be able to take over a greater share of the responsibility for securing the country and making economic and political progress.

"The biggest mistake would be not to pass things over to the Iraqis," Rumsfeld said. "It's their country. They're going to have to govern it. They're going to have to provide security for it. And they're going to have to do it sooner rather than later."

White House officials denied a New York Times report, posted yesterday afternoon on the newspaper's Web site, that said the administration is drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to take on that greater role in securing the country.

If the Iraqis fail to meet the timetable, the Times quoted an unnamed senior Pentagon official as saying, the Bush administration would consider an abrupt shift in policy short of troop withdrawals. It would mark the first time that the administration has used deadline threats to pressure the Iraqi government to more aggressively pursue progress.

"The story is not accurate," said Frederick L. Jones II, a spokesman for the National Security Council.

White House officials said the matter was not discussed at yesterday's meeting. Still, administration officials acknowledge that they have been pressing for months for the Iraqis to take greater responsibility for disarming warring militias and to take other steps to stabilize their country.

Benchmarks have been part of the U.S. policy in Iraq for months, said Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush.

"Implicit in that is that if they are not achieving the benchmarks, we are going to have to make changes accordingly," Bartlett said, adding that troop withdrawals or other dramatic changes in U.S. policy are not being contemplated.

Casey has been working on a series of benchmarks for handing over to the Iraqi government control of both military bases and entire areas of the country. At a recent news conference, Casey said he expects six or seven more provinces in Iraq to come under full control of the government by the end of the year, although Rumsfeld said Friday that "there's no doubt" some of Casey's projections will not be met.

Currently, the Iraqi government has control of two of the country's 18 provinces, meaning that local police can keep order without routine help from the U.S.-led military coalition.

"We are constantly developing new tactics to achieve our goal," Jones said. "We've been coordinating with the Iraqis for months on a series of measures they can take to assume more control of their country."

Diane Farrell, a Democratic candidate for Congress, gave her party's national radio response to Bush, saying: "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy. . . . An arbitrary departure date could be dangerous, but real goals for the new Iraqi government and its army are necessary."

Farrell, who is running against Rep. Christopher Shays in Connecticut, said Democrats will hold Bush accountable for the war in Iraq if they gain control of either the Senate or House in midterm elections next month.

Yesterday's meeting took place amid a significant increase in violence around Iraq. At least 78 U.S. troops have been killed so far in Iraq this month -- the highest daily rate since January 2005. Attacks in Baghdad have surged 43 percent since midsummer, despite the presence of thousands of U.S. troops, while nationally more than 100 Iraqis a day are being killed, according to the United Nations.

U.S. commanders are trying to decide whether to send more troops to Iraq.

Bush said in his radio address that the increase in violence is attributable in part to a more aggressive posture being taken by U.S. troops. Still, he said, Americans have faced tough battles before.

"In World War II and the Cold War, earlier generations of Americans sacrificed so that we can live in freedom," he said. "This generation will do its duty as well."

Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP)

By Jennifer Loven

AP, October 22, 2006

President Bush on Saturday reviewed Iraq strategy with top war commanders and national security advisers, but indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy.

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal."

Under bipartisan, pre-election pressure for a significant re-examination of the president's war plan, the White House is walking a fine line.

It made sure to publicize the president's high-level meeting on the deteriorating conditions in Iraq — October already is the deadliest month this year for U.S. troops. At the same time, officials characterized the session as routine and part of a continuing discussion that seeks merely tactical adjustments to — not a radical overhaul of — war policy.

"I wouldn't read into this somehow that there is a full-scale push for a major re-evaluation," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said about the White House meeting. Rice, traveling from Asia to Moscow, stressed to reporters that Bush talks often with his generals in Iraq, and did so recently at Camp David.

On Friday, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said U.S. officials — Gen. George Casey, head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq, and U.S. ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad among them — are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they think they can pass off various pieces of responsibility for security and governing.

The New York Times, in an article posted on its Web page Saturday, said a plan being formulated by Casey and Khalilzad would likely for the first time outline to Iraq milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. But it said the blueprint, to be presented to Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki by the end of this year, would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

In a candid assessment of the situation in Iraq, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, said in an interview aired Saturday on al-Jazeera television that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq but was now willing to talk to any group, outside of al-Qaida, to further reconciliation in the country.

A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly. "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position," said the official, who asked not to be identified because a transcript had not been available for review.

The 90-minute White House session Saturday brought together Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; Gen. Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Bush's national security adviser, Stephen Hadley; and Rumsfeld and other officials. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney, Casey and Khalilzad.

The meeting followed up on Bush's half-hour talk on Friday with Abizaid.

The White House did not allow reporters to cover either and provided few details after each, but did release an official photo of Saturday's meeting.

Recent developments in Iraq and at home have put Bush in a delicate political position ahead of the Nov. 7 elections. With GOP control of Congress at stake, voters are expected to be influenced greatly by the nearly four-year-old war.

The discussion of new approaches comes as public pessimism about the war rises. Almost two-thirds in a Newsweek poll released Saturday said the U.S. is losing ground in its efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq. An AP-Ipsos poll this month found that just over one-third of Americans surveyed say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall.

Last week, the U.S. military spokesman in Iraq acknowledged a stepped-up operation to secure Baghdad was failing after two months and that it needed to be refocused.

Though Bush and his aides publicly voice the utmost confidence in Maliki, frustration is growing with his lack of progress in reining in militias. On Friday, gunmen loyal to an anti-American Shiite cleric briefly seized a major southern city, an embarrassment for the local Iraqi security forces.

An independent commission led by former secretary of State James A. Baker III and former Democratic Rep. Lee Hamilton of Indiana is not expected to make its recommendations for a new strategy until December or January. But Bush and his aides have rejected the most drastic ideas that some have floated, such as partitioning Iraq into semiautonomous Shiite, Sunni and Kurd regions or setting a timetable for a phased withdrawal of troops.

Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

President Bush yesterday acknowledged that U.S. commanders are changing tactics in Iraq nearly every day but declared that the mission "is clear and unchanging."

"Our goal," he said, "is victory."

The president's remarks aired in his weekly radio address as he met to discuss the situation in Iraq with top generals and other advisers at the White House.

Later, a senior State Department official said in an interview with an Arab television network that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq.

Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, told Al Jazeera that Washington was ready to talk with any group except al Qaeda in Iraq to bring about national reconciliation.

"We are open to dialogue, because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," Mr. Fernandez said, speaking in Arabic from Washington.

But Mr. Bush indicated little intention to make major changes, although the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq so far this month climbed to 78 -- the highest monthly tally this year -- and despite reports that the White House is nearing a dramatic shift in war strategy.

"What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal," the president said in his radio address. "Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush vehemently rejected pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"There is one thing we will not do: We will not pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said. "There are some in Washington who argue that retreating from Iraq would make us safer. I disagree."

Mr. Fernandez, in the Al Jazeera interview, said there was room for criticism of the war "because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq."

Political pressure is growing for the president to make a decisive change to his war strategy, and Democratic candidates nationwide have campaigned on a theme of change.

Democratic congressional candidate Diane Farrell, of Connecticut, yesterday said Mr. Bush should fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. She said Congress should set clear benchmarks for Iraqis that, when met, would allow U.S. troops to leave the country.

"We need a new direction in Iraq," said Mrs. Farrell, who delivered her party's weekly radio address. "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy."

Meanwhile in Iraq, a dozen mortar rounds rained down yesterday on an outdoor market in Mahmoudiyah crowded with shoppers, killing at least 18.

Earlier, gunfights broke out in Hamza al Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shi'ite political party. At least two persons were killed and four injured.

As the violence continued in Iraq -- including the deaths yesterday of three U.S. Marines -- the president met with top commanders and national security advisers.

The 90-minute meeting brought together Mr. Rumsfeld; Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace; Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and others. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney; Gen. George Casey, who heads the U.S.-led forces in Iraq; and Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Polls nationwide indicate Republicans are in jeopardy in the Nov. 7 elections of losing their majority in Congress, which they have held since 1994. Democrats need to net 15 seats to win control of the House, and six seats to take the Senate.

With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG), headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months.

Under a partition plan, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying near-autonomy, with a central government handling defense, foreign policy and oil production.

Mr. Bush sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, "who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists."

Fellow Republicans are beginning to criticize Mr. Bush's policy.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia said after a recent visit to Iraq that U.S. efforts are "drifting sideways." Other Senate leaders, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, have been critical of Mr. Bush's "stay the course" policy.

Almost two-thirds of respondents in a Newsweek poll released yesterday said the United States is losing ground in efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that while Mr. Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Mr. Snow said.

Bush Reviews Iraq War Strategy As Violence Mounts (BLOOM)

By Richard Keil And Tony Capaccio

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

Oct. 21 (Bloomberg) -- President George W. Bush conferred with his top Iraq commanders over strategy as stepped-up operations by U.S. and Iraqi troops in Baghdad have been met with a surge in sectarian violence.

The meeting occurred as the New York Times reported today that the administration is working on a timetable for Iraq's government to take over security responsibilities in the country. The plan would require the government to meet milestones over the next year including disbanding sectarian militias, the Times said, citing unidentified U.S. officials.

The Times said the plan wouldn't threaten a withdrawal of U.S. troops, though officials cited by the paper said the Bush administration would consider changes in military strategy and other penalties if it isn't adopted by Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki or the milestones aren't met.

Colonel Nelson McCouch, a spokesman for General George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, said the approach described in the Times article wasn't new. ``We've been doing this all along," he said. The U.S., McCouch said, has already established milestones that are adjusted according to conditions in Iraq and aren't hard deadlines.

The meeting at the White House today included Bush, General John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East, and General Peter Pace, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff; Casey participated by videoconference, White House spokeswoman Nicole Guillemard said.

Focus on Strategy

The 90-minute meeting focused on ``the nature of the enemy, the challenges in Iraq, how to better pursue our strategy, and the stakes of succeeding for the region and the security of the American people," Guillemard said. ``The president expects to meet with this group again in a similar forum within the next weeks."

Earlier, Bush acknowledged that the situation in Iraq remains difficult. ``As we engage our enemies in their stronghold, these enemies are putting up a tough fight," he said in his weekly radio address.

Attacks on U.S. and Iraqi forces in Baghdad rose 22 percent this month, even as extra U.S. troops moved into the Iraqi capital in an effort to restore stability, Major General William Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman, said this week. At least 70 U.S. military personnel have been killed so far this month compared with 61 killed in combat in September and 58 in August.

Challenge From Democrats

A dozen Democratic leaders in the House and Senate wrote to Bush yesterday urging a change in course in Iraq, the third such letter Democratic leaders have sent. White House spokesman Tony Snow, announcing the meeting with the generals yesterday, said Bush was planning to review, not change, strategy.

The U.S. strategy in Iraq allows military leaders to ``be flexible and adapt to changing circumstances, Bush said in his radio address. ``Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy," he said.

Republicans are struggling to retain their congressional majorities in the Nov. 7 elections as the increased bloodshed in Iraq has fueled voter skepticism about the war. Democrats will ``hold the president accountable," Diane Farrell, who's running against Representative Chris Shays, a Connecticut Republican, said in the Democrats' weekly radio address.

``Our troops deserve from their leaders in Washington, nothing short of a commitment equal to the dedication the troops bring to their duty every day," Farrell said. ``Instead they get a flat denial of the horrible reality."

Optimism about the outlook for the Iraq war fell to 20 percent, compared with 45 percent in June, according to a Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll of 1,006 registered voters. The survey, published this week, has a margin of error of 3.1 percentage points.

`Media War'

In his speech today, Bush said the recent increase in attacks in Iraq also were the result of a ``media war" that terrorists are trying to wage by influencing public opinion.

``They have a sophisticated propaganda strategy," Bush said. ``They know they cannot defeat us in the battle, so they conduct high-profile attacks, hoping the images of violence will demoralize our country and force us to retreat."

Bush cited a recent message from the Global Islamic Media Front that said their goal is to ``carry out a media war that is parallel to the military war."

``The terrorists are trying to divide America and break our will, and we must not allow them to succeed," Bush said.

Democrats such as Senator Barack Obama of Illinois say the U.S. needs to press the Iraqis to take charge of their security. ``We need to be phasing down our troop levels," Obama said in an interview. The U.S. also should tell regional powers such as Iran and Syria to ``get involved" in preventing a failure in Iraq, Obama said.

No Retreat

An independent bipartisan commission established by Congress and headed by former Secretary of State James Baker and former Representative Lee Hamilton plans to make recommendations on U.S. policy in Iraq by year's end. Baker served in the administration of Bush's father, ex-President George H.W. Bush.

The president said today that the U.S. won't withdraw troops from Iraq ``before the mission is complete."

``Retreating from Iraq would dishonor the men and women who have given their lives in that country and mean their sacrifice has been in vain," he said. ``We will defeat the terrorists everywhere they make their stand."

Also participating in today's talks with Bush were Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley and his deputy, J.D. Crouch, as well as Vice President Dick Cheney and U.S. Ambassador to Iraq Zalmay Khalilzad by video, Guillemard said.

Diplomat Cites U.S. 'Stupidity' In Iraq (AP)

By Hamza Hendawi

AP, October 22, 2006

A senior U.S. diplomat said the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq but was now ready to talk with any group except Al-Qaida in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation.

In an interview with Al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department offered an unusually candid assessment of America's war in Iraq.

"We tried to do our best but I think there is much room for criticism because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq," he said.

"We are open to dialogue because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," he said, speaking in Arabic from Washington. "The Iraqi government is convinced of this."

The question of negotiations between the United States and insurgency factions has repeatedly surfaced over the past two years, but details have been sketchy. One issue that was often raised in connection with such negotiations was the extent of amnesty the United States and its Iraqi allies were willing to offer to the insurgents if they disarmed and joined the political process.

Fernandez spoke to the Qatar-based Al-Jazeera after a man claiming to speak for Saddam Hussein's outlawed Baath Party told the network the United States was seeking a face-saving exodus from Iraq and that insurgents were ready to negotiate but won't lay down arms.

"Abu Mohammed", a pseudonym for the man, appeared to set near impossible conditions for the start of any talks with the Americans, including the return to service of Saddam's armed forces, the annulment of every law adopted since Saddam's ouster, the recognition of insurgent groups as the sole representatives of the Iraqi people and a timetable for a gradual, unconditional withdrawal of U.S. and other foreign troops in Iraq.

"The occupier has started to search for a face-saving way out. The resistance, with all its factions, is determined to continue fighting until the enemy is brought down to his knees and sits on the negotiating table or is dealt, with God's help, a humiliating defeat," he said. The man wore a suit and appeared to be in his 40s but his face was concealed.

"There is an element of the farcical in that statement," Fernandez said of Abu Mohammed's comments. "They are very removed from reality."

Still Fernandez warned that failure to pacify the widening sectarian strife in Iraq as well as an enduring insurgency would damage the entire Middle East.

"We are witnessing failure in Iraq and that's not the failure of the United States alone but it is a disaster for the region. Failure in Iraq will be a failure for the United States but a disaster for the region."

Although the actual identity of Abu Mohammed remains unknown, the interview adds to growing indications that Iraq's Sunni insurgents sense the tide may be turning against the United States and the Iraqi government it backs.

Fernandez's comments, on the other hand, join a series of sobering remarks by President Bush and the U.S. military in recent days.

Bush this week conceded that "right now it's tough" for U.S. forces in Iraq and on Saturday met with his top military and security advisers to study new tactics to curb the staggering violence in Iraq. Three U.S. Marines were killed also Saturday, making October the deadliest month for American forces in Iraq this year.

U.S. military spokesman Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell said attacks in Baghdad were up 22 percent in the first three weeks of the holy Muslim month of Ramadan despite a two-month old U.S.-Iraqi drive to crush violence in the Iraqi capital.

On Wednesday, and again on Friday, Sunni insurgents believed to belong to al-Qaida in Iraq, staged military-like parades in the heart of five towns in the vast and mainly desert province of Anbar, including the provincial capital Ramadi. Some of these parades, in which hooded gunmen paraded with their weapons, took place within striking distance of U.S. forces stationed in nearby bases.

The parades proved to be a propaganda success, with TV footage of Wednesday's parade shown in many parts of the world, a likely embarrassment for the U.S. military as well as the embattled Iraqi government.

Bush Holds Strategy Session On Iraq (AP)

President Bush on Saturday reviewed Iraq strategy with top war commanders and national security advisers, but indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy.

"Our goal in Iraq is clear and unchanging: Our goal is victory," Bush said in his weekly radio address. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal."

Under bipartisan, pre-election pressure for a significant re-examination of the president's war plan, the White House is walking a fine line.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack, in Moscow with Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, said that Fernandez disputes the description of his comments, which were in Arabic.

"What he says is, that is not an accurate reflection of what he said," McCormack said. Asked whether the Bush administration believes that history will show a record of arrogance or stupidity in Iraq, McCormack replied "No."

A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly. "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position," said the official, who asked not to be identified because a transcript had not been available for review.

Questions To Guide An Exit Policy (WP)

By George F. Will

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

A realist with a wintry smile, James A. Baker III, who helped make George W. Bush's presidency possible, is seeking ways to salvage it. After the 2000 election, Baker orchestrated the Bush campaign's lawyering against the Gore campaign's lawyering that tried to overturn Bush's 537-vote Florida margin. Today Baker is co-chairman -- with former congressman Lee Hamilton, the Indiana Democrat -- of the Iraq Study Group, which will issue recommendations after Thanksgiving.

International crises rarely conform tidily to electoral cycles. Too bad. America's electoral cycles are constitutional facts: Every two years elections take the nation's temperature; every four years the nation selects the occupant of the office responsible for formulating foreign policy.

Today the policy of "staying the course" means Americans dying to prevent Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other. If in January 2009 more than 100,000 U.S. forces remain in Iraq, there might be 100 fewer Republicans in Congress. So "stay the course" is a policy stamped with an expiration date. Here, then, are four questions the Iraq Study Group might address:

Â· What are 140,000 U.S. forces achieving in Iraq that could not be achieved by 40,000?

Â· If the answer to the first question is "creating Iraqi security forces," a second question is: Is there an Iraqi government? In "State of Denial," Bob Woodward quotes Colin Powell, after leaving the administration, telling the president that strengthening Iraq's military and police forces is crucial but that "if you don't have a government that you can connect these forces to, then, Mr. President, you're not building up forces, you're building up militias." And making matters worse.

Â· Third, what limits on U.S. aims are set by the character of the Iraqi people, as we now understand that? Bing West, a former Marine who frequently visits and writes about Iraq, wrote in the October issue of the Atlantic Monthly about accompanying coalition forces that seized an oil pumping station near Basra in March 2003:

"The engineers were appalled to find open cesspools, rusted valves, sputtering turbines, and other vital equipment deteriorating into junk. Heaps of garbage lay outside the walls of nearby houses. Yet inside the courtyards, tiny patches of grass were as well tended as putting greens. That defined Iraq: a generation of tyrannical greed had taught Iraqis to look out for their own, to enrich their families, and to avoid any communal activity that attracted attention."

Â· Hence, a fourth question: In a perhaps intentionally opaque statement on "The Charlie Rose Show" on Oct. 6, Baker said: "If we are able to promote representative -- representative government, not necessarily democracy, in a number of nations in the Middle East and bring more freedom to the people of that part of the world, [Iraq] will have been a success." Can President Bush's "freedom agenda," which Iraq has shredded, be recast by the Study Group's showing that there is more than semantic sleight of hand in the distinction between democracy and representation?

Perhaps the Iraq Study Group will function as did the Tower Commission, which provided a pivot point for the last two years of a troubled presidency. Chaired by former senator John Tower, the Texas Republican, it analyzed the Reagan administration's failings that produced the Iran-contra fiasco. This story is told in the book "Saving the Reagan Presidency" by David Abshire, to whom Reagan gave extraordinary powers to examine his administration's dysfunctions and recommend remedial measures.

Abshire, a seasoned diplomat now advising the Study Group, told Reagan that his presidency could not be revived without the removal of Don Regan as White House chief of staff. Regan was removed. The Study Group almost certainly will, like the Tower Commission, refrain from making personnel recommendations. But is it plausible that the Bush presidency can pivot without changing senior Defense Department personnel?

In September 1942 the U.S. government purchased 58,575 acres of wilderness in eastern Tennessee. Soon there was a town, Oak Ridge, and amazing scientific facilities. Thirty-four months after the purchase, an atomic blast lit the New Mexico desert. After 43 months in Iraq, U.S. forces still struggle to cope with improvised explosive devices.

On Sept. 19 Hamilton said that "the next three months are critical." On Oct. 5 Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said that the next "two or three months" are critical. If only the worsening insurgency were, as the president suggested Wednesday, akin to North Vietnam's 1968 Tet Offensive. The insurgency is worse: Tet was a military defeat for North Vietnam. The president says the war in Iraq will be "just a comma" in history books, but by Nov. 26, the Sunday after Thanksgiving, with the Study Group's recommendations due, the comma will have lasted as long as U.S. involvement in World War II.

After Elections, A Democratic Push (WP)

By David S. Broder

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

No one speaks more authoritatively for the Democrats on defense and national security issues than Sens. Carl Levin of Michigan and Jack Reed of Rhode Island, both longtime members of the Armed Services Committee. If you want to know what Democratic gains in this midterm election would mean for national security policy, Levin and Reed can provide the answers.

In a conference call with reporters the other day, the two senators outlined the changes in U.S. policy toward North Korea and Iraq that they and their fellow Democrats would like to see. They signal to voters the kind of change a Democratic victory would mean.

In the case of North Korea, Levin called for doing something that President Bush has refused for six years to do -- engage directly in talks with representatives of the communist regime.

But he put a condition on it, saying such talks should take place only "providing our allies and partners want us to do it" and only as part of an agreed-upon strategy supported by Japan, South Korea, China and Russia.

Reed, who endorsed the idea, said any direct U.S.-North Korea talks would "most likely" take place in the context of the six-power talks, now stalled over Pyongyang's defiance of the United Nations and the regime's testing of a nuclear weapon.

Levin said he believes the other nations in those six-power talks -- Russia, China, Japan and South Korea -- all wish the United States would talk directly with the North Koreans. Our willingness to do so would not be a sign of weakness, he said, but a way of removing an excuse the North Koreans have used to explain their obduracy.

On Iraq, the two Democrats harked back to the amendment that 39 senators supported during a debate earlier this year -- an amendment that called for a start on U.S. troop withdrawals within six months but set no numbers and specified no target date for ending the U.S. military presence.

Reed, who has made many trips to Iraq and returned just weeks ago from his most recent visit, described the "very, very difficult situation" he found there. "We have to begin to work toward redeployment without setting a timetable," he said. "We have to start laying out some red lines for the Iraqis . . . give them some clear goals we want them to achieve." They need to set plans for disarming militias, conducting elections at the provincial level and spending some of the funds being hoarded in Baghdad on better services for the people, he said.

Implicit in their comments is a belief, based on their firsthand observations, that the current rulers in Baghdad have a different agenda for themselves than the Bush administration's bland assurances suggest. As Levin put it, "Our only leverage for change is to force the politicians in Iraq to realize we're not there as their security blanket. When they recognize that reality, they're more likely to make the necessary compromises on sharing of oil revenues and sharing power. The prospect of losing us as their personal security blanket will focus their minds."

Reed agreed that unless something is done to change course, three separate violent struggles going on in Iraq (Sunnis vs. Shiites; Shiite factions fighting each other; Sunni insurgents fighting Americans) will probably merge into one massive calamity.

When the senators were asked if a Democratic majority in the House or Senate would force the issue in Iraq by threatening to cut off funds for the war, they quickly ruled out any such action. Levin said that a simple resolution recommending to the president that he set a date to begin redeployment might do the trick.

Other forces could nudge Bush in that direction, he said: the growing concern among senior uniformed officers about the impact of the lengthy Iraq deployment on troop morale and unit readiness; and the post-election report of the special Iraq Study Group, headed by James A. Baker III and Lee Hamilton.

But after all the debate on Iraq this year, a change in control of even one house of Congress "would have a major impact, a huge motivating force on the president to change course," Levin said. "More and more Republicans would join with Democrats in trying to get the administration to change course."

Those words will be -- and should be -- taken seriously.

Stark Lessons From Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

The bloody chaos of Iraq under U.S. occupation is shaking Western governments into sobering reassessments of that conflict and of war itself. More urgently, some of these governments have launched tightly held contingency planning for the consequences of a possible American failure in Iraq.

"There will be no papers or staff meetings on that subject in our main ministries," one European senior official told me recently. "It would leak, and that would be disastrous. But our intelligence agencies have begun to work on where the terrorists would go post-Iraq. That is a threat we cannot ignore now."

The deepening doubts about America's commitment and strategy in Iraq that dominate polling for U.S. midterm elections have spread across the Atlantic in recent months as insurgency has metastasized into sectarian warfare between Sunnis and Shiites.

Those doubts have reached even into the office of Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, who needed to be reassured by a telephone call from President Bush last week that Maliki's faltering "national unity" government still has U.S. support. The commitment had been called into question by on-the-record and anonymous comments by members of the Iraq Study Group headed by former secretary of state Jim Baker.

But Bush's reassurances to the beleaguered Maliki do not dispel the gathering sense at home and abroad that the administration is belatedly engaged in a search for a political-economic exit strategy. Such a strategy would quickly reduce the role of U.S. combat troops in Iraq and gradually increase the economic involvement of other countries, including Iraq's neighbors.

The Baker group's political recommendations in late autumn will roughly coincide with the rollout of a U.N.-sponsored International Compact for Iraq that would offer new reconstruction aid and debt relief if Maliki undertakes substantial economic reforms. In the view of international officials, new laws on oil exploration, production and revenue sharing are urgent and central to the reforms and to national reconciliation efforts.

But military leaders and diplomats in Western capitals are not waiting for the Baker and U.N.-sponsored efforts to conclude before they assess the mistakes, poor strategy and changing conditions of warfare that have brought U.S. forces face to face with the bitter prospect of having to withdraw, mission unaccomplished.

The glaring contrast between the lightning victory over Iraq's conventional army in 2003 and the failure of U.S. forces to stabilize postwar Iraq is Topic A in these circles. It has become the subject of official planning exercises, classified Pentagon briefings, and public calls for retraining and reequipping Western forces to fight new forms of insurgency and terrorism fueled by extremist Islamic ideology.

The need for changes in practice and doctrine was reinforced by Israel's inconclusive July-August war in Lebanon against Hezbollah, a classic guerrilla force that also possesses a strategic missile arsenal capable of damaging and shutting down entire Israeli cities.

"Insurgency is here to stay," Jeb Nadaner, deputy assistant defense secretary for stability operations, said at a recent U.S.-British conference in Washington on reorganizing governments to fight irregular warfare.

Other speakers -- including conference organizer John Hillen, the State Department's top political-military expert -- spoke bluntly to the group about the continuing failure of the U.S. military and civilian bureaucracies to adapt to an era in which armor and infantry battles occupy only a small space on the overall battlefield and are in any event too costly to be carried on for very long.

Across the Atlantic, similar thinking is underway in defense ministries and force headquarters. "Classical warfare is probably dead. It is no longer a cost-effective tool to achieve political or economic goals," Gen. Vincent Desportes, the head of France's Doctrine Center for Forces Employment, wrote in a recent study of conflict in a post-Iraq-invasion world.

Instead, conventional wars "mutate very quickly into asymmetrical clashes, which do last," Desportes continued. "The decisive phase is no longer the initial short phase of intervention, but clearly the phase of long stabilization which follows it."

Mao Zedong made famous the idea that civilian populations are the sea in which guerrillas swim. But today's insurgencies use civilian populations as their most important weapon. Britain's Gen. Rupert Smith made the point in a recent book that military forces must be prepared to fight within and for populations, which previously have been seen by generals as little more than impediments to battle.

The extent to which U.S. forces were unprepared for insurgency and sectarian warfare in Iraq has become painfully apparent. The lessons they are learning -- which have become prohibitively costly for Americans and Iraqis -- must never again be forgotten.

Change Course In Iraq (WP)

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

President Bush must revise the U.S. strategy for stabilizing the country.

PRESIDENT BUSH said this month that he was willing to "change tactics" in Iraq if U.S strategy was not working. We believe the time has come for such a change. The Iraqi coalition government that Mr. Bush has been counting on to forge political compromises and disarm sectarian militias doesn't seem to have the strength to carry out either mission. A U.S.-led attempt to pacify Baghdad by concentrating forces in the capital has failed, while contributing to a grievous spike in American casualties. Support for the war is rapidly slipping, in the country and in Congress; a congressionally mandated commission is likely to recommend a new course sometime after next month's election. Mr. Bush would be wise to act sooner than that: The rapidly deteriorating situation in Iraq needs to be addressed urgently.

The United States cannot afford to abandon Iraq or the government of Nouri al-Maliki, which was elected last January with millions of votes from Iraqis who did not choose civil war, partition or al-Qaeda. But U.S. policy must account for the fact that Mr. Maliki's administration has not been able to stop the acceleration of sectarian warfare, in many cases waged by militias linked to parties in the government. Nor has it taken the bold steps that might pave the way for a political settlement, such as an amnesty for insurgents and concessions by majority Shiites to minority Sunnis on the distribution of oil revenue or limitations on federalism.

A revised U.S. strategy must aim to jump-start political accord and militia disarmament. But it must also provide for the possibility that decisive progress will not be achievable soon. It should position the United States to defend its interests during a protracted conflict, with levels of troops and other resources that will be sustainable. It should reach out to Iraq's neighbors and other governments with an interest in stabilizing the country. This calls for diplomacy far more deft and aggressive than the administration thus far has engaged in.

What could be done to foster a political settlement? The best option that has not yet been tried is a peace conference attended by all the Iraqi parties, as well as Iraq's neighbors, the United Nations and other powers, such as the European Union and the Arab League. Similar conferences brokered the end of civil wars in Lebanon, Bosnia and Congo. The United States and other outside powers cannot impose a solution, but they can press the Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to make the deals they know are needed: on oil revenue; on an amnesty for insurgents and former Baathists; on the terms by which Iraq may be divided into federal regions.

The United States, Europe and Arab states could offer incentives for accord such as reconstruction funds linked to progress in implementing constitutional and economic reforms. At the same time, the Bush administration should help to create a contact group of all of Iraq's neighbors to discuss common interests in stabilizing the country and preventing the escalation and spread of civil war. Those common interests do exist, even between the United States and Iran and Syria; dialogue about them is long overdue.

Political progress, or the absence of it, should shape the future deployment of U.S forces. If there are breakthroughs toward Iraqi reconciliation in the coming months, American forces could help to consolidate them.

But if, as appears more likely, Iraq's civil war deepens and spreads, the United States should abandon attempts to pacify Baghdad or other areas with its own forces. It should adopt a strategy of supporting the Iraqi government and army in a long-term effort to win the war. The elements of such a strategy might include substantially upgrading the training, advising and support missions -- which have been woefully undersupported so far. U.S. airpower could back Iraqi troops, and U.S. money and equipment could flow to the Iraqi army, conditioned on government steps to demobilize Shiite militias and respect the constitution. Meanwhile, the U.S. and Iraqi governments should formally agree on a plan for turning the fighting over to Iraqi troops, province by province; Mr. Maliki himself has said he wants that transition to occur by the end of next year. A reserve force of U.S. troops could remain as a guarantor against a military victory by insurgents and as a rapid reaction force that could strike al-Qaeda targets.

A change of course won't necessarily rescue the U.S mission in Iraq. The government, political system and army that Americans and Iraqis have sacrificed so much to create could collapse without the prop of 140,000 U.S. troops or even with it. But there remains a chance the government could gain control over the country. As long as that prospect exists, the United States has a moral obligation and a practical interest to remain in Iraq.

Blowing In The Wind (NYT)

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

The generals who told President Bush before the war that Donald Rumsfeld's shock-and-awe fantasy would not work were not enough to persuade him to change his strategy in Iraq. The rise of the insurgency did not do the trick. Nor did month after month of mounting military and civilian casualties on all sides, the emergence of a near civil war, the collapse of reconstruction efforts or the seeming inability of either Iraqi or American forces to secure contested parts of Iraq, including Baghdad, for any significant period.

So what finally, after all this time, caused Mr. Bush to very publicly consult with his generals to consider a change in tactics in Iraq? The president, who says he never reads political polls, is worried that his party could lose some of its iron grip on power in the Congressional elections next month.

It is not necessarily a bad thing when a politician takes stock of his positions in the teeth of an election. Our elected leaders are expected to heed the will of the American people. And this page has been part of a chorus of pleas for Mr. Bush to come up with a more realistic approach to Iraq.

But the way this sudden change of heart has come about, after months in which Mr. Bush has brushed off all criticism of his policies as either misguided, politically motivated or downright disloyal to America, is maddening. For far too long, the White House has looked upon the war as a tactical puzzle for campaign strategists. The early notion of combining Iraq and the war on terror as an argument for re-electing Republicans robbed the nation of any serious chance for a bipartisan discussion of these life-and-death issues. More recently, the administration seems to have been working under the assumption that its only obligations were to hang on, talk tough and pass the problem on to the next president.

The Iraqi government, which has had a hard time adopting most aspects of American democracy, seems to have eagerly embraced this administration's lessons on how to deny politically unpleasant realities. Just the other day, The Times reported that the Pentagon had decided there was nothing wrong with a program in which phony "positive news" was planted in Iraqi newspapers. And news reports said that the Iraqi government had decided to stop reporting civilian casualties to the United Nations so there would be no record of the war's increasing toll on ordinary Iraqis.

The way the Bush team is stage-managing the president's supposed change of heart about "staying the course" is unfair to the Americans who have taken him at his word that real progress is being made in Iraq — a dwindling but still significant number of people, some of whom have sons and daughters serving in the conflict. It is a disservice to the troops, who were never sent to Iraq in sufficient numbers to protect themselves or the Iraqi people. And it is a disservice to all Americans, who have waited so long for Mr. Bush to act that all that is left are a series of unpleasant choices.

And it is happening in the midst of a particularly ugly, and especially vacuous, election season. There is probably no worse time to begin a serious discussion about Iraq policy than two weeks before a close, bitter election. But now that the discussion has begun, it must continue, as honestly and openly as possible. It is time for the American people to confront all the things that the president never had the guts to tell them about for three and a half years.

On Baghdad Streets, A Police Partnership Falters (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 — When Lt. Col. John Norris led his Stryker battalion to the Baya district of Baghdad last month he planned to work hand in glove with the Iraqi police. But no sooner did he venture onto the streets than he discovered that the police who were to be his partners were part of the problem.

As his Stryker command vehicle drove along a crowded avenue Colonel Norris spied several Shiite women in black abayas wailing over a body sprawled near a mosque as distraught relatives smeared the dead man's blood on their faces. The American officer tried to wave down an Iraqi National Police truck for help, but the driver gave him an icy stare and kept going.

"I was disgusted by that," Colonel Norris recalled.

An investigation by the American battalion later determined that the murder victim was a Sunni army captain visiting his family while on leave.

He had been shot in the head and neck by two men armed with 9-millimeter pistols who escaped in a white van that drove unchallenged through a National Police checkpoint less than 200 yards away.

On Thursday, the American command acknowledged that the Baghdad security plan had yet to stem the escalating bloodshed in the city. A week spent with American units demonstrated a major reason: After spending billions on building up Iraqi forces, and making withdrawal contingent on that buildup, the Americans have discovered that many of the Iraqi security forces are still not ready to handle security on their own. Throughout much of the city many Iraqis do not trust their own police forces.

The American military operation to reduce the sectarian killings in Baghdad and avert a full-fledged civil war has focused on about a dozen neighborhoods where the bodies of tortured victims have been found in sewage-filled lots, civilians have been killed in drive-by shootings and sectarian-inspired kidnappings have soared.

The strategy is to use American and Iraqi forces to clear neighborhoods of violent militias, insurgent groups and arms caches, then hold them with security forces so that essential services can be restored and reconstruction can eventually begin. Two months into the operation, it is the "hold" phase that has run into trouble, partly because it depends on the Iraqi security forces to win the trust of the population and establish the rule of law.

The Iraqi Army only provided two of the six battalions of additional troops that the Americans had requested to carry out the operation, known as Together Forward II, which means that with 15,600 Americans and 9,600 Iraqis, there are more American soldiers involved in the operation than Iraqi troops.

More than 30,000 National Police and regular police officers are also involved, but they are of uneven quality and some units have been infiltrated by the very militiamen they are supposed to control. American troops have been sorting the good policemen from the bad the hard way: on the streets of Baghdad, as they try to stop the spiraling sectarian killings.

An Extended Mission

Before Colonel Norris's unit arrived in Baghdad, his mechanized infantry battalion, the Fourth Battalion of the 23rd Infantry, was no stranger to Iraq. Its troops had secured Mosul, Tal Afar and Rawa before its yearlong tour of duty was extended by commanders eager to bring reinforcements to Baghdad.

Of his 644 soldiers, 200 had already returned to their home base in Alaska and another 100 were in Kuwait waiting to go home when they were ordered back to Iraq. The extension of the mission entailed hardship and sacrifice. Only one soldier in the battalion has been killed in the line of duty, by a sniper in Baghdad.

After conducting clearing operations in Ghazaliya, Adhamiya and other neighborhoods, the battalion was dispatched to the Baya district. They had worked well with Iraqi security forces and hoped for more of the same in their new sector.

The murder scene Colonel Norris stumbled upon on Oct. 1, the unit's first day in Baya, was a rude introduction to much tougher problems ahead. Although the battalion did not know it at the time, that same day 22 Iraqis were accosted at a Sunni-owned meat-packing plant. According to some witnesses, the assailants wore woodlawn-pattern camouflage uniforms and carried Glock pistols, which are customarily used by the National Police. They checked identity documents to separate the Sunnis from the Shiites. The Sunnis were blindfolded, thrown into meat trucks and driven off. Seven were shot and six of them died.

American military officers suspect the attack was instigated by the Shiite militia the Mahdi Army of Moktada al-Sadr, with the active or tacit support of the Second Battalion of the Eighth Brigade of the National Police. “The statistics indicate that they were doing nothing to support security,” Colonel Norris said, referring to the police unit. “They were either responsible for the murders or were allowing them to happen.”

The assault set off an uproar in the neighborhood. The next day a group of Sunnis lobbed four mortar shells and fired machine guns at a National Police checkpoint. That was followed by an angry demonstration. The very policemen who were supposed to help the Americans keep the lid on the sectarian strife in Baya had stoked old animosities.

Faced with a deteriorating security situation, Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, the commander of the Fourth Infantry Division and the senior American commander in Baghdad, recommended that the National Police unit be withdrawn and retrained. On his second day in his new sector, Colonel Norris had the delicate task of informing the unit that it was relieved of its duties.

He said he expected that the police would be replaced by an Iraq Army unit, a move he hoped would be more acceptable to residents. But Iraqi soldiers were in short supply. He was informed that the new force would be another unit of the National Police. That posed a huge challenge, since the National Police had lost the trust of the Sunnis in the Baya area.

A Web of Police Forces

The Americans finally received some good news when they learned that the new National Police unit they would be working with was led by Col. Ali Ibrahim Daboun, a commander they knew from Ghazaliya. He impressed them when he provided a tip about two teenagers involved in transporting triggering devices for bombs, setting up a joint American and Iraqi raid in which they were apprehended.

But in the balkanized network of Iraqi law enforcement Colonel Ali was in charge of one of three police units in the area. The key was to weld the disparate police forces in the neighborhood into an effective force and rebuild public confidence in their work. This was no small problem because Sunni residents had continued to shoot at the National Police, killing one of Colonel Ali’s officers and wounding several others.

To encourage cooperation, Colonel Norris organized a meeting of tribal sheiks and neighborhood leaders. He did not tell the local officials that the police would be there for fear that would scare them away. At the meeting, Sunni representatives railed against the police for failing to stop Shiite militia attacks or protect residents when notices were posted on their door warning them to flee or be killed.

Colonel Norris told the officials their complaints were justified. But he added that there was a new team in town and it wanted to make a fresh start. The neighborhood representatives were stunned. They did not know that the old police unit had been replaced.

Seeking to win over the representatives, Colonel Ali took the floor. He declared boldly that he was not a Shiite or a Sunni but an Iraqi and would enforce the law in an evenhanded way. With so many men running around in uniforms and renegade militias running rife, one participant asked how the citizens could tell the good policemen from the ones that meant them harm.

Colonel Ali offered advice that said a great deal about the long road ahead before Iraq’s forces can assume the main burden of protecting the country. If an Iraqi policeman comes to your door, he advised, you should not open it unless he is accompanied by an American soldier.

An Act of Charity

Colonel Norris said more local people had offered tips to the Americans and their Iraqi partners because residents had come to believe that the Americans wanted to help. New threats to the police from local militias, who used to count on their cooperation, are another indication of progress, he said.

But the American officials say it is clear that the Iraqi forces vitally depend on the Americans for backup. “They are extremely vulnerable,” Colonel Norris said of the Iraqi police. “The majority of force protection is provided by coalition forces.”

None of the improvements helped Latif Abdul Kathum Hilal Janabi, the owner of a cellphone shop and a member of a prominent Sunni tribe, who was killed by assailants when he resisted a kidnapping.

One of the assailants was killed and the other wounded by a guard from a nearby mosque. The wounded gunman was taken to a hospital but disappeared in the medical system. One policeman said he had heard that the assailant had been moved by his confederates to a hospital in Sadr City so he would be beyond the reach of the American-led coalition forces.

Capt. Matthew Albertus, the 30-year-old commander of Company A, was able to perform an act of charity. As he was leaving a police station, he spied the distressed wife of the murder victim who was waiting at the gate, the very picture of frustration. She had come to plead for help in getting the necessary paperwork to secure the release of her husband’s body from the morgue for burial, and it was not clear when she was going to get it.

Captain Albertus took matters into his own hands. He told the local police chief to get the documents, drove with him to the hospital in his armored vehicle and then insisted that the morgue take action. The murdered man’s wife sobbed as the body was placed in a simple plywood coffin. His father tried to choke back his tears. Then the coffin was tied to the roof of a Chevrolet Caprice.

Even hospitals can be dangerous places these days because militias know they are gathering places for relatives. So Captain Albertus formed a convoy around the car and then drove through Baghdad so the grieving relatives could make their way through the city streets and checkpoints. Nobody could stop the men who took Mr. Janabi's life, but the Americans provided the final escort.

U.K. Official: Iraqi Army 'Coming Along' (AP)

By Jill Lawless

AP, October 22, 2006

Iraqi police and military should be ready to take on much of the work being done by U.S.-led forces within a year, a British government minister said Saturday.

Another governing-party lawmaker, however, warned it was unlikely Iraq could remain a single, united country once U.S. and British troops pull out.

"The Iraqi army is coming along very well," Foreign Office Minister Kim Howells told British Broadcasting Corp. radio. "I would have thought that certainly in a year or so there will be adequately trained Iraqi soldiers and security forces — policemen and women and so on — in order to do the job," Howells added.

"I would be very surprised if there was not that kind of capacity taking on a lot of the work done by the coalition forces."

However, Howells warned "it's going to take a lot of blood yet" before Iraq becomes a stable democracy.

British officials have spoken in recent months of cutting their troop levels in Iraq from 7,000 to between 3,000 and 4,000 by mid-2007, but no firm date for withdrawal has been set.

Prime Minister Tony Blair has been under growing pressure to set a timetable for a pullout. Last week, the country's top soldier Gen. Richard Dannatt called for British troops to be withdrawn "sometime soon" and said their presence was provoking rather than preventing violence.

Blair said this week that it would be a "gross dereliction of our duty" to withdraw before Iraqi forces were able to take responsibility for security.

Labour Party lawmaker Doug Henderson, a former defense minister, said in comments reported Saturday that Iraq would probably break into at least three countries — Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish — once allied troops have withdrawn.

"I doubt if Iraq can be retained as one nation in the future," Henderson told GMTV television in an interview to be broadcast Sunday. "I hope it can be, but I think it's very unlikely that that will be the case."

Excerpts from the interview were released late Saturday by the broadcaster.

Bush Sticks To Mission: U.S. Victory (WT)

By Joseph Curl, The Washington Times

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

President Bush yesterday acknowledged that U.S. commanders are changing tactics in Iraq nearly every day but declared that the mission "is clear and unchanging."

"Our goal," he said, "is victory."

The president's remarks aired in his weekly radio address as he met to discuss the situation in Iraq with top generals and other advisers at the White House.

Later, a senior State Department official said in an interview with an Arab television network that the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq.

Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, told Al Jazeera that Washington was ready to talk with any group except al Qaeda in Iraq to bring about national reconciliation.

"We are open to dialogue, because we all know that, at the end of the day, the solution to the hell and the killings in Iraq is linked to an effective Iraqi national reconciliation," Mr. Fernandez said, speaking in Arabic from Washington.

But Mr. Bush indicated little intention to make major changes, although the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq so far this month climbed to 78 -- the highest monthly tally this year -- and despite reports that the White House is nearing a dramatic shift in war strategy.

"What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal," the president said in his radio address. "Our commanders on the ground are constantly adjusting their approach to stay ahead of the enemy, particularly in Baghdad."

Mr. Bush vehemently rejected pulling U.S. troops out of Iraq.

"There is one thing we will not do: We will not pull our troops off the battlefield before the mission is complete," he said. "There are some in Washington who argue that retreating from Iraq would make us safer. I disagree."

Mr. Fernandez, in the Al Jazeera interview, said there was room for criticism of the war "because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq."

Political pressure is growing for the president to make a decisive change to his war strategy, and Democratic candidates nationwide have campaigned on a theme of change.

Democratic congressional candidate Diane Farrell, of Connecticut, yesterday said Mr. Bush should fire Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld. She said Congress should set clear benchmarks for Iraqis that, when met, would allow U.S. troops to leave the country.

"We need a new direction in Iraq," said Mrs. Farrell, who delivered her party's weekly radio address. "To be blunt, the president and the Republican Congress have been wrong on Iraq and wrong to keep their failed strategy."

Meanwhile in Iraq, a dozen mortar rounds rained down yesterday on an outdoor market in Mahmoudiyah crowded with shoppers, killing at least 18.

Earlier, gunfights broke out in Hamza al Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shi'ite political party. At least two persons were killed and four injured.

As the violence continued in Iraq -- including the deaths yesterday of three U.S. Marines -- the president met with top commanders and national security advisers.

The 90-minute meeting brought together Mr. Rumsfeld; Joint Chiefs Chairman Gen. Peter Pace; Gen. John Abizaid, the top U.S. commander in the Middle East; National Security Adviser Stephen J. Hadley and others. Participating by videoconference were Vice President Dick Cheney; Gen. George Casey, who heads the U.S.-led forces in Iraq; and Zalmay Khalilzad, U.S. ambassador to Iraq.

Polls nationwide indicate Republicans are in jeopardy in the Nov. 7 elections of losing their majority in Congress, which they have held since 1994. Democrats need to net 15 seats to win control of the House, and six seats to take the Senate.

With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG), headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months.

Under a partition plan, Iraq would be divided into Sunni, Shi'ite and Kurdish regions, each enjoying near-autonomy, with a central government handling defense, foreign policy and oil production.

Mr. Bush sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, "who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists."

Fellow Republicans are beginning to criticize Mr. Bush's policy.

Senate Armed Services Committee Chairman John W. Warner of Virginia said after a recent visit to Iraq that U.S. efforts are "drifting sideways." Other Senate leaders, including Sens. Chuck Hagel of Nebraska, Susan Collins and Olympia J. Snowe of Maine and Kay Bailey Hutchison of Texas, have been critical of Mr. Bush's "stay the course" policy.

Almost two-thirds of respondents in a Newsweek poll released yesterday said the United States is losing ground in efforts to establish security and democracy in Iraq.

White House spokesman Tony Snow said Friday that while Mr. Bush might change tactics, he would not change his overall strategy.

"He's not somebody who gets jumpy at polls," Mr. Snow said.

Precarious Cease-Fire In Amara Holds (NYT)

By John F. Burns

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 — Iraqi troops patrolled a tense cease-fire in the southeastern city of Amara on Saturday, but scattered clashes between rival Shiite militias farther north raised new concerns about the potential for a widening of the chaos that shook the city the day before.

With 2,300 Iraqi troops rushed to Amara from Baghdad and the southern oil hub of Basra, the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki appeared to have regained control of the city from the gangs of militiamen who ruled the streets there for most of Friday. Local officials said that at least 25 people had been killed, including militiamen and police officers, and more than 160 others wounded.

A government spokesman said senior officials dispatched from Baghdad were investigating the Friday upheaval and were working with tribal leaders and representatives of the rival militia groups on ways of reinforcing the truce, including steps to address the grievances that had caused the clashes.

"All the shops are open, and there are traffic jams in the streets," said Muhannad al-Gharawi, a government spokesman in the city.

He said government troops were being helped by police commandos, also drafted into the city after the local police headquarters and two other police stations were destroyed Friday by bombs set by fighters from the Mahdi Army, the pervasive militia force led by Moktada al-Sadr, a volatile cleric with a mass following among impoverished Shiites.

Government officials said Saturday that Mr. Sadr played a crucial role in calming Friday's violence, and that Mr. Sadr's representatives in the city were cooperating in talks aimed at avoiding a resumption.

But there were other indications that the Amara crisis was far from over, and that the Maliki government, led by Shiite groups that include both Mr. Sadr's political faction and the political leaders who control the Badr Organization, the other militia group involved in the Friday clashes, was concerned that the violence could resume and spread elsewhere in the Shiite homeland in southern Iraq.

The concern appeared to be shared by coalition military commanders, who moved a 600-man British battle group to the outskirts of Amara, 230 miles southeast of Baghdad, and ordered the group to stand ready to move into the city if Iraqi commanders requested reinforcements.

"The situation is calm, but it's very tense," Maj. Charlie Burbridge, a spokesman for the British forces in Basra, told Agence France-Presse.

British troops had maintained a garrison at a major base on Amara's western outskirts until August, when they were withdrawn as part of a wider handover to Iraqi forces across the south.

Major Burbridge added, "We suspect there is a capacity for it to brew up again without any warning."

The first signs that the violence between the Mahdi Army and the Badr Organization had spread beyond Amara came in reports of clashes in two other southern towns. The police in Suweira, a mainly Shiite town 35 miles southeast of Baghdad, said two Mahdi Army fighters and one civilian had been killed in clashes between the militias in the town on Saturday.

In Hamza al-Sharqi, a town about 80 miles south of Baghdad, the police said American troops had intervened to restore calm after the Mahdi Army was accused of planting a bomb on Friday night in the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the political group that controls the Badr Organization. Local officials said two people were killed in a gunfight between American troops and militiamen that followed the bombing.

A senior official of the Maliki government in Baghdad sought to play down the wider significance of the Amara clashes, saying the violence, involving two militia groups whose political masters are important partners in the ruling coalition, had local causes and posed no threat to the government's survival.

Accounts given by local leaders and others in Amara said that the violence began after a Mahdi Army bombing that killed a top Badr official serving in the local police, and that the Badr group retaliated by kidnapping the brother of the top Mahdi Army commander in Amara. The police in Amara, the accounts said, ware under Badr control, and became the target of Mahdi Army reprisals.

"It was a case of a local commander taking the law into his own hands," the official said, insisting that he not be quoted by name because of the political sensitivities involved and because of his own involvement in talks with Mr. Sadr. He said Mr. Sadr, based in the Shiite holy city of Najaf, had "behaved very responsibly" by sending a representative to Amara to help quell the violence.

The Amara upheaval erupted less than 48 hours after Mr. Maliki flew to Najaf from Baghdad to see Mr. Sadr and Grand Ayatollah Ali al-Sistani, Iraq's most powerful Shiite cleric, and urged both men to rein in the Mahdi Army, which American commanders have identified as having been responsible for much of the sectarian killing in recent months.

American commanders have been pressing the Maliki government for clearance for a broad crackdown on the Mahdi Army and other sectarian militias, but Mr. Maliki, dependent on the Sadr faction in Parliament for his government's survival, has insisted that the problem of the militias be solved politically. The senior official who discussed the Amara developments said Mr. Maliki, on his Najaf trip, had been assured by Mr. Sadr that the Mahdi Army was not involved in killings.

"The prime minister asked him to disband and disarm" the Mahdi Army, the official said, and Mr. Sadr had responded by offering assurances that the militia, which challenged American troops in two uprisings in 2004, had been transformed into "a political army that was not allowed to take any violent actions against Sunnis." The official, speaking of the Sadr militiamen, said, "I think they are tamable."

The American military command said that three marines were killed in action on Saturday in Anbar Province, bringing to 78 the number of Americans who have died in October. The toll for the first three weeks of the month, if sustained at similar levels for the last 10 days, would make October the third worst month of the war for American troops.

Elsewhere in Iraq on Saturday, the sectarian violence that has wracked the country continued. In Baghdad, a suicide bomber detonated his device aboard a minibus packed with shoppers who had been to the Shorja market in northern section of the city to buy food and other gifts for the Muslim festival of Id al-Fitr, celebrating the end of the holy month of Ramadan. An Interior Ministry official said four people had been killed and 15 wounded; the victims were mostly Shiites, and women and children were among the casualties.

Witnesses described children's toys scattered beside the wreckage of the bus, which was crossing the Sharafiya bridge over the Tigris River when the bomb exploded.

At dusk on Saturday, bombs left on five motorcycles parked at the main market in Mahmudiya, 15 miles south of Baghdad, exploded while the area was packed with shoppers.

Officials at one of Baghdad's main hospitals said that a total of 16 people were killed and 60 wounded. Police officials in the town said some of the casualties were caused when the market was hit by mortar fire as rescue teams moved in to help the bombing victims.

In the northern oil city of Kirkuk, the police said a policeman had been killed when gunmen attacked his vehicle, and said a similar attack had taken place at Hawija, 40 miles south of Kirkuk, killing two Iraqi soldiers. In Mosul, a roadside bomb wounded two police officers and a woman in a market, police officials there said. Kirkuk and Mosul have been the scenes of suicide bombings in recent days, some of the worst violence there in months.

The United States military command said American-led forces had killed a senior leader of Al Qaeda during a raid early on Saturday in the insurgent stronghold of Ramadi in Anbar Province, 80 miles west of Baghdad. A command statement said that the raid also resulted in the detention of seven others, including a man that the statement said was believed to be responsible for coordinating the supply of weapons and finances for foreign-born insurgents infiltrating Iraq, as well as "facilitating the movement of explosives and participating in multiple operations against Iraqi and coalition forces."

In Baghdad, the American ambassador, Zalmay Khalilzad, issued a statement hailing a meeting on Friday in Mecca where 29 Iraqi religious leaders representing different sects, including figures from the Sunni and Shiite communities, signed a pact urging Iraqis to end sectarian killing and "join ranks with a view to the independence of Iraq and its territorial integrity."

Mortar Attack Kills 32 In Mostly Shiite Iraqi City (WP)

U.S. Toll for Month Is Highest in a Year

BAGHDAD, Oct. 21 -- Mortar rounds fired by suspected Sunni Arab insurgents rained on a market crowded with shoppers Saturday, killing 32 Iraqis in a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad, hospital officials said.

Three Marines were killed in attacks in the western province of Anbar, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in a year. Seventy-eight American troops have died this month in Iraq, the highest monthly toll since 84 U.S. troops were killed in November 2005.

The deaths are part of rising violence that has pushed attacks on Iraqi civilians and troops to wartime highs. The U.S. military said this week that attacks on American forces had increased 22 percent this month.

The attack on the market in Mahmudiyah, about 15 miles south of Baghdad, came days before the Islamic holiday of Eid al-Fitr. The market was crowded with families buying food for the holiday, said Farhan Ali, a member of Mahmudiyah's City Council.

Members of the Mahdi Army, the powerful militia of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr, also were in the open-air market when the attack occurred, said Salih Mohammed, 33, who owns a food stand there. Several of the militiamen were among the dead, Mohammed said.

At least 53 people were wounded, said Abdul Abdul Rahman Khalid al Maadihi, a doctor.

A previously unknown Sunni insurgent group in Mahmudiyah, calling itself the Jihadist Soldiers, asserted responsibility for the assault, saying in a statement posted in a mosque in the center of the city that Shiite families and the Mahdi Army militia had a week to leave the city.

Sunni families hid in their homes after the attack, fearing retaliation, Mohammed said.

At least 21 other Iraqis died Saturday in attacks across the country, including seven people killed in a bus bombing in Baghdad.

The unrelenting bloodshed came despite the signing of an accord by Sunni and Shiite religious leaders late Friday in Mecca, Islam's holiest city. Organizers of the meeting described it as an effort to stop sectarian killings. U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad issued a statement welcoming the accord and urging Iraqis to do "everything possible to stop the killing of the innocent."

Meanwhile, a senior State Department official said the United States had shown "arrogance" and "stupidity" in Iraq. Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department, also said the United States would talk with any group except al-Qaeda in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation.

"We tried to do our best, but I think there is much room for criticism because, undoubtedly, there was arrogance and there was stupidity from the United States in Iraq," he said in an interview with al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday.

Mortar Rounds Hit Iraqi Market; 18 Dead (SFC/AP)

By Sinan Salaheddin

San Francisco Chronicle/AP, October 22, 2006

(10-21) 10:38 PDT BAGHDAD, Iraq (AP) --

A bomb rigged to a bicycle followed by a dozen mortars tore through a crowded outdoor market south of Baghdad on Saturday, killing at least 18 people, police said.

After the bicycle exploded, at least a dozen mortars rained down on the market in Mahmoudiyah, which was crowded with shoppers ahead of the upcoming Eid al-Fitr holiday, said army Capt. Oday Abdul Ridha. Such dual attacks are frequently employed by armed groups to inflict additional damage on crowds that form after the initial bombing.

Lt. Hayder Satar of the Mahmoudiyah police said 18 people were confirmed dead and 52 injured in the attack on the city about 20 miles south of Baghdad.

Earlier in the day, gunfights broke out in Hamza al-Gharbi, about 60 miles south of Baghdad, after a bomb exploded near the offices of the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, a leading Shiite political party that sponsors the Badr Brigades militia.

The party's supporters accused members of the Madhi Army headed by the radical anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr of being behind the blast, Police Capt. Muthana Khalid Ali said. He said Iraqi army and police called for reinforcements and backup from American forces, who imposed a curfew. There was no immediate confirmation of U.S. involvement from a military spokesmen.

Father south in the city of Amarah, where the Mahdi Army briefly took control on Friday, shops and government offices reopened and Iraqi army units manned checkpoints, keeping the militia fighters off the streets.

The fighting in both cities underscored alarm about the growing influence of the Shiite militias, who are linked to political blocs wielding strong influence over the shaky four-month-old government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

At least two people were killed in Hamza al-Gharbi and 25 in Amarah, a city of 750,000 people at the head of Iraq's famous marshlands.

Haider Ali Abdullah said he rushed to reopen his tiny restaurant after hearing that fighting had ended in Amarah.

"We were terrified," Abdullah said by phone. "The last two days had a major effect on our lives since we depend on this business to make a living."

U.S. forces said they killed a key coordinator of foreign fighters under al-Qaida in Iraq in an early morning raid in Ramadi, on a booby-trapped building in the heartland of the Sunni insurgency west of Baghdad.

It said the man, who was not identified by name, had been a senior leader of al-Qaida in Iraq responsible for providing weapons and financing to foreign fighters in the country, as well as producing and distributing video clips and other propaganda.

Iraq's main Sunni Arab party on Saturday strongly backed the accord signed between Sunni and Shiite religious figures in Islam's holiest city, Mecca, on Friday evening.

Organizers of the Mecca meeting say they aim only to stop sectarian killings between rival Sunnis and Shiites, rather than impose a truce to halt attacks against U.S. forces in the country.

"We praise this step and call upon all Iraqis and the government to respond to this blessed event and support it," said Adnan al-Dulaimi, the head of the Iraqi Accordance Front, whose party holds 44 seats in the 275-member parliament.

He also called for a cease-fire between American forces and insurgent groups during the upcoming Eid al-Fitr holiday that marks the end of the fasting month of Ramadan.

Al-Dulaimi's endorsement was echoed by U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad, who issued a statement urging Iraqis to do "everything possible to stop the killing of the innocent."

The Shiite Fadhila party, a member of al-Maliki's ruling alliance, also organized a rally in support of the agreement, attended by about 2,000 people who chanted "no to terrorism, yes to the Mecca edict," and "stop the bloodshed."

Sectarian differences were exacerbated when parliament adopted a Shiite-backed law this week allowing provinces in the Shiite and oil-rich south to establish an autonomous region like the Kurdish one in the north.

Sunni Arabs and some Shiites opposed the law, arguing that federalism would lead to the eventual breakup of Iraq.

President Bush was meeting Saturday with top military officials over refining tactics after commanders said the two-month-old campaign to stabilize Baghdad had largely failed.

"The last few weeks have been rough for our troops in Iraq, and for the Iraqi people," Bush said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "The fighting is difficult, but our nation has seen difficult fights before."

In addition to the market bombing, at least 21 people were killed in violence around the country, including seven who died in a suicide bombing on a Baghdad bus and four killed in clashes Friday between Shiite and Sunni tribes just south of Baghdad. Five tortured bodies were found dumped along roads or in the Tigris River.

Insurgents Kill 3 U.S. Troops In Iraq (LAT)

By Borzou Daragahi

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

So far this month, 78 have died, the most in nearly a year.

An insurgent attack in western Iraq killed three Marines on Saturday, the U.S. military said in a news release, disclosing no further details about the incident.

The latest deaths bring to 78 the number of U.S. military personnel killed in Iraq so far this month, making it the deadliest month for Americans in nearly a year.

Anti-American insurgents have launched a bombing and shooting campaign that has in part coincided with Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, as well as the midterm U.S. election and a more active American military presence in Baghdad and other areas.

On Friday, a roadside bomb near the southern city of Diwaniya killed a Salvadoran army captain and injured four of his fellow soldiers, according to news agencies.

At least five Salvadoran soldiers have been killed in Iraq since the conflict started.

Three soldiers from El Salvador, Denmark and Britain have died in Iraq this month.

At least 2,791 American military personnel, 119 British troops and 119 soldiers from other countries have died in Iraq since the March 2003 U.S.-led invasion.

In addition to an increase in deaths, more than 1,300 U.S. military personnel have been wounded in action since Sept. 1.

This total compares with about 1,100 for July and August, according to Pentagon figures compiled by icasualties.org, a website that tracks coalition casualty figures in Iraq and Afghanistan.

In A Land Without Order, Punishment Is Power (WP)

Conflicts Among Shiites Challenge a Village Sheik in Southern Iraq

YUSUFAN, Iraq -- A year or so ago, just one poster adorned Sheik Adnan Aidani's wall. It was a portrait of Grand Ayatollah Ali Sistani, Iraq's faded but still preeminent cleric, whose stern visage glared down on visitors to the tribal sheik's house along a forest of date palms in the southern Iraqi countryside. Today, there are perhaps a dozen posters with new faces. The names blur, but together they represent the power, beyond appeal, of men with guns.

Aidani smiled, a little sheepishly, as he surveyed the posters. Gifts, he called them, the kind you don't return.

"Everyone's on his own," he explained.

Far from the killing fields of the capital, Baghdad, and a half-hour drive from the southern city of Basra, which has been racked by thousands of assassinations, Aidani has an unenviable task in his warren of mud brick, cinder block and concrete: keeping order in a land without it, where society is fracturing, crumbling, even disintegrating.

The brutality of today's Iraq has washed over his largely Shiite village of 4,000: In the past few months, 10 people have been killed in Yusufan. Among them were a mother and child. "Who knows?" he said when asked the reason. In Basra, and even more in Baghdad, governments are sources of gossip rather than confidence. The police, who he said never set foot here, are best at taking bribes.

There is a saying in southern Iraq today, "No one pays respect to the saint who won't mete out punishment." Violence is the cadence of the country. To navigate the chaos, Aidani tries to draw on centuries-old traditions honed by Bedouins in the desert, rules built on honor, respect and reciprocity. He relies on the intimacy of a village where every neighbor knows the other. But in the end, the threat of punishment secures respect for Aidani. That same threat gives power to militias, gangs and criminals who now hold sway even in the streets of a village like Yusufan.

A division of Iraq is sometimes offered as a way to end the country's sectarian strife, but that glosses over the bitter and bloody fights that torment Basra and other predominantly Shiite regions in the south. With fewer sectarian fault lines, there is less killing in Basra than in Baghdad; residents, a little bitterly, insist it is just more organized, as the various Shiite factions battle for money and power. And the sheik, now more than ever, finds himself buffeted by the building squall.

"Who knows?" he asked again, almost rhetorically.

"These days, life is like a jungle. A rabbit doesn't survive in a jungle. Only a lion does."

He turned more literal. Anarchy, the sheik said. "Actually, it's a little worse than anarchy."A Judge of the Streets

It was Ramadan, the sacred month when Muslims fast from sunrise to sunset. Forgoing tea, cigarettes and food had darkened the sheik's mood. So had the news he received that morning. Four days earlier, gunmen had attacked six Shiite Muslims from his village at a bakery on the outskirts of Baghdad. Sitar Yusuf Zaalan, his three sons and two nephews survived the initial assault, only to be killed when the gunmen returned a little later and, from their car, tossed a bomb inside the bakery.

They weren't even that devout, he said. "They were just Shiites by name, just by their identity card."

He shook his head. "No one asks any questions about the crimes."

Aidani is 52, father of 12 children born to two wives, and sheik for two years with a genealogy that traces back 33 generations. He still sometimes carries the bearing of his days as an employee at the South Oil Co. in Basra: an understated delivery and a bureaucrat's weary patience. Other times, his voice thunders. His writ stretches, with varying influence, through the village, which sits along the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates known as the Shatt al Arab, in a region famed for poets and dates.

On this morning, as on others, the sheik negotiated disputes he estimates have increased 200 percent over the past year, from the frivolous to the serious. There was the story of the mouse. It scurried into a neighbor's home, frightening a girl. Her family demanded arbitration and, to keep the peace, the other family agreed to pay compensation. Days later, her family saw the neighbor's mouse again. They killed it. "That mouse was ours," the sheik recalled the neighbors arguing. And, this time, they demanded compensation.

"I have one even funnier than that," the sheik said.

A driver killed a chicken on the road. Without making excuses, he said he was willing to pay the price of the chicken.

"It's not the chicken that's the problem," the sheik recalled its owner arguing. "The problem is with its orphans."

"And what about the rooster?" he recalled another person asking.

That dispute was settled with $20.

"People around Basra are not afraid of anything," said Sayyid Suleiman al-Musawi, another tribal leader who was visiting the sheik. Tall, with a black head scarf, he had a sense of irony. "If there's a problem, they go straight to their house and get the gun."

The week before, he recalled, there was an argument at a fruit stand near Yusufan. A customer insisted the vendor cut open the watermelon before he bought it. It was still white inside, and he declared that it was not yet ripe. No, it's red, the vendor insisted. They argued, the customer left and then returned with 30 men. Musawi said a gunfight erupted. Unbelievably, no one was killed.

"Thirty guns because a watermelon wasn't ripe," Musawi said ruefully.

"In Iraq, our blood is very hot," he added. "No one speaks slowly here."

The sheik and Musawi lamented the chaos, each complaint growing in exasperation. Their anger was directed everywhere -- at Shiite militias whose men often wear police uniforms, at a national government beholden to Americans and sharing power with Sunni politicians "building car bombs in their houses," at their own people, who they maintained don't understand the word hesitation, and at Sunnis who, the sheik insisted with wide eyes, cannot sleep with their wives as long as Shiites are in power.

"You cannot rule people without a big stick," Musawi insisted. "No one cares anymore, because no one is punished."

Still gloomy, the sheik shrugged his shoulders. Optimistic?

"With all this killing in the streets?" he asked. "Every day is worse than the day before."Fragmented Authority

The posters on the sheik's wall represent the forces in Basra and his region -- the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, the splintered Dawa party and the Mahdi Army of Moqtada al-Sadr, whose followers regularly attack British troops patrolling Basra. As it has for years now, often still functioning as a clandestine force, the Supreme Council focuses on the instruments of government power -- the police, provincial council and intelligence service in Basra. Sadr and his unruly force have the streets.

But even the Sadrists are divided. The Mahdi Army is perhaps the most powerful in places like Basra and Nasiriyah. But it contends with breakaway factions -- Fadhila, whose representative serves as Basra's governor; followers loyal to Mahmoud Hassani; and another group known as the Movement of Rebels of the Intifada. They sometimes cooperate, more often not.

In all, residents estimate there are about 19 Islamic parties in the region around Basra, each with armed followers.

"Each head of the militia is his own dictator. This is the reality," said Sayyid Abdel-Aal al-Musawi, a 46-year-old cleric whose father heads an influential but apolitical Shiite sect known as the Shaikhiya. "They don't adhere to any limits."

In Basra, anywhere from a few to two dozen people are killed on most days -- clerics, former Baathists, Sunni Muslims, rivals and many for reasons no one quite understands. The same goes for Yusufan. The sheik listed those killed: an official with the Ministry of Health who was kidnapped and whose body was found in a Sadrist stronghold; a fruit vendor; a cattle salesman suspected of being a Baathist. A little while ago, a lawyer was shot in the leg from a passing car. The gunmen got out and then shot him in the head.

"People are cheap," the sheik said. "After they kill, they walk with their weapons back to the police station."

"No one will ask anything," he added.

There is no real government in Yusufan, bisected by a canal overgrown with weeds and overrun with trash.

The sheik has his authority, backed by what he says are the hundreds of armed men he can cull from the tribe's 12,000 members. But in a sign of his curtailed reach, he twice failed to get elected to parliament, and villagers sometimes treat him as just another player.

Militiamen rarely roam with their weapons through the narrow dirt roads bordered by dried palm fronds, cattails, bougainvillea and fields of clover. But everyone knows who they are, and their graffiti clutter the walls. "Long live Moqtada," one slogan reads. "All of us will sacrifice to defend Sadr," another declares. In green is written, "Yes, yes to Islam." Next to it in blue, a little out of place, is scrawled, "Long live Real," a show of support for the Spanish soccer team Real Madrid.

Authority, in a way, has atomized. Few go out after dark, when many feel militias are most active. Police never enter, so to protect religious celebrations at the Hajji Ahmed Husseiniya, a local worship hall, neighbors gather a dozen youths with their guns and post them at each end of the street.

When trouble arises, villagers say, they try to settle it themselves, then go the sheik, representatives of the Islamic parties or the town's part-time cleric. (Another alternative: "I'd run away," said Jalal Abdel-Amir, a 27-year-old villager.) Usually, they keep to themselves. With violence endemic, it is often heard that if it's not your neighbor, friend or family killed, you keep quiet.

"You can say that the people protect themselves," said Shihab Ahmed Allawi, a 35-year-old construction worker.

Down the street, a little way from the trash-strewn banks of the eddying Shatt al Arab, Kifah Mahmoud, a 47-year-old grocer, stood in a store adorned with portraits of Shiite clerics and named after the sword of a Shiite saint, Dhu al-Fiqar. It takes faith these days, he said. "You can't be sure you'll go somewhere and come back safely. You can't reassure yourself about that."Serial Strife

In his tribal reception hall, near a television hooked to a satellite dish, the drone of the generator outside, Aidani bellowed into his cellphone. "He must bring the gun to us!" he shouted, flashing his more temperamental side.

The dispute had begun simply. The day before, Mahmoud Shaker, a 16-year-old from Aidani's tribe, was riding his bicycle laden with pots for iftar , the traditional meal that breaks the Ramadan fast. Someone cleaning part of a sidewalk sprayed water on him as he rode by. Shaker protested, and the man pulled a gun and pistol-whipped him. The sheik wanted a sit-down with the assailant's tribe.

"They have to be in our place within five days," he told the mediator.

He hung up the phone, his third call in 15 minutes. Each time, the tribe had refused to meet.

"They better come," the sheik said. "If they don't, I'll have something else to hold against them."

He leaned back on a cushion resting against a grimy wall, three fans overhead churning the hot air.

"Problems create problems, one becomes two," he said. "These kinds of things should be dealt with by the law."

A little later, Sheik Fawzi Kaabi entered. Everyone in the room stood. "Take your rest," Aidani said afterward.

Kaabi, a stout man in a head scarf checkered white and black, is 46, but said he should be 460: "Every year has become 10 years because of the problems." Kaabi, called "the judge" by a friend, had come to mediate another dispute.

Men from Aidani's tribe had killed three people from the Abadi, a neighboring tribe, although the circumstances were in dispute. A death these days costs between 20 million and 25 million Iraqi dinars, or $13,300 to $16,600. Each person in the tribe is expected to contribute, effectively an insurance policy. But Aidani was resisting, pleading his case that the neighboring tribe had refused to pay blood money earlier.

"We're on standby," the sheik warned, with the mildest bluster.

He said no more. Everyone understood it meant sending his armed men to settle it another way.

"It's like a serial," the sheik said after Kaabi left. "It never has an ending."

DOJ_NMG_0084654

As he spoke, there was a hint of hesitation, even doubt in his voice. He ran through the conflicts he had to arbitrate: murder, theft, kidnapping, rape, broken contracts, land disputes and on and on. "There's nothing that's not present in Iraq anymore," he said. "Anything you can imagine in your head is here." In each, he had to negotiate, cajole and, more often than not, threaten.

Each time, the stakes seemed to be raised; each refusal drew a bigger warning.

"It wears me out," he admitted.

As he often does, the sheik spoke in proverbs. He uses one frequently these days. It is as much imperative as reality.

" Lil qawi ," he said. "To the strong."

The Selfless And The Dead (LAT)

By Raheem Salman And Doug Smith

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

An Iraqi burial society pays its respects to unclaimed war victims.

Twice a week, the large delivery truck from Baghdad rolls into the vast cemetery in this holy Shiite Muslim city. A bus follows, bearing wooden caskets on its roof.

Half a mile beyond the cemetery gates, at the edge of the desert, the passengers get out of the bus and set to work unloading the truck's grim cargo. On an average trip, there will be 70 to 100 bodies, victims of the sectarian bloodletting that has gripped Iraq.

The men belong to a word-of-mouth burial society for the unclaimed dead, formed during the 1980s war with Iran, starting small and growing with the need. Today, about 500 men — laborers, professionals, clerics and tribal leaders — are members of the legation of the dead in this country where deep piety and terrible brutality have repeatedly intertwined.

The society has no name and no officers. It adheres to no religious sect or political agenda. Thirty to 60 men make each trip. Some go every time; those who have to take time off from work may go only once every few weeks. They pay their own expenses and have rejected government compensation.

"We told them that if there will be money for this work we withdraw, as an act cannot be evaluated with money," said taxi driver Hashim Saadi, 53. "We want the blessing of God only."

Many who belong were drawn to it by their own experiences.

"When I look at them, I feel deeply sad," Saadi said. "Each one of them I see as my son, who was kidnapped five months ago. He was in his last year in the college of economy and administration at Baghdad University. I expect to see his body any time with any group we are bringing."

Mohammed Sabbar, an official with the Iraq Board of Tourism, said he joined the society after his brother disappeared about a year ago and later turned up in the morgue. The family suffered for weeks not knowing his fate.

"I did not go to my work today, preferring to join this act, which is filled with human feelings," Sabbar said. "We feel sad for them. Sometimes I weep. Repeatedly doing this has elicited a sort of acceptance of the sight, but feelings of sadness are still there."

The depth of his commitment is astonishing.

Each two-day trip begins at 4 a.m. after morning prayers. Sabbar walks three-quarters of a mile from the Ur neighborhood of Baghdad to a mosque in Sadr City, where several of the men converge. At the mosque, they pick up two or three caskets, which they tie to the roof of the bus.

The bus drives to the Baghdad morgue, an impersonal building of yellow brick, where other men arrive in their cars.

They load the truck with bodies that have been unclaimed for two weeks — at that point, the morgue has to clear them out to make room new ones.

Leaving Baghdad at 7 a.m., they must traverse Latifiya, an insurgent stronghold and one of the most dangerous places in Iraq. Kidnappings, shootings and roadside bomb attacks occur there almost daily.

The caskets on the bus could be a liability in the Sunni Arab city, giving the impression that the men are Shiites on the road to Najaf. But they also ensure speedier passage through the many checkpoints on the 110-mile highway. Mourning parties are less likely to be stopped for identity checks.

About noon, the bus arrives at the cemetery. The men say their midday prayers before they unload the bodies on stretchers into the desert heat, loudly chanting, "There is no God but God, and Muhammad is the prophet of God." They remove the bodies from black nylon sacks. To each they attach a tag bearing all that is known about the deceased.

Some are headless, some bloated and purple. If the body is too decomposed to wash, the men perform what is called the tayamum, rubbing the face and hands with clean sand, in accordance with Islamic tradition.

They return the body to a sack sprinkled with camphor and pungent leaves. Then they wrap the body with a white cloth. They lower bodies into double graves according to their morgue numbers, odd on one side, even on the other. The graves are marked with flat stones that say "Unclaimed."

"When I look at any one of these victims, we feel that he is my brother or father," said Abu Muntadhar, 44, who receives a government salary to drive one of the delivery trucks but has volunteered for this job. "We cry as if they are our relatives. I imagine how their wives will behave if they see them, or their children."

Caring for the unclaimed began as a charity supported by wealthy residents of Baghdad to provide proper burials for the indigent, said Sheik Mehdi Abdul Zahara, one of about 100 burial brokers who work out of tiny offices at the cemetery. Paid by families of the dead, they acquire plots, hire gravediggers and maintain monuments.

The numbers of dead have grown with each traumatic turn in Iraq's course.

During Saddam Hussein's brutal repression after the failed 1991 Shiite uprising, 30 to 40 bodies arrived each month. After the overthrow of Hussein, the number jumped to 30 a week and kept climbing.

Now, a truck carrying 70 to 100 bodies comes twice a week, and a separate truck carries as many to Karbala, another holy city.

Traditionally, charitable donations paid for burials of the unclaimed. With the increasing numbers, the Health Ministry recently took over. Zahara and his gravediggers do the work for reduced pay.

Bodies go unclaimed mostly because the morgue can't identify them. Relatives may check with police and hospitals or wait for a ransom note, hoping for any information that their loved one is alive. Even when family members go to the morgue, the deteriorated condition of some bodies may give them reason to delay positive identification in the hope that it is someone else.

Zahara does a little detective work of his own, hoping to relieve families of the pain of not knowing.

Once, he received a beheaded man and found an address book in his shoe. He telephoned someone who turned out to be a brother.

"He was afraid, thinking that I was a terrorist or a kidnapper," Zahara said.

The brother called back several times before deciding to trust Zahara. The sibling came at night, accompanied by three carloads of family and friends, who were there to provide support, but also protection in the event of a trap.

"They were too sad for the killing of their son, but at least this put an end to their suffering and searching," Zahara said.

The unofficial leader of the group, Sheik Jamal Soodani, has been going on the burial trips since their outset. He is responsible for the roster of volunteers and attends every journey.

Although he has been accused of having political or sectarian motives, he and other members of the group have no aim but getting closer to God, Soodani said.

"We bury the Sunni, Shiite, Christian, Muslim and non-Iraqi," he said. "We deal with the human being as a human being, regardless of considerations like color and religion."

At the end of each day's work, the men are tired and it is too late to return to Baghdad. They retire instead to a rented two-room house at the edge of the cemetery.

They sleep on mattresses spread across the floor like gravestones. Others sleep on the porch outside — they prefer the fresh air.

An Early Calculation Of Iraq's Cost Of War (NYT)

By Anna Bernasek

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

HERE'S a basic question: What has been the cost of the Iraq war for Iraq? As it turns out, it's not easy to find an economist who can provide an answer. Although several studies have dealt with the war's cost to Americans, there has been no comparable work addressing the cost to Iraqis.

Of course, the loss of human life has always been evident. Recently, the United Nations estimated that 100 Iraqis were dying each day, on average, as a result of the war. Others have put the number much higher. A recent study in The Lancet, the British medical journal, placed the average daily figure at about 500, amounting to the loss of 2 percent of Iraq's population since the invasion in March 2003.

The economic cost has been less visible. Published information on the subject is very limited, although one economist, Colin Rowat, has made some preliminary calculations using the best sources available. Professor Rowat, a specialist on the Iraqi economy at the University of Birmingham in Britain, relied mainly on data from the International Monetary Fund to estimate the war's overall effect on the Iraqi economy. His calculations are a work in progress, but what he has found so far is sobering: the cost amounts to a cut of at least 40 percent in Iraq's national income.

Professor Rowat looked at the six-year stretch from 2000 to 2005 and divided it into thirds. During the first period, 2000-2001, United Nations trade sanctions against Iraq were beginning to crumble; the Security Council lifted the cap on Iraqi oil sales to the rest of the world, and the Iraqi government was becoming adept at getting around the remaining trade restrictions. The second period, 2002 -2003, covers the buildup to war and the invasion itself. The last period, 2004-2005, covers post-invasion years when sanctions were removed.

Professor Rowat made several kinds of calculations. First, he estimated the actual change in the size of Iraq's economy. Then he considered the economic effects of foreign aid in 2005, much of it from the United States. (Because foreign aid is regarded as temporary and is expected to taper off, he said, excluding it reveals Iraq's underlying economic performance.)

Finally, he estimated how the economy might have performed had the war never happened. This last estimate, of course, depends on a host of assumptions, as Professor Rowat would be the first to say. He assumed, for example, that in the absence of war, Iraq's economy would have been driven by the price of oil. Oil prices are, in fact, crucial to Iraq; according to the World Bank, oil revenue represents 60 percent of the total economy. Professor Rowat also assumed that the economy would have grown from 2002 to 2005 as it did from 2000 to 2001 — at a pace equal to 71 percent of the rate of increase in world oil prices. Of course, some of the oil-price increase in recent years must be attributed to the Iraq war itself; Professor Rowat acknowledged this but did not attempt to remove that factor from these rough calculations.

He readily acknowledged the difficulty of coming up with an undisputed set of figures; nevertheless, his analysis is at least a starting point.

Looking first at the actual Iraqi economy, he calculated that it may have grown 3.1 percent a year, on average and after adjusting for inflation, from 2000 through 2005. When he subtracted foreign aid from that total, however, he found that the economy actually contracted 0.2 percent a year over the same period. He said aid was especially crucial in 2005, when it kept the economy afloat.

Finally, based on the steep rise in oil prices, he estimated that without a war and with steady oil production, Iraq would have grown 12 percent a year after adjusting for inflation. That rate would have made Iraq one of the fastest-growing economies in the world, albeit one that was expanding from a very small economic base.

How realistic is this projection? It's hard to say, because so much of it depends on oil economics. Still, the I.M.F. has concluded that the Iraqi economy has the capacity to grow very quickly — under the right conditions. It now forecasts Iraq's real growth over the next five years at an annual rate averaging better than 10 percent.

Using Professor Rowat's calculations, what might the economic cost of the war be for Iraq? If there had been no war, Iraq's economy in 2005 might have amounted to $61 billion in today's dollars, compared with the actual $37 billion, he estimates. That works out to a loss of $24 billion because of the war. Excluding foreign aid from the calculations, the loss estimate is around $30 billion.

Consider the more conservative figure, $24 billion. It amounts to a 40 percent cut in gross domestic product per capita — an average loss of around $900 for each Iraqi in 2005.

Straightforward comparisons with the United States aren't possible, but rough estimates of the war's overall cost to Americans are in the neighborhood of $1 trillion over a 10-year period. That works out to around 1 percent of the nation's income during that period.

FOR Iraq, there is no doubt that continuing violence and turmoil are hurting the economy. The I.M.F. stated in a report in August that Iraq's growth was coming from the non-oil economy and that oil production was expected to remain flat this year. Iraq's oil production has not yet returned to prewar levels. The I.M.F. attributed the lack of progress in the oil sector to the violence, which is preventing much-needed investment, and to infrastructure problems.

While Professor Rowat's calculations represent just one economist's efforts to wrestle with extremely limited data, his work may encourage others to follow. Assessing the war's economic cost for Iraq, of course, doesn't provide an answer to whether the war is worthwhile in the long run. But it does provide a clue.

Poll: Iraqi Youth Want U.S. To Leave (WT/AP)

By Katherine Shrader

The Washington Times/AP, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON (AP) -- Majorities of Iraqi youth in Arab regions of the country believe security would improve and violence decrease if the U.S.-led forces left immediately, according to a State Department poll that provides a window into the grim warnings provided to policymakers.

The survey - unclassified, but marked "For Official Government Use Only" - also finds that Iraqi leaders may face particular difficulty recruiting young Sunni Arabs to join the stumbling security forces. Strong majorities of 15- to 29-year-olds in two Arab Sunni areas - Mosul and Tikrit-Baquba - would oppose joining the Iraqi army or police.

The poll has its shortcomings; regional samples are small and the results do not say how many people refused to respond to questions. The private polling firm hired by the State Department also was not able to interview residents of al-Anbar, a Sunni-dominated province and an insurgent stronghold.

But the findings of the summer survey - circulated to policymakers last month and obtained by The Associated Press last week - nevertheless provide a solemn reminder of the difficulty that the U.S.-backed Iraqi government faces as it tries to add ethnic diversity to its security institutions.

In The Land Of The Taliban (NYT)

By Elizabeth Rubin

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

One afternoon this past summer, I shared a picnic of fresh mangos and plums with Abdul Baqi, an Afghan Taliban fighter in his 20's fresh from the front in Helmand Province in southern Afghanistan. We spent hours on a grassy slope under the tall pines of Murree, a former colonial hill station that is now a popular resort just outside Pakistan's capital, Islamabad. All around us was a Pakistani rendition of Georges Seurat's "Sunday on La Grande Jatte" — middle-class families setting up grills for barbecue, a girl and two boys chasing their errant cow with a stick, two men hunting fowl, boys flying a kite. Much of the time, Abdul Baqi was engrossed in the flight pattern of a Himalayan bird. It must have been a welcome distraction. He had just lost five friends fighting British troops and had seen many others killed or wounded by bombs as they sheltered inside a mosque.

He was now looking forward to taking a logic course at a madrasa, or religious school, near Peshawar during his holiday. Pakistan's religious parties, he told me through an interpreter, would lodge him, as they did other Afghan Taliban fighters, and keep him safe. With us was Abdul Baqi's mentor, Mullah Sadiq, a diabetic Helmandi who was shuttling between Pakistan and Afghanistan auditing Taliban finances and arranging logistics. He had just dispatched nine fighters to Afghanistan and had taken wounded men to a hospital in Islamabad. "I just tell the border guards that they were wounded in a tribal dispute and need treatment," he told me.

And though Mullah Sadiq said they had lost many commanders in battles around Kandahar, he and Abdul Baqi appeared to be in good spirits, laughing and chatting loudly on a cellphone to Taliban friends in Pakistan and Afghanistan. After all, they never imagined that the Taliban would be back so soon or in such force or that they would be giving such trouble to the Afghan government of Hamid Karzai and some 40,000 NATO and U.S. troops in the country. For the first time since the fall of 2001, when the Taliban were overthrown, they were beginning to taste the possibility of victory.

As I traveled through Pakistan and particularly the Pashtun lands bordering Afghanistan, I felt as if I were moving through a Taliban spa for rehabilitation and inspiration. Since 2002, the American and Pakistani militaries have focused on North Waziristan and South Waziristan, two of the seven districts making up Pakistan's semiautonomous tribal areas, which are between the North-West Frontier Province and, to the south, Baluchistan Province; in the days since the 9/11 attacks, some tribes there had sheltered members of Al Qaeda and spawned their own Taliban movement. Meanwhile, in the deserts of Baluchistan, whose capital, Quetta, is just a few hours' drive from the Afghan city of Kandahar, the Afghan Taliban were openly reassembling themselves under Mullah Omar and his leadership council. Quetta had become a kind of free zone where strategies could be formed, funds picked up, interviews given and victories relished.

In June, I was in Quetta as the Taliban fighters celebrated an attack against Dad Mohammad Khan, an Afghan legislator locally known as Amir Dado. Until recently he was the intelligence chief of Helmand Province. He had worked closely with U.S. Special Forces and was despised by Abdul Baqi — and, to be frank, by most Afghans in the south. Mullah Razayar Nurzai (a nom de guerre), a commander of 300 Taliban fighters who frequently meets with the leadership council and Mullah Omar, took credit for the ambush. Because Pakistan's intelligence services are fickle — sometimes supporting the Taliban, sometimes arresting its members — I had to meet Nurzai at night, down a dark lane in a village outside Quetta.

My guide was a Pakistani Pashtun sympathetic to the Taliban; we slipped into a courtyard and behind a curtain into a small room with mattresses and a gas lamp. In hobbled a rough, wild-looking graybeard with green eyes and a prosthetic limb fitted into a permanent 1980's-era shoe. More than a quarter-century of warring had taken its toll on Nurzai's 46-year-old body but not on his spirit. It was 10 at night, yet he was bounding with energy and bombast about his recent exploits in Kandahar and Helmand. A few days earlier, Nurzai and his men had attacked Amir Dado's extended family. First, he told me, they shot dead his brother — a former district leader. Then the next day, as members of Dado's family were driving to the site of the first attack, Nurzai's men ambushed their convoy. Boys, cousins, uncles: all were killed. Dado himself was safe elsewhere. Nurzai was mildly disappointed and said that they had received bad information. He had no regrets about the killings, however. Abdul Baqi was also delighted by the attack. He would tell me that Dado used to burn rocket casings and pour the melted plastic onto the stomachs of onetime Taliban fighters he and his men had captured. Abdul Baqi also recalled that during the civil war that ended with the Taliban's seizure of Kabul, Dado and his men had a checkpoint where they "grabbed young boys and robbed people."

Mullah Omar and his followers formed the Taliban in 1994 to, among other things, bring some justice to Afghanistan and to expel predatory commanders like Dado. But in the early days of Karzai's government, these regional warlords re-established themselves, with American financing, to fill the power vacuum that the coalition forces were unwilling to fill themselves. The warlords freely labeled their many enemies Al Qaeda or Taliban in order to push the Americans to eradicate them. Some of these men were indeed Taliban. Most, like Abdul Baqi, had accepted their loss of power, but they rejoined the Taliban as a result of harassment. Amir Dado's own abuses had eventually led to his removal from the Helmand government at United Nations insistence. As one Western diplomat, who requested anonymity out of personal safety concerns, put it: "Amir Dado kept his own prison, authorized the use of serious torture, had very little respect for human life and made security worse." Yet when I later met Amir Dado in Kabul, he pulled out a letter that an officer in the U.S. Special Forces had written requesting that the Afghan Ministry of Defense install him as Helmand's police chief and claiming that in his absence "the quality of security in the Helmand Province has dramatically declined."

One Place, Two Stories

I went to Afghanistan and Pakistan this summer to understand how and why the Taliban were making a comeback five years after American and Afghan forces drove them from power. What kind of experience would lead Afghans to reject what seemed to be an emerging democratic government? Had we missed something that made Taliban rule appealing? Were they the only opposition the aggrieved could turn to? Or, as many Afghans were saying, was this Pakistan up to its old tricks — cooperating with the Americans and Karzai while conspiring to bring back the Taliban, who had been valued "assets" before 9/11?

And why has the Bush administration's message remained that Afghanistan is a success, Iraq a challenge? "In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld wrote on the op-ed page of The Washington Post earlier this month. Afghanistan's rise from the ashes of the anti-Taliban war would mean that the Bush administration was prevailing in replacing terror with democracy and human rights.

Meanwhile, a counternarrative was emerging, and it belonged to the Taliban, or the A.C.M., as NATO officers call them — the Anti-Coalition Militia. In Kabul, Kandahar and Pakistan, I found their video discs and tapes in the markets. They invoke a nostalgia for the jihad against the Russians and inspire their viewers to rise up again. One begins with clattering Chinooks disgorging American soldiers into the desert. Then we see the new Afghan government onstage, focusing in on the Northern Alliance warlords — Abdul Rashid Dostum, Burhanuddin Rabbani, Karim Khalili, Muhammad Fahim, Ismail Khan, Abdul Sayyaf. It cuts to American soldiers doing push-ups and pinpointing targets on maps; next it shows bombs the size of bathtubs dropping from planes and missiles emblazoned with "Royal Navy" rocketing through the sky; then it moves to hospital beds and wounded children. Message: America and Britain brought back the warlords and bombed your children. In the next clip, there are metal cages under floodlights and men in orange jumpsuits, bowed and crouching. It cuts back to the wild eyes of

John Walker Lindh and shows trucks hauling containers crammed with young Afghan and Pakistani prisoners — Taliban, hundreds of whom would suffocate to death in those containers, supposedly at the command of the warlord and current army chief of staff, General Dostum. Then back to American guards wheeling hunger-striking Guantánamo prisoners on gurneys. Interspliced are older images, a bit fuzzy, of young Afghan men, hands tied behind their backs, heads bowed, hauled off by Communist guards. The message: Foreigners have invaded our lands again; Americans, Russians — no difference.

During the period from 1994 to 2001, the Taliban were a cloistered clique with little interest in global affairs. Today they are far more sophisticated and outward-looking. "The Taliban of the 90's were concerned with their district or province," says Waheed Muzhda, a senior aide at the Supreme Court in Kabul, who before the Taliban fell worked in their Foreign Ministry. "Now they have links with other networks. Before, only two Internet connections existed — one was with Mullah Omar's office and the other at the Foreign Ministry here in Kabul. Now they are connected to the world." Though this is still very much an Afghan insurgency, fueled by complex local grievances and power struggles, the films sold in the markets of Pakistan and Afghanistan merge the Taliban story with that of the larger struggle of the Muslim umma, the global community of Islam: images of U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Israelis dragging off young Palestinian men and throwing off Palestinian mothers clinging to their sons. Humiliation. Oppression. Followed by the same on Afghan soil: Northern Alliance fighters perching their guns atop the bodies of dead Taliban. In the Taliban story, Special Forces soldiers desecrate the bodies of Taliban fighters by burning them, the Koran is desecrated in Guantánamo toilets, the Prophet Muhammad is desecrated in Danish cartoons and finally an apostate, Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who was arrested earlier this year for converting to Christianity, desecrates Islam and is not only not punished but is released and flown off to Italy.

It is not at all clear that Afghans want the return of a Taliban government. But even sophisticated Kabulis told me that they are fed up with the corruption. And in the Pashtun regions, which make up about half the country, Afghans are fed up with five years of having their homes searched and the young men of their villages rounded up in the name of counterinsurgency. Earlier this month in Kabul, Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO's Afghanistan force, imagined what Afghans are thinking: "They will say, 'We do not want the Taliban, but then we would rather have that austere and unpleasant life that that might involve than another five years of fighting.'" He estimated that if NATO didn't succeed in bringing substantial economic development to Afghanistan soon, some 70 percent of Afghans would shift their loyalty to the Taliban.

Nation-Building, Again

In the middle of Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, a metal sign tilts into the road advertising the New York English Language Center. It is a relic of the last American nation-building scheme. Half a century ago, this town, built at the confluence of the Arghandab and Helmand Rivers, was the headquarters for an ambitious dam project partly financed by the United States and contracted out to Morrison-Knudsen, an engineering company that helped build Cape Canaveral and the Golden Gate Bridge.

Lashkar Gah (literally, "the place of soldiers") was to be a model American town. Irrigation from the project would create farms out of the desert. Today you can still see the suburban-style homes with gardens open to the streets, although the typical Afghan home is a fort with walls guarding the family's privacy. Those modernizing dreams of America and Afghanistan were eventually defeated by nature, culture and the war to drive the Russians out of Afghanistan in the 1980's. What remains is an intense nostalgia among the engineers, cooks and farmers of Lashkar Gah, who remember that time as one of employment and peace. Today, Lashkar Gah is home to a NATO base.

Down the road from the base stands a lovely new building erected by an N.G.O. for the local Ministry of Women's Affairs. It is big, white and, on the day I visited, was empty except for three women getting ready to leave. "It's so close to the foreigners, and the women are afraid of getting killed by car bombs," the ministry's deputy told me. She was a school headmistress and landowner, dressed elegantly in a lime-colored blouse falling below the knees and worn over matching trousers. She weighed the Taliban regime against this new one in terms of pragmatic choices, not terror or ideology. She said that she had just wrapped up the case of a girl who had been kidnapped and raped by Kandahari police officers, something that would not have happened under the Taliban. "Their security was outstanding," she said.

Under the Taliban, she said, a poppy ban was enforced. "Now the governors tell the people, 'Just cultivate a little bit,'" she said. "So people take this opportunity and grow a lot." The farmers lease land to grow poppies. The British and the police eradicate it. The farmer can't pay back the landowner. "So instead of paying, he gives the landowner his daughter."

A few weeks before I arrived in Helmand, John Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, told reporters that Afghan authorities were succeeding in reducing opium-poppy cultivation. Yet despite hundreds of millions of dollars being allocated by Congress to stop the trade, a United Nations report in September estimated that this year's crop was breaking all records — 6,100 metric tons compared with 4,100 last year. When I visited Helmand, schools in Lashkar Gah were closed in part because teachers and students were busy harvesting the crop. A prosecutor from the Crimes Department laughed as he told me that his clerk, driver and bodyguard hadn't made it to work. They were all harvesting. It requires a lot of workers, and you can earn $12 a day compared with the $2 you get for wheat. Hence the hundreds of young, poor Talibs from Pakistan's madrasas who had flocked to earn that cash and who made easy converts for the coming jihad.

Walters had singled out Helmand for special praise. Yet just a short drive from the provincial capital, I was surrounded by poppy farmers — 12-year-old boys, 75-year-old men — hard at work, their hands caked in opium paste as they scooped figlike pulp off the bulbs into a sack tied around their waists. One little boy was dragging a long poppy stem attached to a car he had made out of bulbs. Haji Abdul, a 73-year-old Moses of a man, was the owner of the farm and one of those nostalgic for the heyday of the Helmand Valley project. He had worked with Americans for 15 years as a welder and manager. He was the first to bring electricity to his district. Now there was none.

"Why do you think people put mines out for the British and Italians doing eradication when they came here to save us?" He answered his own question: "Thousands of lands ready for harvest were destroyed. How difficult will it be for our people to tolerate that! You are taking the food of my children, cutting my feet and disabling me. With one bullet, I will kill you." Fortunately he didn't have to kill anyone. He had paid 2,000 afghanis per jerib (about a half acre) of land to the police, he told me, adding that they would then share the spoils with the district administrator and all the other Interior Ministry officials so that only a small percentage of the poppy would be eradicated.

When I asked Manan Farahi, the director of counterterrorism efforts for Karzai's government, why the Taliban were so strong in Helmand, he said that Helmandis had, in fact, hated the Taliban because of Mullah Omar's ban on poppy cultivation. "The elders were happy this government was coming and they could plant again," Farahi told me. "But then the warlords came back and let their militias roam freely. They were settling old scores — killing people, stealing their opium. And because they belonged to the government, the people couldn't look to the government for protection. And because they had the ear of the Americans, the people couldn't look to the Americans. Into this need stepped the Taliban." And this time the Taliban, far from suppressing the drug trade, agreed to protect it.

A Dealer's Life

The Continental Guest House in Kandahar, with its lovely gardens, potted geraniums and Internet access in every room, was mostly empty when I arrived, a remnant of the city's recently stalled economic resurgence.

To find out how the opium trade works and how it's related to the Taliban's rise, I spent the afternoon with an Afghan who told me his name was Razzaq. He is a medium-level smuggler in his late 20's who learned his trade as a refugee in Iran. He was wearing a traditional Kandahari bejeweled skull cap, a dark blazer and a white shalwar kameez, a traditional outfit consisting of loose pants covered by a tunic. He moved and spoke with the confident ease of a well-protected man. "The whole country is in our services," he told me, "all the way to Turkey." This wasn't bravado. From Mazar-i-Sharif, in northern Afghanistan, he brings opium in the form of a gooey paste, packaged in bricks. From Badakhshan in the northeast, he brings crystal — a sugary substance made from heroin. And from Jalalabad, in the east on the road to Peshawar, he brings pure heroin. All of this goes through Baramcha, an unmanned border town in Helmand near Pakistan. Sometimes he pays off the national soldiers to use their vehicles, he said. Sometimes the national policemen. Or he hides it well, and if there is a tough checkpoint, he calls ahead and pays them off. "The soldiers get 2,000 afghanis a month, and I give them 100,000," he explained with an angelic smile. "So even if I had a human head in my car, they'd let me go." It's not hard to see why Razzaq is so successful. He has a certain charm and looks like the modest tailor he once was, not a man steeped in illegal business.

Razzaq's smuggling career began in Zahedan, a remote and unruly Iranian town near the border with Afghanistan and Pakistan. It is filled with Afghan refugees who, like Razzaq and his family, fled after the Russian invasion in 1979. Razzaq apprenticed as a tailor under his father and eventually opened his own shop, which the Iranians promptly shut down. They said he had no right as a refugee to own a shop. He began painting buildings, but that, too, proved a bureaucratic challenge. He was paid in checks, and the bank refused to cash them without a bank account, which he could not get.

Razzaq was newly married with dreams of a good life for his family. So one day he took a chance. "I had gotten to know smugglers at my tailoring shop," he told me over a meal of mutton and rice on the floor of my hotel room. "One of them was an old man, so no one ever suspected him. The smugglers asked me to go with him to Gerdi Jangel" — an Afghan refugee town in Pakistan — "and bring back 750 grams of heroin to Zahedan. The security searched us on the bus, but I'd hidden it in the heels of my shoes, and of course they didn't search the old man. I was so happy when we made it back. I thought I was born for the first time into this world."

So he took another chance and managed to fly to Tehran carrying four kilos in his bag. Each time he overcame another obstacle, he became more addicted to the easy cash. When the Iranian authorities imported sniffing dogs to catch heroin smugglers, Razzaq and his friends filled hypodermic needles with some heroin dissolved in water and sprayed the liquid on cars at the bus station that would be continuing on to Tehran, Isfahan and Shiraz. "The dogs at the checkpoint went mad. They had to search 50 cars. They decided the dogs were defective and sent them back, and that saved us for a while." Eventually, he said, they concocted a substance to conceal the heroin smell from the new pack of dogs.

After the fall of the Taliban, Razzaq moved back to Helmand, built a comfortable house and began supporting his extended family with his expanding trafficking business. Razzaq's main challenge today is Iran. While the Americans have turned more or less a blind eye to the drug-trade spree of their warlord allies, Iran has steadily cranked up its drug war. (Some 3,000 Iranian lawmen have been killed in the last three decades battling traffickers.) To cross the desert borders, Razzaq moves in convoys of 18 S.U.V.'s. Some contain drugs. The rest are loaded with food supplies, antiaircraft guns, rocket launchers, antitank missiles and militiamen, often on loan from the Taliban. The fighters are Baluch from Iran and Afghanistan. The commanders are Afghans.

Razzaq's run, as he described it, was a scene out of <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="30657">"Mad Max." Three days were spent dodging and battling Iranian forces in the deserts around the earthquake-stricken city of Bam. Once they made it to Isfahan, however, in central Iran, they were home free. They released the militiamen, transferred the stuff to ordinary cars and drove to Tehran, where other smugglers picked up the drugs and passed them on to ethnic Turks in Tabriz. The Turks would bring them home, and from there they went to the markets of Europe. </object.title>

Should he ever run into a problem in Afghanistan, he told me, "I simply make a phone call. And my voice is known to ministers, of course. They are in my network. Every network has a big man supporting them in the government." The Interior Ministry's director of counternarcotics in Kabul had told me the same thing. Anyway, if the smugglers have problems on the ground, they say, they just pay the Taliban to destroy the enemy commanders.

Razzaq has at times contemplated getting out of the smuggling trade, he said, but the easy money is too alluring. Depending on the market, he can earn from $1,500 to $7,500 a month. Most Afghans can't make that in a year. Besides, he said, "all the governors are doing this, so why shouldn't we?"

Losers Become Winners

In December 2001, not long after the Taliban were routed, I visited the Shah Wali Kot district, several hours' drive on unpaved roads from Kandahar, a Mordor land of rock mountains shaped like sagging crescents and mud-baked houses melting into the dunes. The Taliban leaders had fled, mostly to Pakistan. Gul Agha Shirzai, formerly a local warlord and soon-to-be new governor, and his soldiers had swarmed into power while the Americans set up their operations base in Mullah Omar's Xanadu-like residence. I was with a large group of Populzai, the clan of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai.

We were in a big guest room with more than a dozen men gathered in a circle, all wearing the kind of turbans that look like gargantuan ice-cream swirls. The ones in black turban swirls were giggling, chatting and slapping one another on the back. The ones in white turban swirls were sulking, grumbling or mute. In this group, the miserable white turbans were Taliban men. They had just lost their pickup trucks, weapons, money, prestige and jobs, all of which had gone to the gleeful black turbans.

Today those miserable white turbans have taken to the mountains to fight. The gleeful black turbans are under siege. I saw one of the black turbans this summer, the Shah Wali Kot district leader, in the garden of the Kandahar governor's palace. He was a mess. He chuckled loudly when I asked him how it was back in Shah Wali Kot. "Frankly, we are just defending ourselves from the Taliban," he said. "Our head is on the pillow at night, but we do not sleep."

That small division among the Populzai in Shah Wali Kot echoes the larger division of the Pashtun into two main branches: the Durrani and the Ghilzai. The Durrani, Karzai's tribe, have dominated for the last two centuries in Afghanistan and regard themselves as the ruling elite. In the south, the Ghilzai were often treated as the nomadic, scrappy cousins. With the exception of Mullah Omar, who had been a poor Ghilzai farmer, the leaders of the Taliban tended to be Durrani. These days, the perception among the southern Ghilzai is that they are persecuted, that the jails are filled with their people, while the Durrani in the south received all the Japanese, U.S. and British contracts and jobs. From what I could gather during my weeks in Afghanistan, these perceptions were mostly true. But even if they were exaggerated, such perceptions, in an illiterate society, have a way of quickly morphing into reality.

Take Panjwai, a district just outside Kandahar, where hundreds of Taliban massed this summer, taking advantage of the changeover from American soldiers to a NATO force of Canadian troops. One afternoon I met a red-haired propagandist and writer for the Taliban in a Kandahar office building. With his slight lisp, chain-smoking habit and eclectic reading — French novelists and Arabic philosophers — he seemed more a tormented graduate student than the landless villager from Panjwai he was. Panjwai is a mishmash of tribes, and the Taliban were exploiting the grievances of the Nurzai, a tribe that has felt persecuted and unfairly targeted for poppy eradication. Traders in Kandahar, he said, were donating money to the Taliban. Landowners were paying them to fight off eradicators. The Taliban were paying poor, unemployed men to fight. And religious scholars were delivering the message that it was time for jihad because the Americans were no different from the Russians. Just a few weeks earlier, the Taliban went on a killing spree in Panjwai. They beheaded a tribal leader in his home, shot another in the bazaar and hanged a man near a shrine with a note tacked on his body: <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="290327;46304;111485">"SPY."</object.title>

The Taliban were feeling bold enough that one afternoon Mullah Ibrahim, a Taliban intelligence agent, dropped by my hotel for lunch. He was a Ghilzai, from Helmand, and told me he had tried to lead a normal life under the official amnesty program. Instead, he was locked up, beaten and so harassed by Helmandi intelligence and police officers that his tribal elders told him to leave for Pakistan and join the Taliban there. Then, about a year ago, he decided that he was tired of fighting and living as a fugitive and accepted a reconciliation offer from an Afghan general. Pakistani intelligence got wind of this and imprisoned him; upon his release, the Pakistanis gave him money and a motorbike and pressured him to go back to war. He is still tired of war, but the Pakistanis won't let him live in peace, and now if he tries to reconcile with the Kabul government, he told me, the Taliban will kill him.

When fighting broke out on the main highway near Kandahar, I saw that the police had tied up a group of villagers — but the Taliban had all escaped. One of those village men, his hands bound behind his back, told me that he had peeped out from his house earlier that day and saw some 200 Taliban with new guns and rocket launchers. They wanted food and threatened him and other villagers. "But I am not afraid of them," he said loudly. "I am only afraid of this government." Why? "Look at what they do. They can't get the Taliban, so they arrest us. We have no hope from them anymore. And when we call and tell them Taliban are here, no one comes." As an engineer from Panjwai who had been an Afghan senator during the Communist era told me: "We are now like camels. In Islam, a camel can be slaughtered in two different ways.

"The Taliban are using rivalries and enmities between people to get soldiers, the same tactics as the mujahedeen used against the Russians," the engineer continued. "Just like in Russian times they come and say, 'We are defending the country from the infidels.' They start asking for food. Then they ask the people for soldiers and say, 'We will give you weapons.' And that's how it starts. And the emotions are rising in the people now. They are saying, 'Kaffirs have invaded our land.'"

Qayum Karzai, the president's older brother and a legislator from Kandahar, seemed utterly depressed when I met him. "For the last four years, the Taliban were saying that the Americans will leave here," he said. "We were stupid and didn't believe it. Now they think it's a victory that the Americans left."

With the Americans on their way out and the NATO force not yet in control, the Kandahar Police were left on the front line: underfinanced, underequipped, untrained — and often stoned. Which is perhaps what made them so brave. One afternoon I ran into a group who said their friends had just been killed when a Talib posing as a policeman served them poisoned tea. A shaggy-haired officer in a black tunic was standing by his pickup, freshly ripped up by a barrage of bullets, and staring at my feet. "I envy your shoes," he said, looking back at his own torn rubber sandals. "I envy your Toyota," he said and laughed. And then looking at my pen and notebook, he said, "I envy you can read and write." It's not too late, I offered feebly, but he tapped his temple and shook his head. "It doesn't work anymore," he said. "I smoke hash. I smoke opium. I'm drinking because we're always thinking and nervous." He was 35. He had been fighting for 20 years. Four of his friends had been killed in the fighting the other night. He had to support children, a wife and parents on a salary of about $100 a month. And, he said, "we haven't been paid in four months." No wonder, then, that the population complained that the police were all thieves.

At Kandahar's hospital I met a 17-year-old policeman (who had been with the police since he was 14) tending to his wounded friend. He was in a jovial mood, amazed he wasn't dead. He said they had been given an order to cut the Taliban's escape route. Instead they were ambushed by the Taliban, ran out of bullets and had no phones to call for backup. "We ran away," he said with a nervous giggle. "The Taliban chased us, shouting: 'Hey, sons of Bush! Where are you going? We want to kill you.'"

Last month, NATO forces struck back around Panjwai with artillery and aerial bombardments, killing an estimated 500 Taliban fighters and destroying homes and schools. But unless NATO can stay for years, create a trustworthy police force and spend the millions necessary to regenerate the district, the Taliban will be back.

Deciding to Fight

Inside the old city walls of Peshawar, Pakistan, a half-hour drive from the Afghan border, in a bazaar named after the storytellers who enthralled Central Asian gold and silk merchants with their tales of war and tragic love, sits the 17th-century Mohabat Khan Mosque. It is a place of cool, marble calm amid the dense market streets. Yousaf Qureshi is the prayer leader there and director of the Jamia Ashrafia, a Deobandi madrasa. He had recently announced a pledge by the jewelers' association to pay $1 million to anyone who would kill a Danish cartoonist who caricatured the Prophet Muhammad. Qureshi himself offered $25,000 and a car. I found Qureshi seated on a cushion behind a low glass desk covered with papers and business cards — ambassadors, N.G.O. workers, Islamic scholars, mujahedeen commanders: he has conversed with them all. His office resembles an antiques shop, the walls displaying oversize prayer beads, knives inlaid with ivory and astrakhan caps. It was day's end, and Qureshi was checking the proofs for his 51st book, called "The Benefits of Koran."

Qureshi told me that he meets with Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, about twice a year. Qureshi understands Musharraf's predicament: "The heart of this government is with the Taliban. The tongue is not." He didn't claim total insider knowledge, but he said, "I think they want a weak government and want to support the Taliban without letting them win." Why? "We are asking Musharraf, 'What are you doing,' and he says: 'I'm moving in both ways. I want to support the Taliban, but I can't afford to displease America. I am caught between the devil and the deep sea.'"

Not long ago, Qureshi said, he received three emissaries from Mullah Omar who wanted Qureshi to warn another religious leader to stop preaching against the Taliban. "I refused," he said. Later Sheikh Yassin, one of the messengers, was arrested by the I.S.I., Pakistan's military intelligence service. So why, I asked, does Qureshi say the I.S.I. is supporting the Taliban? "That is the double policy of the government," he replied. Even in the 1990's, he said, Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was supporting the official Afghan government of Burhanuddin Rabbani while the I.S.I. was supporting his opponent, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, as he rained thousands of rockets upon Rabbani's government and the citizens of Kabul. Qureshi told me that if he and local traders didn't want Al Qaeda or the Taliban to flourish, then they wouldn't. "We are supporting them to give the Americans a tough time," he said. "Leave Afghanistan, and the Taliban and foreign fighters will not give Karzai problems. All the administrators of madrasas know what our students are doing, but we won't tell them not to fight in Afghanistan."

The new Taliban fighters in Afghanistan are of three basic types. There are the old war-addicted jihadis who were left out of the 2001 Bonn conference, which determined the postwar shape of Afghan politics and the carve-up of the country. There are the "second generation" Afghan refugees: poor, educated in Pakistan's madrasas and easily recruited by their elders. And then there are the young men who had jobs and prestige in the former Taliban regime and were unable to find a place for themselves in the new Afghanistan.

Coincidentally, there are also now three fronts. One is led by Mullah Omar's council in Quetta. The second is led by Jalaluddin Haqqani, a hero of the jihad against the Soviets who joined the Taliban. Although well into his 80's, he orchestrates insurgent attacks through his sons in Paktia, Khost and Paktika, the Afghan provinces close to Waziristan, where he is based. Finally, there is Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, the former leader of Hezb-i-Islami, the anti-Soviet fighters entrusted with the most money and arms by the U.S. and Pakistan. He had opposed the Taliban, living in uneasy exile in Iran until the U.S. persuaded Tehran to boot him out; he sneaked into the mountainous eastern borderlands. Since the early days of Karzai's government, he has promised to organize Mullah Omar's followers with his educated cadres and finance their jihad against Karzai and the American invaders. Old competitors are coming together in much the way the mujahedeen factions cooperated to fight the Russians. Hekmatyar adds a lethal ingredient to this stew: his ties and his followers extend all through Afghanistan, including the north and the west, where he is exploiting factional grievances that have nothing to do with the Pashtun discontent in the south.

An Afghan I met outside Peshawar — for his safety he asked me not to use his full name — was typical of the 20-something Talibs who had flourished under the Taliban regime. He was from Day Chopan, a mountainous region in Zabul Province, northeast of Kandahar. When the Northern Alliance and the Americans took Afghanistan, he escaped through the hills on an old smuggling route to the North-West Frontier Province.

It was familiar terrain. A.'s father had been a religious teacher who studied in Sami ul-Haq's famous Haqqaniya madrasa near the Khyber Pass and preached jihad for Harakat, one of the southern mujahedeen parties whose members filled Mullah Omar's ranks. Those old ties still bind and have provided a network for recruiting. A. grew up in madrasas in the tribal Pashtun lands of Waziristan, where he learned to fire guns as a child in the American-financed mujahedeen camps. As a teenage religious student in Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, he would go door to door collecting bread for his fellow Talibs. Behind one of those doors, he saw a girl and fell in love. When his father wouldn't let him marry the girl, he threatened to go fight in Afghanistan. His father would not relent, and A. signed up at the local Taliban office in Peshawar. "We got good food, free service, everything was Islamic," he told me. "It was the best life, rather than staying in that poor madrasa." His father soon did relent, and A. became engaged, but he was only 15 and had no money. So he went back to the Taliban and was soon working beside the deputy defense minister. "Of course, then there were bags of money," he said.

A., now 28, was living in an Afghan refugee village that used to belong to Hekmatyar's group. Weak with malaria, he was nevertheless plump and jovial, even funny at times. Only when the Pakistani intelligence services came up did his already sallow hues pale to old bone.

After fleeing the American bombardment in 2001, he told me, the Taliban arrived in Pakistan tattered, dispersed and demoralized. But in the months after the collapse, senior Taliban leaders told their comrades to stay at home, keep in touch and wait for the call. Some Taliban told me that they actually waited to see if there was a chance to work with Karzai's government.

"Our emir," as A. referred to Mullah Omar, slowly contacted the commanders and told them to find out who was dead and who was alive. Those commanders appointed group commanders to collect the underlings like A. Weapons stashed away in Afghanistan's mountains were excavated. Funds were raised through the wide and varied Islamic network — Karachi businessmen, Peshawar goldsmiths, Saudi oil men, Kuwaiti traders and jihadi sympathizers within the Pakistani military and intelligence ranks.

Mullah Omar named a 10-man leadership council, A. explained. Smaller councils were created for every province and district. Most of this was done from the safety of Pakistan, and in 2003 Mullah Omar dispatched Mullah Dadullah to the madrasas of Baluchistan and Karachi to gather the dispersed Talibs and find fresh recruits. Pakistani authorities were reportedly seen with him. Still, neither Musharraf nor his military men in Baluchistan did anything to arrest him.

It was a perfect job for Dadullah, whose reputation for bravery was matched by his savagery and his many war wounds, collected in more than 25 years of fighting. In 1998, his fighters slaughtered hundreds of Hazaras (Shiites of Mongol descent) in Bamiyan Province, an act so brutal it was even too much for Mullah Omar, who had him disarmed at the time. Dadullah's very savagery, filmed and now often circulated on videotape, coupled with his promotional flair, were just the ingredients Omar needed to put the Taliban back on the map.

Today, Quetta has assumed the character of Peshawar in the 1980's, a suspicious place of spies and counterspies and double agents. It is not just the hundreds of men in typical Afghan Pashtun clothing — the roughly wound turbans, dark shalwar kameez, eyes inked with kohl — who squat on Thursday afternoons outside the Kandahari mosque in the center of town, comparing notes on the latest fighting in Helmand or the best religious teachers. Rather, as I wandered the narrow alleyways of the Afghan neighborhoods, my local guides would say, "That's where Mullah Dadullah was living" or "That's where Mullah Amir Khan Haqqani is living." (Haqqani is the Taliban's governor in exile for Zabul Province.) Mullah Dadullah is now a folk hero for young Talibs like A. And all the Taliban I met told me that every time Dadullah gives another interview or appears on the battlefield, it serves as an instant injection of inspiration.

By 2004, A. said, he was meeting a lot of Arabs — Saudis, Iraqis, Palestinians — who taught the Afghans about I.E.D.'s (improvised explosive devices) and suicide bombings. "They taught us how to put explosives in plastic," he told me. "They taught us wiring and triggers. The Arabs are the best instructors in that." But now the Afghans are doing fine on their own. Pakistani jihadis in Afghanistan received their training, they told me, from Pakistani officers in Kashmir.

The southerners have also forged ties with the Pakistani Taliban in Waziristan. There is a free flow of arms and men between Waziristan and the Afghan provinces across the border. According to A., even Uzbeks from the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan have joined some of the fighters now in A.'s home mountains in Day Chopan.

It was disheartening to hear A. describe his first encounter with Americans, who were trying to set up a base in a remote region of Zabul. Though they were building a road where no roads had gone before, he could perceive that asphalt only as a means for the Americans to transport their armored vehicles and occupy Muslim lands. A friend of his joined us as we were talking. He had just arrived in Pakistan from the Day Chopan region and said that the Americans were like a cyclone of evil, stealing their almonds and violating their Pashtunwali (the Pashtun tribal laws). In this instance, he meant the law by which even a cousin will not enter your house without knocking first.

A. is now a media man in Pakistan, coordinating the editing of films for discs, censoring them in case there are commanders who don't want their faces seen and distributing them. He proudly offered me the latest disc of Mullah Dadullah beheading some "spies for the Americans." He said he had sold 25,000 CD's about the fighting in Waziristan.

He was full of contradictions. He said that if he didn't have a house in Day Chopan, he would never spend a single night there because there was no education, no electricity, no power, nothing, just a heap of stones. Yet he did not want America to change all that. "We don't like progress by Americans," he declared. "We don't like roads by Americans. We would rather walk on tired feet as long as we are walking in an Islamic state."

Was it all just bravado speaking? Was an opportunity to build bridges to young men like A. somehow lost or just neglected? It was hard to tell. But when the I.S.I. subject came up again, his tone changed. "They are snakes," he told me. He said that they were trying to create a new, obedient leader and oust the independent-minded Mullah Omar, and for that, the real Taliban hated them. Then he said: "I told you that we burn schools because they're teaching Christianity, but actually most of the Taliban don't like this burning of schools or destroying roads and bridges, because the Taliban, too, could use them. Those acts were being done under I.S.I. orders. They don't want progress in Afghanistan." An Indian engineer was beheaded in Zabul in April, he said, and that was also ordered by Pakistan, which, from fear of the influence of its enemy, India, was encouraging attacks on Indian companies. "People are not telling the story, because no one can trust anyone, and if I.S.I. knows I told you," he said, he would be dead.

Pakistan's Assets

There are many theories for why Pakistan might have wanted to help the Taliban reconstitute themselves. Afghan-Pakistani relations have always been fraught. One among the many disputes has to do with the Durand Line, the boundary drawn up by the British in 1893 partly to divide the Pashtun tribes, who were constantly revolting against the British. The Afghan government has never recognized this line, which winds its way from the Hindu Kush mountains of North-West Frontier Province 1,500 miles down to the deserts of Baluchistan, as its border. Nor have the Pashtun tribes. The Pakistanis may hope to force Karzai to recognize the Durand line in exchange for stability.

Another theory is that Musharraf must appease the religious parties whom he needs to extend his power past the end of his term next year. Musharraf bought them off, gave them control of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan and let them use the Taliban. And finally, the Pakistanis see Afghanistan as their rightful client. They want an accommodating regime, not Karzai, whose main backers are the U.S. and India, Pakistan's nemesis.

Pakistan's well-established secular Pashtun nationalist political leaders remain distraught that their lands have again become sanctuaries for the Afghan Taliban and the Pakistani religious parties, which, since elections in 2002, rule these provinces and are completing a Talibanization of the region. The secular leaders point to another layer in Pakistan's games: keeping the tribal areas autonomous enables Pakistan's intelligence services to ward off the gaze of Westerners and keep their jihadis safely tucked away.

One thing you notice if you visit the homes of retired generals in Pakistan is that they live in a lavish fashion typical of South America's dictatorship-era military elite. They control most of the country's economy and real estate, and like President Musharraf, himself a former general, they do not want to relinquish power.

Although there is a secularist strain in the Pakistani military, it has been aligned with religious hard-liners since the army's inception in 1947. Many officers still see their duty as defending the Muslim world, but their raison d'être has been undermined by the fact that though Pakistan was founded as a refuge for South Asia's Muslims, more Muslims today live in India. They seem to envy the jihadis' clarity. The militants had no identity crises. According to Najim Sethi, a prominent Pakistani journalist, military officers often have "a degree of self-disgust for selling themselves" to the Americans, and they still bear a grudge against the United States for abandoning them after the Afghan jihad and, more recently, for sanctioning Pakistan over its nuclear program. The standard army phrase about the Americans was, he said, "They used us like a condom."

Officers spoke to me as if they were simply translating the feelings of the jihadis for a tone-deaf audience, but they sounded more like ventriloquists. One retired colonel I spoke to was a relative of a Taliban leader from Waziristan, Abdullah Massoud, who had earned both sympathy and reverence for his time in Guantánamo Bay. Massoud was captured fighting the Americans and the Northern Alliance and spent two years there, claiming to be a simple Afghan Talib. Upon his release, he made it home to Waziristan and resumed his war against the U.S. With his long hair, his prosthetic limb and impassioned speeches, he quickly became a charismatic inspiration to Waziristan's youth.

Since 2001, some of Waziristan's tribes have refused to hand over Qaeda members living among them. Under intense American pressure, Pakistan agreed for the first time in its history to invade the tribal areas. Hundreds of civilians and soldiers were killed. American helicopters were seen in the region, as were American spies. The militants (with some army accomplices) retaliated with two assassination attempts against Musharraf late in 2003. He struck back, but as the civilian casualties mounted and the military began to balk at killing Pakistanis, Musharraf agreed to a deal in the spring of 2004 whereby the militants would give up their guests in return for cash. Pakistani officers and the militants hugged and shed tears during a public reconciliation. But the militants did not relinquish their Al Qaeda guests, and they took advantage of the amnesty to execute tribal elders they said had helped the Pakistani military. The tribal structure in Waziristan was devastated, and the Taliban took to the streets to declare the Islamic emirate of Waziristan. Since Musharraf signed a truce with the militants last month, attacks launched from Waziristan into Afghanistan, according to NATO, have risen by 300 percent.

"Muslim governments are not able to face the Americans," the retired colonel from Waziristan said, explaining the mujahedeen mind-set. "If Muslim governments should stand up against duplicity and foreign hegemonic designs, and they don't, who will? Someone has to stand up to defend the Muslim countries, and it's this that gives the jihadis the courage and zeal to stand up to the worst atrocities. This is the core issue of the mujahedeen movement. You call it the war on terror. The mujahedeen call it jihad." And so, essentially, did he.

One afternoon, in the midst of a monsoon, I sought out one of the founders of the pro-jihadi strategy, the retired general Mirza Aslam Beg. He lived in Rawalpindi, the military capital half an hour from Islamabad, in a brick and tile-roofed mansion with a basketball hoop, flowing greenery and Judy, his one-eyed cocker spaniel. The house was immaculate, with marble floors, rugs, fine china and porcelain on display behind glass and an amusing portrait of Aslam Beg as a young, Ray-Banned, pommaded officer. His mansion sits across the street from Musharraf's.

Aslam Beg played a leading role in the military's creation of "asymmetrical assets," jargon for the jihadis who have long been used by the military as proxies in Kashmir and Afghanistan. He was chief of the army staff from 1988 to 1991, while the Pakistani nuclear scientist A.Q. Khan was selling the country's nuclear technology to Iran, Libya and North Korea. Beg held talks with the Iranians about exchanging Iranian oil for Pakistani nuclear skill.

Aslam Beg likes to remind visitors that he was one of a group of army officers trained by the C.I.A. in the 1950's as a "stay-behind organization" that would melt into the population if ever the Soviet Union overran Pakistan. Those brigadiers and lieutenant colonels then trained and directed the Afghan jihadis.

In the 1980's, "the C.I.A. set up the largest support and administrative bases in Mohmand agency, Waziristan and Baluchistan," Aslam Beg told me. "These were the logistics bases for eight long years, and you can imagine the relations that developed. And then Chechens, Uzbeks, Tajiks, Saudis developed family relations with the local people." The Taliban, he said, fell back after 2001 to these baselines. "In 2003, when the U.S. attacked Iraq, a whole new dimension was added to the conflict. The foreign mujahedeen who'd fought in Afghanistan started moving back to Afghanistan and Iraq." And the old Afghan jihadi leaders stopped by the mansion of their mentor, Aslam Beg, to tell him they were planning to wage war against the American occupiers.

As the rain outside turned to hail, banging against the windows, Aslam Beg ate some English sandwiches that had been wheeled in by a servant. "As a believer," he went on, "I'll tell you how I understand it. In the Holy Book there's an injunction that the believer must reach out to defend the tyrannized. The words of God are, 'What restrains you from fighting for those helpless men, women and children who due to their weakness are being brutalized and are calling you to free them from atrocities being perpetuated on them.' This is a direct message, and it may not impact the hearts and minds of all believers. Maybe one in 10,000 will leave their home and go to the conflicts where Muslims are engaged in liberation movements, such as Chechnya, Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan and Kashmir. Now it's a global deterrent force."

The Authentic Jihad

The old city of Lahore, with its broad boulevards and banyan-tree canopies, remains the cultural and intellectual heart of Pakistan. It is home to a small elite of journalists, editors, authors, painters, artists and businessmen. Najam Sethi, editor in chief of The Friday Times, and his wife, Jugnu Mohsin, the publisher, are popular fixtures among this crowd. Like so many of

Pakistan's intellectuals, they have had their share of run-ins with government security agents. For pushing the bounds of press freedom, Sethi was dragged from his bedroom during Nawaz Sharif's reign, beaten, gagged and detained without charge. Musharraf, in his new autobiography, claims that Nawaz Sharif wanted him to court-martial Sethi for treason, an act that seemed ludicrous to him, and he refused.

I met him one afternoon at the newspaper's offices as he was preparing his weekly editorial. He is a tall, affable man with smiling eyes and large glasses. And he got right down to business, providing an analysis of why Pakistan had decided to bring its "assets" — by which he meant the Taliban and Kashmiri jihadis — off the shelf.

In the days following 9/11, when Musharraf gathered together major editors to tell them that he had no choice but to withdraw his support for the Taliban, Sethi raised the touchy issue of the other jihadis. He said that if Musharraf was abandoning the Taliban, he would have to abandon the sectarian jihadis (fighting the Shiites), the Kashmir jihadis, all of the jihadis, because they were all trained in mind by the same religious leaders and in body by the same Pakistani forces.

In January 2002, Musharraf gave an unusually long televised speech to the nation. He reminded the people that his campaign against extremism was initiated years before and not under American pressure. He vowed that Pakistan would no longer export jihadis to Kashmir, that he was again placing a ban on several jihadi organizations, that camps would be closed and that while the madrasas were mostly educating the poor, some were centers of extremist teaching and would be reformed. A month later, Musharraf was at the White House next to President Bush, who praised him for standing against terrorism.

Sethi characterized Pakistani authorities as believing that the U.S. in Iraq "will be a Vietnam." He said: "Afghanistan will be neither here nor there. So we cannot wrap up our assets. We must protect them." The I.S.I. realized it could help deliver Al Qaeda to the U.S. while keeping the Taliban and the jihadis on the back burner. At the same time, Musharraf's moderate advisers were telling him that holding on to those assets would eventually boomerang. And soon enough, the assets began to come after Musharraf — while the people of Pakistan were turning against him for being pro-American. "So going after jihadis who were protecting the Taliban came to a halt," Sethi said.

Meanwhile the landscape next door in Afghanistan was changing. The warlords were back in action. The drug economy was surging. By 2003 and 2004, Musharraf's men were becoming hysterical about what they saw as a growing Indian presence in Afghanistan, particularly the Indian consulates in Kandahar and Jalalabad, the Pashtun strongholds that Pakistan considered its own turf. Karzai was doing business with Indians and Americans and was no longer a Pashtun whom Pakistanis would want to do business with.

As Sethi spoke, I recalled a meeting I had with one of Kandahar's prominent tribal leaders. He recounted a visit from a former Pakistani general who had been active in the I.S.I. The general invited Kandahar's leaders to lunch and warned them not to let the Indians put a consulate in Kandahar and to remember who their real benefactors were. Today there is a consulate there, and Indian films and music are sweeping through the Pashtun lands. What is more, many Pakistanis believe India is backing the Baluch insurgency in Pakistan's far south, clouding the prospects for the new, Chinese-built port in Gwadar. The port is Pakistan's single largest investment in its economic future and has been attacked by Baluch rebels.

In many ways, Pakistani policy is already looking beyond both Karzai and the Americans; they believe it is prudent to imagine a future with neither. That future will be shaped by the past: the past with India, the past with the Soviet Union, the past with America. For Pakistan's hard-liners, at least, the obvious choice was to take their assets off the shelf and restart the jihad.

A Difficult Choice

On the wall outside the Eid Ga madrasa, in Kuchlak, a parched town near Quetta, Afghan students and teachers were debating the merits of jihad. One boy had just fled an American assault on Day Chopan in Zabul Province. He had never been to Pakistan before. He was frenzied, in shock. As a student from Kandahar led the others in dusk prayer, a young boy whispered to me, "I like America." They were hardly a unified group. One young Helmandi told me, "We want our traditions of Islam and Sharia, not your democracy," while another argued for peace. Then the Helmandi asked, with genuine confusion: "Why are Muslims being tortured everywhere in the world, and no one is there to stand up for them? But if you touch one Westerner, the sky is on your head?"

Most madrasas in Pakistan are run by the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam, the religious-party alliance that has joined with Musharraf to keep the popular parties of Benazir Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif from regaining power. The J.U.I. madrasas usually endorse jihad, although even here I met madrasa students who were against the war. They subscribed to a vision of jihad as a struggle for self-improvement and the improvement of society. Mawlawi Mohammadin, a cleric from Helmand, went so far as to tell me that these are the true roots of jihad, though he confessed that his is a lonely voice. He was afraid of everyone — Taliban, Pakistani intelligence, even his pupils. "If we start openly supporting Karzai, we could be killed by our own students," he told me with nervous laughter. Only a month earlier, a Taliban official from Helmand who had reconciled with Karzai's government was gunned down by assassins on a motorbike in Quetta.

Mohammadin said that it is now open season for jihad in Afghanistan under J.U.I. guidance. Government ministers were even attending funerals to praise Pakistani Pashtuns who had died fighting in Kandahar. He estimates that there are some 10,000 Taliban fighters in Baluchistan. Despite the intimidation, he says he feels that his mission is to steer his students away from war.

One of these was Mohamed Nader, who had just attended a cousin's funeral and was wondering what it all meant. His cousin's family was poor, and without their knowledge, he had gone to earn money first by harvesting poppies in Helmand and then by fighting for the Taliban. Finally he was killed. Among the biggest problems, Nader told me, was that the cohesion of the Afghan family has been shredded by decades of poverty and refugee life in Pakistan. In a typically strong Afghan family, young adults obey their parents, even asking for permission to go fight. But here, boys just run off.

Rahmatullah was one of those who had run off and returned. He was skinny and disheveled, having just faced heavy fighting in Kandahar. Though an Afghan, he had grown up in Baluchistan, near the border, in an area where he said 200 fighters were now living. The mullah at his madrasa told all the students that it was time for jihad. And the I.S.I. was paying cash. But his father was old and against the war; he pleaded with him to abandon fighting. So he sent Rahmatullah to his friend Mohammadin, hoping he might open another path for his son. Rahmatullah told me that he wasn't sure yet which mullah he would listen to.

After The Hugs, Reality Sets In -- Another Iraq Tour Looms (LAT)

By Tony Perry

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Several hundred family members, after months of worrying and praying, turn out at Miramar air station to greet returning Marines.

SAN DIEGO — By their nature, military families tend to be respectful of authority.

But no rope line was going to restrain family members Saturday from sprinting onto the tarmac at Miramar Marine Corps Air Station to embrace loved ones returning from a seven-month deployment to Iraq.

Sgt. Garland Joyner, as the bearer of the squadron guidon, or pennant, had the honor of being the first Marine to deplane from the chartered United Airlines 747. His children — Malik, 8, Imanie, 9, Kasey, 13, and Jasmine, 14 — were the first to run for their welcome-home hug.

"Daddy!" screamed Malik as he raced toward his father, who has now done three tours in Iraq.

But amid the kisses and tears of relief there was the reality that Joyner and other members of the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing will probably return to Iraq, maybe next year.

For families, another deployment means another prolonged period of constant worry in which every knock on the door carries the potential of the worst possible news.

Jamie Macdonald of Carmel knows all about the anxiety. She was waiting for her son, Sgt. Colin Macdonald, 25, who was returning after his fourth tour.

"It's horrible," she said. "You don't take a deep breath the whole time they're gone. It's like playing Russian roulette. You know that if you play often enough, something bad is going to happen."

Several hundred family members displaying small American flags, handmade banners and commemorative T-shirts awaited the arrival of the plane after its 11-hour flight from Germany.

Twenty-one members of Sgt. Tony Portillo's family turned out wearing red T-shirts with his name and picture. He was returning from his third deployment to Iraq.

"It gets harder each time," said his mother, Angie Portillo, of Los Angeles. "You just get numb, because you know what to expect. You're afraid the whole time."

Different family members have different strategies to cope with anxiety. Some won't watch television news.

Some put in extra hours at work. Others busy themselves with volunteer work or join groups of other family members of deployed Marines.

"You pray. Every night and every morning, you pray," said Hilda Lopez of Fresno, waiting with her daughter Rosa Kong for the return of her husband, Cpl. Phirak Kong, 21.

Cyndi DeBoer of Boulder City, Nev., followed a mantra she found in a book during the second tour of her stepson Cpl. Nathan DeBoer, 22.

"I read that you can either have faith or you can have fear," she said. "Every time I started to have fear, I prayed."

Cynthia Drake, who came to San Diego from her home in Fritch, Texas, for the homecoming, wore a T-shirt with a picture of her son, Cpl. Tanner Drake, 26, and the slogan, "A Piece of My Heart Served in Iraq."

As Part Of Military's Ground Force, Navy Firms Up Support Services (NVP)

By Louis Hansen

Norfolk Virginian Pilot, October 22, 2006

VIRGINIA BEACH - The military calls them "IAs," shorthand for individual augmentees.

They're the 46,000 men and women who have been picked from Navy units to serve, often facing danger, with soldiers and Marines in Afghanistan and Iraq.

Once considered a short-term program, the Navy and defense experts acknowledge these sailors are now a permanent part of today's ground force.

The Navy this month created the Expeditionary Combat Readiness Center at Little Creek to track and assist those sailors uprooted from their ships and shore commands. About 150 people are assigned to the center and at bases in battle zones.

At any given time, about 8,500 Navy personnel are deployed for fill-in roles in the two wars. Their jobs include logistical support, civil affairs and military police. Deployments have grown, and now typically last 12 months.

The readiness center aims to ease the stresses on sailors, many stationed in combat areas without their shipmates to rely on.

"They don't have embedded unit support with them," said Capt. Jeffrey

McKenzie, the center's commander. "They're a unit of one."

Sailors at forward bases in Iraq, Afghanistan, Guantanamo Bay and other stations can meet with staff advisers. They will help sailors manage their career and advancement exams, and smooth out payroll problems and health-care issues, he added.

McKenzie said he begins every morning by answering e-mails from sailors in Baghdad who need help.

McKenzie said his new command can also help families - something as simple as contacting a sailor at a forward base. Augmentee families have a disadvantage: They lack the ready community support as when a 300-crew warship deploys for six months.

The Navy handles an average 1,000 IAs each month, he said. The new command can handle twice that number.

Early in the Iraq war, sailors sometimes received bare-bones combat training and makeshift equipment, McKenzie said. Combat skills training has since been bolstered and standardized at Fort Jackson, S.C.

Dan Goure, a senior researcher with the Lexington Institute, said the Navy should expect to fill its support role for a long time.

Army and Marine units have been overstretched, deploying three and four times since the Iraq war began.

The IAs will continue being used more widely, he said, because the military became smaller after the Cold War and conflicts have become longer, straining manpower.

"The global war on terrorism has shown us we can't do our business the old-fashioned way," said Goure, who studies military personnel issues for the Northern Virginia-based think tank.

The military needs active-duty and reserve troops from all branches to boost Army and Marine Corps missions, he said. "These are the new realities."

Capt. Ed Burdick, a personnel and manpower administrator for surface fleet headquarters in Norfolk, said the combat experience often creates better, battle-tested sailors for the Navy.

The migration of sailors to ground-combat roles have not diminished the fleet's readiness, he said, because less than 3 percent of any ship's crew has been selected for ground duty.

Sailors usually volunteer, although some are ordered.

Cmdr. Jim Lowther, a supply and financial officer for the surface fleet, requested a six-month tour in Iraq in 2005. He said he wanted to directly contribute to the war and gain experience.

He spent a week training at Fort Bliss, Texas, then joined a command in Iraq. "It was pretty quick," Lowther said.

Among other duties, he managed contracts for military and civilian construction in Iraq.

The deployment "makes you appreciate what you have here," he said during an interview at Norfolk Naval Station.

Capt. Robert Irelan left a staff job with the surface fleet for Baghdad, where he served as a liaison between the U.S. military and the Iraqi Navy. It was one of the most rewarding duties of his 22-year career, he said.

Irelan said a combat deployment can be much easier and safer aboard a warship patrolling the Persian Gulf.

But, he said, "it's not really my idea of war."

Debt Is Keeping Troops From Overseas Duty, Study Finds (NYT/AP)

By The Associated Press

SAN DIEGO, Oct. 21 (AP) — Thousands of American troops are being barred from overseas duty because they are so deep in debt that they are considered security risks, according to a review of military records by The Associated Press.

The number of troops held back has climbed sharply in the past few years. And while it appears to represent a small percentage of all military personnel, the increase is occurring at a time when the armed forces are stretched thin by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

"We are seeing an alarming trend in degrading financial health," said Capt. Mark D. Patton, commander of Naval Base Point Loma in San Diego.

The Pentagon contends that financial problems can distract troops from their duties or make them vulnerable to bribery and treason. As a result, those who fall heavily into debt can be stripped of the security clearances they need to go overseas.

The number of revoked clearances has surged since the beginning of the Iraq war, but military officials say there is no evidence that troops are deliberately running up debts to stay out of harm's way.

The problem is attributed to several factors, including a lack of financial acumen among young recruits; reckless spending among those exhilarated to make it home from a tour of duty; and the profusion of so-called payday lenders, businesses that allow military personnel to borrow against paychecks at extremely high interest rates.

The debt problems have persisted despite financial counseling offered to the troops by the Pentagon and crackdowns on payday lenders.

Data supplied by the Air Force, the Marines and the Navy show that the number of clearances revoked for financial reasons rose every year from 2002 to 2005, climbing to 2,654 last year from 284 at the start of the period. Partial numbers from this year suggest the trend is continuing.

About 6,300 troops in the three branches lost their clearances in that four-year period. Roughly 900,000 people are serving in the three branches, though not all need clearances.

The figures represent just a piece of the problem, because the Army — which employs an additional 500,000 people and accounts for the majority of the 160,000 troops in Iraq and Afghanistan — rejected requests to supply its data, saying such information was confidential.

Security clearances are revoked when service members' debt payments total 30 to 40 percent of their salary. The exact amount depends on the military branch.

Not all military jobs require security clearances. Marine infantryman does not, but some Marine specialties do. So do many jobs in the Navy and Air Force.

Financial problems are the overwhelming reason security clearances are revoked. Other reasons include criminal activity, questionable allegiance and ill health.

A primary reason the military revokes clearances on financial grounds is the fear that soldiers in debt may be tempted to sell secrets or equipment to the enemy.

In addition, "when they are over there fighting, we like them to have their heads in the game," said Maj. Gen. Michael Lehnert, commander of Marine bases in the Western United States.

Military officials also blame high interest rates at payday lending businesses, many of which are clustered outside bases around the country. Several states have cracked down on the lending practices. On Tuesday, President Bush signed legislation limiting how much these businesses could charge military personnel.

Quietly Accepting Another Iraq Death (LAT)

By Steve Lopez

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

I knock on the house with the flag out front. A cousin comes to the door, then asks me to wait on the porch while she checks to see if Kenny Stanton's parents are strong enough to greet a visitor.

"OK," she says a few minutes later, swinging open the screen door. "Come on in."

Gloria Stanton, Kenny's mother, sinks into the sofa, crushed by grief. She manages a gracious smile, her eyes red-rimmed and weary. Daughters Terry and Brandie are with her, and before long Kenny's dad, Kenny Sr., joins us along with brother Mario, 17.

"I'm sorry," I say, and the words feel ridiculously inadequate.

Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., 20, was killed in Baghdad on Oct. 13, when a bomb exploded near his vehicle. He was the third graduate of Hemet High School killed in Iraq, and his death came in one of the bloodiest months since the war began.

"The Plague that Hit Hemet," one of Stanton's acquaintances called it in an entry on the fallen soldier's MySpace website.

Stanton's family has erected a memorial in the living room, with flickering candles and photos of Kenny, a nice-looking kid with a sweet smile. He loved words, say his parents. He worked for the school newspaper and wanted to be a writer, a poet and teacher. But he chose to join the Army first.

His family can't say exactly why, although a close cousin, Michael Islas, says Kenny was fascinated by weaponry and wanted to see the world, if not necessarily Iraq. His parents tell me Kenny's grandfather, a Vietnam vet, tried to talk him out of it.

"He wanted to pay him not to go," says Mr. Stanton, a pressman for a label company. "He was ready to write him a check for $40,000 to go to college."

"I said, 'Sweetheart, I don't want you to go,' " Gloria Stanton says. "He said, 'But Mom, I could do some good.' "

In the end, they supported him. How could they argue with a young man who just wanted to do something for his country and make his parents proud?

The whole family drove to LAX when Kenny shipped out.

"We couldn't cry," Mr. Stanton says. "We didn't want him to see us cry. But when he left and we turned to leave, we all had tears in our eyes."

Mr. Stanton says he didn't support the war but supported his son's decision.

"I support our troops. That's all I want to say."

Hemet is a town east of Lake Elsinore with just under 70,000 residents, and Mayor Robin Lowe has been struck by the sacrifice it has made. Another local high school, West Valley, also lost a former student to the war, she says, bringing the local body count to four.

Lowe ordered the City Hall flag to fly at half staff for Stanton, just as she did in June when Marine Cpl. Michael Estrella, also 20, was killed.

"Hemet has many retired military living here, and has always been a center of patriotic pride," Lowe says. "I think our core beliefs are very firm and concrete when it comes to the United States and what it stands for."

Stanton's parents had suggested I get in touch with Aracely Colmenares, one of Kenny's closest friends at Hemet High. I give her a call, and we meet in Mary Henley Park, where she and Kenny used to sit under a tree, look up at the mountains and talk about everything.

They weren't a couple, just friends, but he was the one she called if she needed someone to talk to. She recalls how upset he was by the Sept. 11 attack. Although she wouldn't have pegged him a military man, she says he wanted to do something, someday. Something to make his family proud.

The Armed Forces Career Center, where Stanton enlisted, is not far from the park. It's on the main drag, Florida Avenue, conveniently if not ironically located in the same shopping center as Target, with its big bull's-eye out front.

There's a Taco Bell, a Carl's Jr. and a 99-cent Store. A See's Candy store is two doors from the Jenny Craig weight loss center. The Army, Navy and Marine recruiting stations neatly complete this blending of American commerce and culture.

Army Sgt. 1st Class Ronnie V. Sarmiento tells me the nationwide goal of 80,000 annual recruits has just been topped, but he's not at liberty to disclose the numbers in Hemet. I notice three youngsters in the office, though.

One tells me he might sign up but doesn't want to talk about it. Another guy who's thinking about it, 18-year-old Brent, is just out of Hemet High and says he hasn't heard the news that three former students have been killed.

The third, 18-year-old Jessica Katrow, heard about Stanton's death but is enlisting anyway to serve her country and experience something new.

"It's sad, but it happened," she says. "There's nothing I can do."

I ask if she wants to go to Iraq.

"I don't want to," she says, but she'll take whatever comes her way.

When I walk into the office at Hemet High the first thing I notice is a young female in an Air Force ROTC uniform. She's wandering behind the counter in crisp blue threads. Prominently displayed in the waiting area are brochures for the Navy ("accelerate your life"), Marines ("the few, the proud") and Army ("who you become will be better than who you were").

An assistant principal tells me no one can speak to me without permission from the district superintendent. Before leaving campus, I ask the assistant principal if it seems appropriate to display military recruiting brochures so prominently at a school that has lost three former students to war.

He politely tells me he thinks it's a government requirement, and refers me again to the superintendent, who does not return my calls.

When the school bell rings, I talk to about 10 students as they leave.

Julian, a freshman wearing an ROTC uniform, hasn't heard about the deaths of former Hemet grads, and he seems alarmed by the news. But he tells me he intends to follow the men in his family into the military.

Kyle, 16, says he heard about Stanton, but he's still considering enlisting after high school.

DOJ_NMG_0084671

"It happens," he says, holding a binder on which he's drawn a U.S. flag. "People die."

He tells me none of his teachers have discussed Stanton or the war in class.

"In history? We're studying the Puritans."

Driving away, I find that I'm disturbed by the quiet acceptance of sacrifice to what has been a dubious mission from the beginning. I can't help but remind myself that the architects of the war have risked no personal loss, staying the course with someone else's children.

I ask Mayor Lowe if too many young people in Hemet, if not elsewhere, fall in line before they're equipped to challenge the seduction of war, as well as the definitions of valor and patriotism.

"I don't think anyone in this town — anyone — is promoting war," she says, telling me she'll never forget that 14 students from her own school, Inglewood High, died in Vietnam.

"None of us, especially those of us who lived through Vietnam, are promoting any war of any kind by this country, and I say that emphatically. I don't think any teachers are promoting the war and I don't think the recruiters are promoting war. What I do see is … kids who are not really sure what to do with the rest of their life."

And so they join, with patriotic intentions and hope for a better future.

Kenny F. Stanton will be laid to rest this week in Hemet.

Doonesbury's War (WP)

By Gene Weingarten

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Revealing more about himself than he ever has, Garry Trudeau gives us tantalizing clues about what's behind his venerable comic strip's recent burst of genius, and pain.

IN THE BANQUET ROOM WERE MEN WHO WERE BLIND, men with burns, men with gouges, men missing an arm, men missing a leg, men missing an arm and a leg, men missing an arm and both legs, men missing parts of their faces, and a cartoonist from the funny pages.

We were just a few blocks from the White House, at Fran O'Brien's Steak House. Fran's was hosting a night out for casualties of the current war, visiting from their hospital wards.

It's hard to know what to say to a grievously injured person, and it's easy to be wrong . You could do what I did, for example. Scrounging for the positive, I cheerfully informed a young man who had lost both legs and his left forearm that at least he's lucky he's a righty. Then he wordlessly showed me his right hand, which is missing fingertips and has limited motion -- an articulated claw. That shut things right up, for both of us, and it would have stayed that way, except the cartoonist showed up.

Garry Trudeau, the creator of "Doonesbury," hunkered right down in front of the soldier, eye to eye, introduced himself and proceeded to ignore every single diplomatic nicety.

"So, when were you hit?" he asked.

"October 23."

Trudeau pivoted his body. "So you took the blast on, what . . . this side?"

"Yeah."

Brian Anderson, 25, was in shorts, a look favored by most of the amputees, who tend to wear their new prostheses like combat medals. His legs are metal and plastic, blue and knobby at the knee, shin poles culminating abruptly in sneakers.

Trudeau surveyed Brian's intact arm. "You've got dots."

"Yeah." Dots are soldier-speak for little beads of shrapnel buried under the skin. Sometimes they take a lifetime to work their way back to the surface. At this, Brian became fully engaged and animated, smiling and talking about the improvised explosive device that took his vehicle out; about his rescue; his recovery; his plans for the future. Trudeau, it turned out, had given him what he needed.

("In these soldiers' minds," Trudeau will explain afterward, "their whole identity, who they are right now, is what happened to them. They want to tell the story, they want to be asked about it, and you're honoring them by listening. The more they revisit it, the less power it has over them.")

Trudeau has been talking to injured vets for a couple of years now. It's partly compassionate support for people he has a genuine regard for, and it's part journalism -- the damnedest sort of reporting, for a professional cartoonist.

This was April 25. On the comics pages that day, Dagwood fixed himself an absolutely ENORMOUS sandwich; Garfield kicked Odie off the table again; and in Beetle Bailey, the only military-themed comic strip, Lt. Fuzz accidentally dropped a glass of water and cussed in funny cartoon hieroglyphics.

In Doonesbury, this was the story: B.D., the football coach and Vietnam vet who went to Iraq with the National Guard and lost a leg in a rocket-grenade attack near Fallujah, has been shamed into entering therapy for post-traumatic stress disorder because he overheard his little girl, Sam, tell a friend that she'd become afraid of her daddy. On this day, B.D. will begin to relive the battlefield event he has repressed, the one that made him a moody, alcoholic paranoiac and that torments him with guilt and shame that he does not understand. Through the rest of the week, B.D. will retell what happened when his armored vehicle came under attack from insurgents and -- desperate to escape and save himself and his men -- he gave the order to flee through a crowded marketplace, mowing down civilians.

Not many of the injured vets in Fran O'Brien's were where B.D. was yet. Their deepest wounds, like the dots, had not yet surfaced. On that day they were jovial, mostly, and indomitable, all of them, stolid and impervious, more so than the moms, wives and girlfriends who hovered at their elbows, lovingly kneading shoulders, patting thighs, holding on, looking bravely upbeat and just a little overwhelmed.

Trudeau bellied up to another vet.

"So, when were you hit?"

IF YOU DON'T KNOW MUCH ABOUT GARRY TRUDEAU, AND YOU PROBABLY DON'T, it's because he has done his best to keep it that way. With the exception of the time in 1980 when his island wedding to America's sweetheart, TV personality Jane Pauley, turned him into a sullen bridegroom hounded by paparazzi in boats and helicopters, Trudeau, now 58, has managed to remain comfortably obscure. Aside from a couple of semi-recent TV interviews, he's had almost no public presence for three decades. Considering the extraordinary reach of his comic strip, and the role it has had over the years in analyzing, reflecting and even helping shape American culture, he may be the most famous unknown person.

It's an odd type of fame, one that attaches hungrily to what you do but not at all to who you are. Take this woman here, at a lunch counter in the Dallas/Fort Worth airport. Her name is Connie Dubois. A candle maker, Connie lives in Ethel, La., pop. 2,000, a fleck on the map of East Feliciana Parish, which itself contains only two traffic lights. Connie, who is 50, has just flown on a plane for the first time in her life, heading to a trade show for candle makers.

"Do you know what 'Doonesbury' is? I ask her.

"Sure," she says, putting down her sandwich. "It's a cartoon. In the paper. Been around a long time. It's a little off-center and radical, and I like that."

"Do you know the name of the guy who draws it?"

Dubois scrunches up her face, thinking.

"Nope. No idea."

Dubois says she wouldn't know the cartoonist if she saw him, which is undeniable, since at the moment Trudeau is sitting four feet away. He is head-down, digging into his Caesar salad, doing his best to disappear. He hates things like this. Trudeau is so viscerally averse to self-promotion that he once threw up before a scheduled interview for a Time magazine cover story, then canceled it. (Time wrote the story anyway.)

I'm at Trudeau's elbow on a trip out West because I'm doing the first extensive profile of him in the 36 years since he began the comic strip that became an American icon. That's reason enough, but the fact is, something astonishing has happened to "Doonesbury" in the last 2 1/2 years, after the United States invaded Iraq and Trudeau made the startling, un-cartoonish decision to mutilate one of his characters.

It was not just any character. B.D. had been a Doonesbury fixture since Day One. Literally. On the day the strip debuted in 28 newspapers nationwide -- October 26, 1970 -- B.D. was alone in the opening panel, sitting in his dorm room on the first day of school, football helmet inexplicably on his head, wondering what kind of roommate he'd get. To his everlasting annoyance, it turned out to be Michael Doonesbury.

That was so many years ago -- a generation and a half, really -- that the strip has outlasted even its original cultural references. Does anyone remember that "B.D." were the initials of Brian Dowling, the hotshot quarterback at Yale when Trudeau was there in the late '60s? Or that in Eastern prep-school lexicon of the time, a "doone" was something of a doofus?

It's "Doonesbury" that survived and metamorphosed over the years into what is essentially an episodic comic novel, with so many active characters that Trudeau himself has been known to confuse them. "Doonesbury" has always remained topical, often controversial. Unapologetically liberal and almost religiously anti-establishment, Trudeau has been denounced by presidents and potentates and condemned on the floor of the U.S. Senate. He's also been described as America's greatest living satirist, mentioned in the same breath as Mark Twain and Ambrose Bierce.

But for simple dramatic impact and deft complexity of humor, nothing else in "Doonesbury" has ever approached the storyline of B.D's injury and convalescence. It hasn't been political at all, really, unless you contend that acknowledging the suffering of a war is a political statement. What it has been is remarkably poignant and surprisingly funny at the same time. In what Trudeau calls a "rolling experiment in naturalism," he has managed every few weeks to spoon out a story of war, loss and psychological turmoil in four-panel episodes, each with a crisp punch line.

Here's one :

It is a cliche, and it is also true, that humor springs from existential pain -- from a need to blunt the awareness that life is essentially a fatal disease of unpredictable symptoms and unknown duration. Usually, though, the laughter comes through indirection -- acknowledging that death awaits us all, for example, by joking about memory loss as we age. But there's been nothing comfortably oblique in these episodes of "Doonesbury," no comic exaggeration, no use of metaphor. There is no distance whatever between the pain and the humor.

Over the years, "Doonesbury" has been remarkably consistent in its quality, if not universally beloved. Republicans can make a reasonable case that Trudeau's lefty politics sometimes make him seem a water boy for Democrats. He is not above the occasional cheap shot, such as when he devoted an entire week in 1991 to a felon's unsubstantiated charges that Vice President Quayle had been a pothead. At times, he has seemed to lapse unattractively from political satire to political advocacy -- lending his characters' support to John Anderson in 1980 and Howard Dean in 2004. Some feel he has occasionally been tone-deaf to popular culture -- buying too readily, for example, into the notion of a slacker Generation Y. Undeniably, the strip's edge dulled a little in the mid-1990s, when a Democratic ascendancy left him without a meaty political issue to lampoon.

But there aren't many people -- especially among experts who read and critique comics for a living -- who are calling the continuing saga of B.D. anything other than genius.

"What it is," says comics historian R.C. Harvey, "is breathtaking. Just a stunning body of work."

SO, WHO IS TRUDEAU, REALLY?

It turns out he's not afraid of publicity so much as he's horrified at being perceived as the kind of person who wants publicity. He treasures his literary license to kill but feels a twinge of guilt that it isn't really a fair fight. He's a genuinely humble know-it-all. His regard for injured soldiers is sincere, his knowledge of their lingo profound, almost as if he's one of them; watching this, you can't help but hear faint, soul-rattling echoes of Vietnam, which he escaped, like many sons of privilege, by gaming the system. He's got the greatest job on Earth -- no boss, his own hours, enormous clout, public adulation, a seven-figure income, absolute creative freedom -- but he speaks with longing about a different career altogether, one that the huge success of "Doonesbury" ensured he'd never have.

Also, he's a smartass.

But you knew that.

IT'S MONDAY NIGHT OUT FOR THE MEATHEADS, as they call themselves. These are Trudeau and some of his best friends, who assemble irregularly on weeknights in Manhattan to attend excellently terrible movies their wives won't see with them. Today's choice is "Poseidon." They're pumped for a real stinker.

"A lot of research goes into this," Trudeau explains, "so we don't make many mistakes. We get these movies when they're dying, so we have the theater to ourselves. We like to talk to the screen."

"And throw popcorn."

This is David Levinthal, 57, who looks like the manager of a Jiffy Lube but is an acclaimed modern artist. Levinthal's medium is plastic toys: He arranges them in unusual ways, photographs them in intriguing lighting and sells the pictures for thousands of dollars. Not long ago he had a show entirely of made-in-Japan erotic dolls.

Levinthal is not the most unusual guy here. That would probably be Fred Newman, 53, who is, at this very moment, barking like a dog. It's the best imitation bark you'll ever hear. Newman's a professional sound-effects man, author of a popular how-to book called MouthSounds and is a regular whistle, boing and honk man for Garrison Keillor's "A Prairie Home Companion." When you're doing a woof, Newman is saying, the rookie error is to blow out. You've got to suck in.

We're sitting outdoors at an East Side Manhattan burrito joint, so Newman is entertaining more than just our table. He once taught Meryl Streep how to convince a radio audience that she was lighting a cigarette and blowing out the match, which isn't as easy as it sounds.

The guy with the graying ponytail is David Stanford, who handles the elaborate Doonesbury.com Web site and edits Trudeau's Doonesbury books.

Trudeau is the normal one. He "travels incognito," as Levinthal says. It's true. The guy could blend into a room of waiters. He dresses with an elaborate lack of vanity. He is a millionaire many times over, but Jane cuts his hair.

Dinner over, the meatheads assemble in the second row of a mostly empty downtown Manhattan theater, as the credits for "Poseidon" are beginning to roll. The meatheads are hoping this one will be a lot worse than the last film they saw, "Good Night, and Good Luck," which turned out to have some disappointingly redeeming qualities. The best worst recent choice was a Lou Diamond Phillips flick where a car exploded and then, in a later scene, the same car drove off a cliff.

In the opening minutes of "Poseidon," as the characters are being introduced, Trudeau and his friends start to loudly handicap who will live and who will drown. "You think Kurt Russell will live?"

"No, he'll die, because the kids are the future."

"Okay, right, he'll die, but he'll die saving people."

Popcorn is definitely being flung.

"The nasty guy's gonna die in a really bad way."

Fred is making excellent glub-glub noises.

"Richard Dreyfuss is suicidal? If he wants to die, then he won't die."

"Right, he needs to learn that life is a gift ."

If you've seen the movie, you know the meatheads were right about everything.

LIKE ANY SATIRIST WHOSE WORK ENDURES, Trudeau has been right about a lot of things. From the moment that hippie college deejay Mark Slackmeyer looked at the reader and gleefully declared that an as-yet-unindicted Attorney General John Mitchell was "Guilty! Guilty! Guilty!" Trudeau has shown a world-class instinct for piercing a babble of crosstalk and nailing the truth. He was right about Vietnam (When a conservative columnist said that he saw a "a light at the end of a tunnel," Michael asked him: "When you've dug yourself into a hole, why do you always insist on calling it a tunnel?"). Trudeau was right about the greed of '80s big business, about the cynicism of the marketing industry, about Bill Clinton's flippy-flop, polls-based approach to governance ("Doonesbury" regularly portrayed Clinton as a greasy waffle).

At times his prescience seemed more clairvoyant than calculated: During the waning years of the Reagan administration, Trudeau sent his trench-coated TV newsman, Roland Hedley, into the president's brain, where he confronted a desolate, soupy wasteland of fizzling synapses. It seemed funny then, if mean-spirited; if you look at those strips now, they're chilling.

Most recently, Trudeau was right about Iraq. As the invasion began amid optimistic forecasts of a quick and decisive victory, before mandatory re-ups became routine, National Guardsman B.D. matter-of-factly informed his stunned wife, Boopsie, that he'd see her again "in five to seven years."

Surely, after three decades of being right, the man is bound to be a little smug. I went searching for signs of this in his studio, an airy fourth-floor walkup in the East Seventies. Though the walls are covered with original classic comic art -- Saul Steinberg, Jeff MacNelly, George Herriman's "Krazy Kat" and Winsor McCay's "Little Nemo in Slumberland" -- there is no "Doonesbury" visible anywhere. Just . . . nothing.

"Why would I have my own art up?" Trudeau asks. "I want to show the work of people I admire."

The quality of Trudeau's drawing has been a matter of some debate in the cartooning world since the strip's debut. Back then, a common joke was that Trudeau had "made the comics pages safe for bad art," which was, in a sense, true. Before there were Dilbert" and "Pearls Before Swine" and other strips drawn with meticulous infantilism, there was "Doonesbury," which resembled, in its early years, the sort of thing someone's moderately talented kid brother scribbled into the flyleaf of his textbook.

There was nothing meticulous about it. Trudeau was consciously trying to imitate Jules Feiffer's sparsely sophisticated style, but he didn't progress much past sparse. Sometimes he just didn't bother giving his characters mouths. They never had feet -- their legs would just flutter off the page in mid-calf. Heads would swivel in physiologically irreproducible ways.

Over time -- particularly after Trudeau's famed 20-month hiatus in 1983 and 1984, when he allowed his characters to ripen into reluctant adulthood off the page -- he seemed to learn the fundamentals of cartooning, and then some. The art in "Doonesbury" became far more professional, with inventive angles, cinematic shading, even intimations of an occasional foot. This led to a widespread suspicion that Trudeau was getting major help from the man who ostensibly just did his inking -- a suspicion nudged into an assumption a few years ago when Entertainment Weekly stated flatly that Trudeau wasn't drawing it himself.

"For years," he says, laughing, "I was blamed for my art, and then I couldn't get credit for it."

For the record, the art is his. I'm looking right now at Trudeau's pencil drawings of a recent week of "Doonesburys" before they were sent to the inker. They are rich in detail, identical to the finished version, and every line is Trudeau's, even the lettering.

"It's serviceable, is the best I can say about it," Trudeau demurs. "I will say this: It's a signature style. It doesn't look like anyone else's." Even this modest bit of immodesty does not go immediately unpunished.

"But my stuff's amateur hour compared to this."

Trudeau is pulling open a drawer. Inside are a few originals drawn by the great Walt Kelly, whose "Pogo" strips of the 1940s and '50s were among the first to mine politics for humor. Kelly was a masterful artist. "Look at this -- this one's pure motion," Trudeau says. "And look at this detail; look at the bugs." It was a single-panel Sunday strip of the Pogo characters poling a raft through their swamp. Even the tiniest characters -- insects a few millimeters high -- had expressive faces.

Eventually, I did find some Doonesiana displayed in Trudeau's studio. There were nine framed covers of major magazines -- Time, Newsweek, Rolling Stone, Mother Jones, etc., spanning 30 years, all either drawn by Trudeau or about him. And yes, Trudeau's got 'em right up there, framed, on a wall, plain as day, inside a closet where he stores pushpins and computer paper.

ON THE MORNING OF April 19, 2004, newspaper readers were served something startling with their morning coffee. The first panel of "Doonesbury" was completely black, except for the word "Hey." Then, framed by the smoke of war, a soldier's face. It's Ray Hightower, B.D.'s buddy. He's sweating, looking scared. He calls for a medic. Then, black again, as though someone is drifting in and out of consciousness. The gut-punch line comes at the end, with a shouted name. "B.D.?"

And here is the image people saw two days later:

It was shocking for obvious reasons, but in another way, as well: B.D. had never been seen without his helmet. It was as if Trudeau was declaring that something fundamentally and forever had changed.

Ask creative people where they get their ideas, and they will roll their eyes. It's the most common question, but it's also a bad one because the answer is inevitably disappointing. From the inside, creativity seems like an arduous task, often involving plebeian, imperfect choices, driven less by inspiration than by deadline. And Trudeau is a deadline junkie, always pushing it to the limit. ("Once a week," he says, "I am a very desperate man.")

So when you ask him why he decided to take B.D.'s leg, the answer isn't very satisfying. Trudeau doesn't regard his characters in romanticized terms, or even as people; "Doonesbury" has always been more about ideas than personalities, so Trudeau thinks of Mike and B.D. and Zonker and Joanie as puppets. He pulls the appropriate ones out of the closet when he has a point he wants to make. In this case, he says, he wanted to make a statement about the suffering in this war.

Originally, he was going to kill Ray, but Ray got spared when Trudeau decided that a death would not leave much of a storyline to pursue. So, with a bit of sang-froid, he amputated B.D.'s left leg, on the theory that he'd . . . think of something.

What happened next was unusual, to say the least. Within a day or two of B.D. lying broken on that stretcher, Garry Trudeau, bane of every presidential administration since Nixon's (particularly the current one, which he has absolutely lacerated), got a call from the Pentagon. The brass was offering to help him figure out where to go next.

THE TYPICAL DAILY NEWSPAPER COMIC STRIP HAS A DEGENERATIVE ARC. The cartoonist's best years come early, when the ideas are fresh, the gimmick is still a novelty and the grind of daily deadlines has not yet taken its toll on creativity. Three years of excellence is a pretty good run before the inevitable decline, as the cartoonist runs out of new things to say and becomes content to imitate himself. It's easy to forget, but many of today's formulaic, intellectually listless strips, such as "B.C.," "Cathy" and "Dennis the Menace," were once lively and daring and different. They're still around because their bland familiarity becomes a sort of comfort food, and newspaper editors are loath to drop them.

"Having a successful daily comic strip," Trudeau says wryly, "is the closest thing to tenure that popular culture offers. But it doesn't seem to have freed up creativity any more than tenure for professors has. It's been an open invitation for complacency."

"Doonesbury" has never become complacent, partly because Trudeau is no ordinary creative talent but also because the strip feeds continually off the culture it lampoons. Trudeau is very much a reporter -- what Newsweek's Jonathan Alter once called "an investigative cartoonist." When two of his principal characters were homeless, Trudeau spent time working in shelters. When "Doonesbury" accompanied President Ford to China, so did Trudeau. When B.D. served in the Persian Gulf War, Trudeau briefly went to Kuwait. So when the new invitation came from the Pentagon -- essentially, carte blanche to visit injured vets -- the investigative cartoonist leapt at it, not sure what he would find.

The very first person he spoke to was a 27-year-old MP named Danielle Green. She had been a college basketball star, a left-handed point guard at Notre Dame. Green had just lost that hand in Iraq. She'd been on the roof of a police station, behind sandbags, trying to defend it from enemy fire, when she took a direct hit from a rocket-propelled grenade.

"This was an elite athlete, and she'd lost her whole professional identity," Trudeau said, "but that's not what she wanted to talk about. What she wanted to talk about was how her buddies carried her down, put her on the hood of a Humvee, where they stopped the bleeding, then went back up to the roof, against orders, and found her hand buried under sandbags. They took off her wedding ring and gave it to her. She's telling me this with a million-dollar smile. This was not about bitterness or loss. It was about gratitude."

And so Trudeau started taking notes.

"DOONESBURY" HAS DEALT WITH EMOTIONAL SUBJECTS BEFORE, most notably when gay lawyer Andy Lippincott died of AIDS in 1989, wisecracking to the end. Trudeau was never entirely satisfied with that sequence, because Andy was two-dimensional -- literally and figuratively. He became a bravely noble funny man dying with bravely noble humor. "Andy handled it with more grace and humility than any human would," Trudeau says. The problem was, Trudeau hadn't known people with AIDS.

The access he has had to injured vets has given him a sure-handedness he didn't have then; the B.D. storyline has shown extraordinary emotional complexity.

At a VA program for post-traumatic stress disorder in Menlo Park, Calif., Trudeau was allowed to sit in on the treatment of a 40-year-old military truck driver who had been delivering a weapons system to Baghdad airport when his convoy came under fire. He to flee through a crowd -- just as Trudeau would later have B.D. do.

"The guy was back home, living with his parents, isolated with his TV, his PC and his alcohol," Trudeau says, consulting his notes. "He hated public places and would only go shopping at night at 24-hour stores, when no one was around. He told us he was late for a job interview, but he had an hour, and it wasn't an hour away. It turned out he had to go by back roads, because he would not drive under an overpass. Overpasses freaked him out." Overpasses could give snipers cover.

"He was a computer expert, but he decided to take a $10-an-hour job over a $25-an-hour job," Trudeau said, "because he wanted to work at a nursery, with plants. It was only when he talked about working with plants that his face softened."

HE'S GARRY, NOT GARY, BECAUSE HIS GIVEN NAME IS GARRETSON. Trudeau is a blueblood, albeit one of a strange sort. The boring summary is that he's the end-of-the-line son of four generations of physicians. But to leave it there would be a grave disservice to the narrative arts.

Trudeau's great-great- grandfather, James de Berty Trudeau, was a friend of John James Audubon, for whom he shot birds. He lived in the wilds with the Osage Indians in the Louisiana territories. Oh, and he was a medical doctor in 19th-century New York City who ran afoul of his peers over his hobby of sculpting amusing figurines of the most dignified medical men of his era. To this they did not take kindly, drumming him out of polite society and down to New Orleans.

During the Civil War, he was made a brigadier general in the Confederate Army, apparently more for his status as a gentleman than for his military prowess. In short order, he assisted in the mismanagement of not one but two enormous Confederate defeats -- Shiloh, which was the turning point of the war, and the battle of Island No. 10, which left the Mississippi undefended clear to Vicksburg. Who knows how many more miserable, crushing losses he would have helped midwife, had he not been captured, held under house arrest and released to continue his medical practice?

Meanwhile, the general's wife had left him and headed for Paris, where their son -- Trudeau's great-grandfather, a lad of just 10 or so -- distinguished himself by whapping the Confederate ambassador in the back with a pellet from a slingshot. ("Actually, I see a lot of myself in him," Trudeau laughs.)

Tuberculosis ravaged the family, which brought the next generations of Trudeau doctors to the fresh air of Saranac Lake, N.Y., in the Adirondacks, where they set up the nation's first TB research sanitorium. Garry's father, Francis Trudeau, was the town's family physician, a man with grave responsibilities and appropriately sober mien. He once informed his son: "Life is not something to be enjoyed, so just get on with it," a statement so splendid and outrageous it would eventually find its way into "Doonesbury."

Francis Trudeau was dignified and reserved, and a father figure to an entire city. "I would hear him leave the house at 4 a.m., sometimes in snowshoes. I knew even then that the sense of mission was too big for me to take on."

Eleven years ago, Francis called his son into his den, handed him a medical book and asked him to read an entry on a relatively rare illness called amyloidosis. "Now," Francis said, "as you can see from the prognosis at the bottom of the page. . ." That is the way Garry learned his father was dying.

We're sitting on the roof deck of Trudeau's studio, talking about the cartoonist's famous aversion to publicity. The conversation goes right to his father.

"Late in his career, he was sued by a patient. He didn't share it with me for three years. It was nothing, just a nuisance suit that was thrown out, but it shattered him to have his integrity challenged in a public forum. I grew up in a household where reputation was placed above all else."

So?

"So it helped me when fame was introduced into the mix."

There's a difference between reputation and image, Trudeau explains. "These get confused in people's minds," he says, but one involves character, the other public relations.

"I just refused to get entangled by issues of image maintenance that fame implied. I made a deliberate retreat from a publicly visible life."

What resulted was an unusual guy with a wall between his public and private selves, a guy who is intellectually fearless but so personally unassuming, Jane Pauley says, "that's he's afraid to return a shirt that's the wrong size."

"Inside Garry, there's a little boy and a man," Pauley says. "And the little boy is secretive and vulnerable, and the man isn't. It would hurt him if I made a joke at his expense, but if the president of the United States says something negative about him, he puts it on the cover of his book."

"SUFFICE IT TO SAY THAT I HOLD HIM IN UTTER CONTEMPT."

This is John McCain, the former prisoner of war, speaking about Trudeau on the floor of the U.S. Senate in 1995. He was angered by a "Doonesbury" strip suggesting that presidential candidate Bob Dole was exploiting his war injury for political gain. That was then. This past year, it was McCain who wrote the introduction to Trudeau's The Long Road Home , a for-charity book compiling the strips about B.D.'s injury and recovery.

A curious thing has happened to Trudeau's image as a result of the B.D. subplot -- nothing the cartoonist could have predicted. The predictable, in fact, happened almost immediately: Calling Trudeau a "committed leftist," Fox News Channel host Bill O'Reilly wrote in an online column that "a case can be made that Trudeau is attempting to sap the morale of Americans vis-à-vis Iraq by using a long-running, somewhat beloved cartoon character to create pathos."

O'Reilly doesn't talk about Trudeau anymore. He can't, really.

We're in Tucson, at the National Leadership Conference of the Vietnam Veterans of America, where Trudeau is about to take the stage to receive the group's award for excellence in the arts. These are fifty- and sixtysomething guys, many with ponytails, tattoos, ample guts and an attitude. They weren't treated right; they want better for new vets, returning home scarred.

This is a potentially tricky audience for Trudeau's acceptance speech. As they've aged, their politics have moved rightward, and many of them have a lingering distaste for antiwar talk, particularly from people they might consider draft dodgers. (Back in 1970, Trudeau pulled a disastrously low draft-lottery number -- 27, which he later bestowed on his slacker surfer-dude character, Zonker, in the strip. Trudeau wound up getting a medical deferment because of old stomach ulcers that hadn't given him trouble for years, and haven't since. His dad the doctor suggested he try that.)

As apolitical as the B.D. story is, elsewhere in the strip Trudeau regularly unleashes his disgust for the Iraq war and the man who is waging it. Trudeau's time at Yale overlapped with George W. Bush's -- he knew him slightly and disliked him even then, largely for what he saw as a sense of smug entitlement ("all noblesse and no oblige.") In the strip, often on Sundays, with maximum readership, Trudeau just kills Bush. One Sunday this year, Michael Doonesbury and his old friend Bernie were discussing the Iraq war and wondering whether it keeps the president awake at night because of its enormous, heartbreaking human toll. In the final panel, Trudeau cuts to a signature exterior nighttime view of the White House. From inside come two dialogue balloons: "What's wrong, dear?" And: "It's the stem cells. I hear their cries."

So is Trudeau going to play it safe in this speech and stay away from politics? I'm apparently not the only one wondering. The instant the cartoonist rises to take the mike, a large American flag behind him suddenly and inexplicably crashes to the ground. From a group of organizers near me comes a whisper, "Oh [expletive], not a good sign."

The speech starts benignly, praising the courage of the soldiers he had met, but here's how Trudeau wraps it up:

"When I talk to wounded veterans, I usually don't ask them what they think the mission was. I don't presume, because their lives are wrenching enough without the suggestion that their sacrifices may have been without meaning. Moreover, if that is so, it will become apparent to them soon enough . . . The young men and women who we've repeatedly put in harm's way are paying the price for this misbegotten mission, and as long as it continues, I, like so many of our countrymen, must walk this strange line between hating the war but honoring the warrior. I don't know how long we can keep it up. . ."

He finishes to a standing ovation.

If there had been any lingering antipathy to Trudeau in this crowd, the story of B.D. appears to have wiped it out. It's as though he's been in the jungle with these guys.

IT IS A BALMY 90 DEGREES AT NIGHT IN TUCSON. In a patio outside the convention hotel, Vietnam veterans are slow-dancing with their wives, in a mournful shuffle, to a live band's version of "A Whiter Shade of Pale."

"She said, There is no reason, and the truth is plain to see . . ."

If there is one thing this convention has made plain, it's that plenty of Vietnam vets still live with the madness of that war, still suffer from PTSD. You can hear it in their stories, read it in their eyes. It won't be different in this war. B.D.'s story is fiction, but it is true.

Inside at the bar, Trudeau and I have taken shelter from the heat. We're discussing whether he believes in God ("Why should I? Is there anything in the last five years in particular that suggests to you a divine purpose to life?") and whether he thinks Bush is evil or just stupid. ("I think he is smart but willfully ignorant, and he uses his ignorance for strategic advantage, which is appalling. He substitutes belief for thought. It protects you from self-doubt.") The only fact marring the sepulchral seriousness of this conversation is that it is occurring as we sit side by side on full-size Western saddles, mounted on poles, facing the bar. There's an enthusiastic cowboy theme here.

You can take only so much of that, so we grab our drinks, dismount and mosey on over to a table.

Trudeau claims that he never thinks about "Doonesbury" unless he is actually drawing it; it may be true, but it's misleading. He's a born listener, and, in a sense, he is always thinking about "Doonesbury" and filing things away.

At the table is a filmmaker named Chuck Lacy, who just produced a documentary called "The War Tapes," which followed three National Guardsmen to Iraq and back home. Lacy is saying there is something about this war unlike any other in history. The Internet has made it possible for soldiers to be in country, in a theater of war, but still communicate daily with their families, in real time, sometimes with video.

Is that good or bad? Trudeau asks.

Both, says Lacy: The soldiers say it's their lifeline, but it's also a terrible drain on their emotions; they're dealing not only with their own anxieties but also with the anxieties of their families 6,000 miles away. It can be surreal. They'll come back from a firefight and then try to resolve a mortgage problem.

A few weeks after returning from Tucson, I opened the newspaper to "Doonesbury" and saw this.

It was Day One of what would be a very funny, oddly disturbing week of the strip, in which Ray tries to stay alive while placating his wife and stepson back at the home front. I immediately e-mailed Trudeau. Until I told him, he said, he hadn't remembered exactly where the idea came from.

"CLINTON MADE A MISTAKE in letting 'Don't ask, don't tell' be the defining issue of his first month in office, to be followed by the health-care disaster. He should have gone directly to welfare reform. It was intellectually dishonest to say the existing system was working. If welfare had been his biggest priority . . ."

We are on the plane heading back to New York , and Trudeau is in his geek-drone mode. He is a highly opinionated public policy wonk, and this sort of thing just happens from time to time. When he reads a book, he edits in the margins, correcting errors of grammar, syntax or cloudy thinking.

Bingo. Trudeau's a nerd! It's no big deal, but I'll take it. Negative assessments are important when you write profiles, but with this guy they've been hard to come by. He's generous with his time, gracious to everyone and shrewd with me. I tried to bait him, asking where a dillweed like him gets off having the nerve to date Candice Bergen (he did, way back when) and then marry America's Sweetheart? I was hoping for an unattractive defense of his virility, but Trudeau wouldn't bite.

Finally, in desperation, I decided to get help from America's greatest living satirist. What would Trudeau ridicule, if the subject were himself?

Basically, he says, though not in so many words -- he's a bully.

"Occasionally, people accuse me of courage," he says. "And that's wrong. I'm sitting on a perch of safety. Cartoonists have a tar-baby immunity. The more people react to us, and the more angrily they react, the better it is for us. So we're invulnerable. It just doesn't seem fair."

The first George Bush learned that the hard way. When "Doonesbury" accused him of having "put his manhood in a blind trust" after becoming vice president and changing his politics to match Reagan's, Bush repeatedly lashed out at the cartoonist -- at least five times between 1984 and 1988. ("Garry Trudeau is coming out of deep left field. The American people are going to be speaking out, and we are going to see whether they side with 'Doonesbury' or the Reagan-Bush message." "He speaks for a bunch of brie-tasting, Chardonnay-sipping elitists.") This blowback further elevated Trudeau's stature and made Bush seem like a petulant, humorless old fud.

As the plane begins its descent to LaGuardia, Trudeau remembers something interesting, something from his teens, when he had a summer job working at Time magazine.

"As I was walking out the building one day on my lunch break, two-thirds of a block away this spectacularly beautiful young woman in a very short miniskirt was walking toward me . . ."

Not sure where this is going, but I'm taking notes as fast as I can.

"She was in her early twenties. I was 16 and looked all of 12. You could feel it in the air, her coming at you. Her presence was destabilizing the street for a one-block radius. Guys were gawking, cars were slowing. This woman was a menace. She was walking in a confident way, with a swing to her hips. I was geeky and shy, too shy to make eye contact. I wouldn't even have known what to DO with eye contact. My discomfort must have been obvious because, as she passes me, she leans over, her breath is warm, and she softly . . . growls in my ear."

Wow.

"I thought to myself: I've just been handed the most extraordinary gift. She showed such wisdom, with such a generous use of power. She just changed the life of a young boy. I thought , Anything is possible."

Trudeau sits back in his seat, smiles. "So I guess you could connect the dots to Jane, actually."

DOJ_NMG_0084679

Or you could extrapolate it to the entirety of his life, the whole improbable arc of it, the combination of a fundamental humility and humanity empowered by an otherwise inexplicable, blazing self-confidence. You could find, in one moment from a man's teens, the entire key to who he is and the unlikely, monumental achievement of his professional life.

I vocalize some of this. Trudeau just looks at me.

Okay, we'll just stick with connecting the dots to Jane.

TRUDEAU IS A YANKEES FAN, so we're catching a Sunday afternoon game at Yankee Stadium against the White Sox. Some people's lives just seem to be charmed, and so it's not surprising that this afternoon turns out to be historic -- Yankees great Mariano Rivera comes in with a 6-4 lead and closes out the last two innings for the 400th save of his career.

At one point, Trudeau's attentions turn to the ballpark itself -- specifically, the facing of the mezzanine deck, a long, narrow strip that, as in many modern stadiums, is used as an electronic crowd-hooching display board. "The dimensions are about 1 to 20," Trudeau says, "but see how much they get out of it, how much they say with just a suggestion? That's great use of design."

Trudeau's got a master's degree in graphic design. It was his first career choice until "Doonesbury" -- a success right from his college newspaper days -- made everything else moot. Design remains, to this day, the thing Trudeau longs to be doing. In all the time we'd spent together, the only artwork of his that he'd shown me with any particular pride were "Doonesbury"-themed coasters, cups, T-shirts and figurines that he had designed for free. They wound up raising $1 million for a Starbucks-sponsored reading charity. It was a subtle piece of work, marrying the Starbucks corporate logos and design with the Doonesbury characters.

"I had more flow as a designer," Trudeau explains. "I could just drop down into the zone and stay there for hours. With cartooning, I'm constantly coming up for air, procrastinating, looking for reasons not to be doing it. I spend all day granting myself special dispensation, with 'creative process' as my cover story. Carpenters and deli countermen can't do that, so I think they may feel better about themselves at the end of the day."

Midway through the game, Trudeau's younger son shows up. Tommy, 20, a student at Brown, has a summer job in the Yankees' front office. He gets to fraternize with the players and play pickup softball games with co-workers in the outfield, from which he's hit balls into the upper deck. Not bad, for a summer job.

Pauley and Trudeau's two other children, twins Ross and Rickie, are both 22. Ross graduated from Brown and is heading off on a teaching career; his sister, a Yalie, wants to be a pop singer, which worries Trudeau more than a little.

He played me an audio file of Rickie singing Alicia Keys's "I Ain't Got You." Kid's definitely got the voice. It's all personality. Trudeau knows this but also knows the odds against success in that business. "I want her to follow her passion," he says, "but I just hope she's sturdy enough."

It's an interesting worry for a guy who could easily have been a doctor in a long-established family practice, but chose cartooning despite certain initial practical obstacles, such as a basic inability to draw. Being a father inspires a completely different risk-aversion calculus.

As we leave the stadium, the three of us are joined at the subway by Ross, who was sitting elsewhere with friends. The camaraderie between father and sons is effortless and unencumbered. The whole family thing seems almost comic-strippy perfect, like Dagwood and Blondie and Cookie and Alexander. Only this is real family, not to mention a "Doonesbury" family, so you know you're going to have some complexity, somewhere.

AT 55, JANE PAULEY IS STILL BEAUTIFUL, and she still projects frank vulnerability, or vulnerable frankness, or whatever is that subtle combination of qualities that made her America's preeminent morning-show host in the 1980s. We're meeting for breakfast because there is something Trudeau wouldn't really talk about, and Pauley will.

In 2001, Pauley nearly lost her mind. After receiving steroids to control a case of the hives, she began doing oddly intense things. How intense? She bought a house one day, for no good reason, on impulse, from an ad on the Web. Misdiagnosed with depression, she was hospitalized under an assumed name, to protect her privacy. Eventually, she was found to have a bipolar disorder -- triggered but not caused by the steroids -- for which she is still undergoing treatment. Pauley chronicled her struggle in a 2004 memoir, Skywriting .

Trudeau was largely absent from Skywriting , and he had been guarded with me about the effect of Pauley's illness on him and the family. He volunteered only two things: "I was told by a doctor that 40 percent of marriages just don't survive it, so from the beginning I knew we were up against something really significant"; and, "The disease subverts your basic survival instinct in the sense that the people who you need to help you survive are the same people you are attacking."

So that's what I ask Pauley about.

"Yes," she says, dryly, "there is a free-floating anger that needs a target and will find one."

For a year or so, Pauley says, before her symptoms were under control, Trudeau and the family lived with her irrational rages. The twins were hunting for colleges, Trudeau was pressed by deadline after deadline, and Mom was a fulminating piece of work -- demanding, histrionic, impossible. "It was just incredible torment for them," Pauley says. "Garry was keeping the house together. It has to have been the most painful part of his life."

Pauley has recovered with the help of lithium, a drug she says she will be on for the rest of her life. Things are mostly fine, she says, except for some side effects, such as a persistent tremor to the hands. She looks murderously at her coffee cup, which the waiter has overfilled, almost to the brim.

"For example, I can't risk trying to pick that up."

Pauley thinks the story of B.D. has been something special, the best work Trudeau has ever done. And then she says:

"I don't think he's consciously aware that it has anything to do with me."

With . . . her?

Pauley smiles. "Garry's mind is very compartmentalized. The department doing the strip in his brain is not directly connected to the husband part, but . . ."

Pauley takes a forkful of scrambled eggs.

". . . it defies credulity that on some level it is not present in his work. What is he writing about, really? He's writing about mental illness, and how it's possible to find a way out of it, with help. It's very hopeful."

I start to say that Trudeau has never made that connection to me, in fact denies that his private life ever intrudes into the strip. But Pauley is ahead of me.

"He'll want to say no, but it's hard to argue with. Isn't it?"

TRUDEAU'S GREATEST WORK is coming at a time when "Doonesbury" is fading a bit from the national consciousness. He's still in 600 newspapers, but that number has been higher; there simply aren't as many newspapers as there once were, and their readership is dwindling. Young adults who know "Doonesbury" today are mostly picking it up haphazardly from the Web. The "Doonesbury" compilation books are not selling the way they used to.

Trudeau is considering experimenting with sophisticated animation, for "Doonesbury" online. He's just finished a screenplay, a comedy about a teenager who is elected mayor of a small town. His newest "Doonesbury" compilation -- The War Within , about B.D. dealing with his mental health issues -- has just hit the bookstores, and a second compilation, Heckuva Job, Bushie , is due out this month.

Since I last saw him, the investigative cartoonist traveled to New Orleans to see the hurricane desolation firsthand. This past September 11, as politicians on both sides sought political traction in a battle of coordinated outrage and strategic shows of grief, the meatheads took in pro wrestling at Madison Square Garden. (In the main event, Vince McMahon defeated Triple H with the help of a folding chair.)

And week after week in the newspapers, the quite remarkable story of B.D. continues. Check out this one.

Let's see what's going on here. B.D. appears to be considering cheating on Boopsie, which hasn't happened to our knowledge in 20-plus years of an eccentric but strong marriage. It's surprising, but maybe not that surprising. From the swiftness and specificity of Celeste's reaction, it's clear that she -- the secretary at the vets' clinic -- has seen this sort of behavior before. Can it be that many vets who've lost a limb might well be tempted to assert their manhood in unwise ways? But see how nimbly Celeste deals with it, in what one might call a generous use of power? She redirects B.D.'s attention to what's really important, reproaching him for hitting on her, but in a way that leaves his vulnerable dignity intact.

There are many types of therapy, and it's not all dispensed by licensed professionals.

Four panels. Forty-eight words. Funny, too.

Meanwhile, the same day, in "Blondie," Dagwood and Herb go fishing, but Dagwood is so hungry he eats the bait!

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Burden Of Enron's Collapse On Skilling (AP)

By JUAN A. LOZANO, The Associated Press

AP, October 22, 2006

HOUSTON - Ken Lay's death wiped away his convictions. Andrew Fastow got a reduced six-year sentence. That leaves former CEO Jeffrey Skilling as the sole top Enron Corp. executive who could be given at least 20 years in prison when he is sentenced Monday for helping orchestrate the biggest corporate scandal in U.S. history.

DOJ_NMG_0084681

In addition to the legal consequences of his actions, the burden of lost jobs, worthless pension plans and ruined lives that resulted from Enron's 2001 collapse has now shifted solely onto Skilling's shoulders.

Lay's death and the lighter than expected sentence handed last month to Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, will work against Skilling when he faces sentencing, former federal prosecutor Robert Mintz said.

Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Lay, Enron's founder, was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases. His death in July vacated those convictions.

Both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew an illusion of success was propped up by accounting maneuvers that hid debt and inflated profits.

"In theory, the death of Ken Lay should have no impact on the sentence that Mr. Skilling receives. But it's hard to ignore the reality that Jeff Skilling is now standing alone as the figurehead who orchestrated Enron's demise," Mintz said. "There will certainly be pressure to make an example of Jeff Skilling and send a message with his sentence."

Skilling has had two brushes with the law since his indictment on Enron charges. Last month, Skilling pleaded no contest and paid a fine to settle his arrest in Dallas for public intoxication. In April 2004, he was involved in a scuffle with patrons of a cigar bar in New York City. He wasn't arrested, but he and his wife, Rebecca, who was hurt in the incident, were taken to a hospital where a blood test showed Skilling's blood-alcohol level to be 0.19.

Under federal sentencing guidelines, which U.S. District Judge Sim Lake has said he will rely on, Skilling faces more than 20 years in prison if investor loss tied to his actions exceeds $80 million. Skilling also faces more than $18 million in fines for his crimes.

Prosecutors and Skilling's attorneys have agreed on an investor loss figure, but it is in sealed court documents and none of the lawyers would discuss it.

"The government and we have agreed on a loss number to avoid a protracted hearing on the subject," Skilling's attorney Daniel Petrocelli said. "Any sentence is a meaningful sentence. I don't want to talk about or speculate on the length of it."

Kirby Behre, a former federal prosecutor in Washington and an expert on federal sentencing guidelines, said Skilling will probably get more than 20 years in prison but an exact figure is hard to determine without knowing the final calculation of investor loss.

Charles Prestwood, a former pipeline operator for Enron who lost $1.3 million in retirement savings with Enron's bankruptcy, said if it was up to him, Skilling would get 100 years in prison.

"I think about all the families that man helped destroy and all the hard working people that believed the top executives," he said. "He knows he broke the law. He knows he's done us wrong. I'll always believe until I go to my grave that man knew exactly what he was doing."

Prestwood said he is not surprised Skilling, who professed his innocence before and after his trial, has asked that his convictions be dismissed.

"He'll go down to the wire trying to say he is innocent," he said.

The 68-year-old Prestwood, who has heart problems, said he's been saving his strength to speak at Skilling's sentencing.

Lake is allowing Enron's victims to speak about how the company's financial implosion hurt them. Ten to 12 people who signed up in advance are expected to speak at the sentencing, as well as some who will talk on Skilling's behalf. A list of speakers was not available.

The collapse wiped out thousands of jobs, more than $60 billion in market value and more than $2 billion in pension plans.

Rod Jordan, chairman of the Severed Enron Employee Coalition, said it is easier for ex-workers to focus their anger and frustration on Skilling now that Lay is gone. Many, he said, always believed Skilling was guilty while they had doubts about Lay.

"It was more due to their personalities," he said. "Lay was more of a people oriented person. Skilling was more behind the scenes. He came across as more arrogant and self centered and not the cheery, 'hi-how-are-you' kind of guy that Lay was."

Lake has allowed attorneys representing ex-Enron workers who took part in the company's savings plan and its employee stock ownership plan to speak on their request for restitution from Skilling.

Robin Harrison, one of the attorneys representing about 20,000 such people, put his clients' losses at an estimated $1.3 billion.

Petrocelli said Enron's former workers will probably talk about their losses, but that shouldn't affect the sentence Skilling gets.

"While that is undoubtedly true, it doesn't assist in the determination of Mr. Skilling's sentence, at least in our view," he said. "Mr. Skilling is not criminally responsible for the demise of Enron."

Prosecutors want Skilling to turn over nearly $183 million, which they allege he pocketed while participating in fraud. The U.S. government had divided that amount between Skilling and Lay. But Lay's death has left that amount solely on Skilling.

The government contends about $60 million in Skilling's cash and property that has been frozen since his indictment could be applied to the total amount they are seeking.

Petrocelli has said Skilling owes his legal defense team more than $30 million beyond the $23 million that the Justice Department allowed Skilling to set aside for legal fees before it froze his assets.

Brian Durbin, a small-time Enron investor who spoke at Fastow's sentencing last month, encouraged people affected by Enron's collapse to attend Skilling's sentencing.

"It might help them get a little bit of closure and help the rest of the country see there was a human face to this," he said. "Greed drove the actions of a few to make really bad decisions. What they did had such a wide reaching impact for so many people."

Pressure In The Boardroom (MINNST)

By David Phelps, Star Tribune

Minneapolis Star Tribune, October 22, 2006

Richard Burke faces the difficult task of rebuilding UnitedHealth's reputation and righting a board perceived as having strayed from its oversight role.

To fix a board gone bad, UnitedHealth Group Inc. turned to the guy who started the company's big push for profits 30 years ago.

Richard Burke, the new chairman of UnitedHealth Group, has a long history in Minnesota health care. In the 1980s, Burke ran a small company, then called UnitedHealthcare, that managed one of Minnesota's first HMOs, Physicians Health Plan (PHP). PHP eventually became Medica while UnitedHealth grew under William McGuire into the country's second-biggest health insurer.

Now, after McGuire's ouster a week ago in a stock-option scandal, Burke, 62, is presiding over a company with a badly wounded reputation and a board whose future is in doubt.

More than a dozen shareholder lawsuits await the company in federal court. The Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the Minnesota attorney general's office are sifting through corporate documents looking for legal violations.

"This is a board scrambling to catch up on something they let get out of control," said Patrick McGurn, executive vice president of Institutional Shareholder Services, an influentional research firm that advises large shareholders on merger proposals and corporate governance matters. "They allowed so much to happen on their watch."I'd be surprised if in three years any of those board members are still around," he said.

Fred Zimmerman, a recently retired professor of manufacturing at the University of St. Thomas who also has served on the board of directors at 14 corporations, described the board as woefully weak in its response to the options scandal.

"The entire compensation committee should have stepped down, also some of the lead directors," Zimmerman said.

Backdating for profit

To some, Burke was a visionary who opened the closed walls of traditional HMOs and gave patients a greater choice of care. But to the doctors who worked for PHP, Burke was too profit-oriented, an assertion that still lingers with UnitedHealth.

"He was years ahead of the rest of the world," said Doug Leatherdale, retired CEO of the St. Paul Companies Inc. and a board member of UnitedHealth since its beginning.

"He's a very smart guy who really innovated a lot in the industry," said Minneapolis attorney Tim Thornton, who represented PHP in the mid-1980s.

Burke returned to the chairmanship of UnitedHealth Group last week, the result of the Sunday-night reshuffle that cost McGuire his role as chairman and CEO of the Minnetonka-based health care giant.

The company's general counsel, David Lubben, and 15-year board member William Spears also were gone when the dust settled from a stock-option backdating scandal that had been percolating since March.

A report conducted at the board's request by the Washington law firm of Wilmer Cutler Pickering Hale and Dorr questioned the propriety of a 1999 employment agreement with McGuire and concluded that options "were likely backdated," to allow top executives to maximize their profits when they exercised those options.

The report also raised red flags about the private business relationship between McGuire and Spears, who was head of the board's compensation committee when the employment contract was negotiated. McGuire gave Spears personal amounts ranging from $15 million to $55 million to manage professionally and also invested in Spears' financial management company.

In addition to the personnel changes, the company pledged to strengthen internal management and accounting procedures, create a new executive position of chief legal officer and replace five board seats with new independent directors in the next three years.

McGurn called the board's actions "a day late and a lot of dollars short."

Business as usual?

On Thursday, Burke, as a nonexecutive chairman, took the unusual step of participating in the company's conference call with Wall Street analysts to discuss third-quarter financial results. Burke's presence showed the board's support for Stephen Hemsley, the new CEO.

"Steve is a very easy drill on contracts that involve him," Burke joked with the analysts. "It'll be very easy to take advantage of him."

Burke also went out of his way to minimize industry rumors that Executive Vice President Richard Anderson was the board's first choice for CEO. "There was nobody else considered," Burke said.

Stephen Parente, an associate professor at the University of Minnesota's Carlson School of Management who studies the managed care industry, said Burke is a vote for continuity, because he's been there since the company's inception in 1977.

"In some respects, this is a guy who can bookend McGuire's beginning and end," Parente said. "This move is perceived as the board saying, 'We want to bring in someone with no strikes against them and someone who has a solid history of the place.' "

Burke, who grew up in Georgia and North Carolina, started UnitedHealthcare in the mid-1970s and built it into one of the largest HMO managers in the country. But there were dark days in the 1980s as managed care struggled to gain favor in the medical community.

"For the first few years we were not on the strongest financial footing," Leatherdale recalled. "But we survived."

Burke left daily management in 1988 as it began its financial recovery. McGuire assumed Burke's leadership role, becoming president in 1989 and chairman and CEO in 1991.

Burke dabbled in professional sports in the mid-1990s, buying the National Hockey League's Winnipeg Jets, which became the Phoenix Coyotes after an unsuccessful attempt to bring them to Minnesota. He sold his interest in 2000.

But he didn't step down from the UnitedHealth board. Among executives and other board members, Burke is the third-largest shareholder behind McGuire and Hemsley.

To most analysts and outside observers, UnitedHealth remains fundamentally sound.

"This is no Enron," McGurn said. "There is real value in UnitedHealth. This [management] team created that value. They just got greedy."

S.E.C. Inquiry On Hedge Fund Draws Scrutiny (NYT)

By Walt Bogdanich And Gretchen Morgenson

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

By the evening of June 20, 2005, the government's investigation of possible insider trading by Pequot Capital Management, a prominent hedge fund, had reached a critical stage.

Throughout the day, Robert Hanson, a branch chief in the Washington office of the Securities and Exchange Commission, had been questioning his lead investigator in the case about taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive.

The investigator, Gary J. Aguirre, was trying to find out if Mr. Mack had obtained inside information about a merger and passed it to his friend, Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg.

Finally at 8:25 p.m., Mr. Hanson sent Mr. Aguirre a message from his BlackBerry expressing enthusiasm about the inquiry. "Okay Gary you've given me the bug," he wrote, according to confidential S.E.C. documents. "I'm starting to think about the case during my non work hours."

But three days later, the investigation abruptly changed course. Mr. Aguirre later told a Senate committee that after news broke that Mr. Mack was being considered to run Morgan Stanley, his supervisor said he could not interview the executive because of his political power. Mr. Aguirre protested and was eventually fired in September 2005, just days after receiving a two-step merit pay increase.

Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg have both repeatedly denied any improper conduct. Earlier this month, the S.E.C. informed them that it would not bring any charges.

Now, it is the S.E.C. that is under scrutiny. Two Senate committees — Finance and Judiciary — are investigating how diligently the S.E.C. pursued its Pequot inquiry, whether Mr. Aguirre's firing was an attempt to silence him, and whether senior S.E.C. officials gave special treatment to Mr. Mack by not taking his testimony when Mr. Aguirre wanted to. Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's 2004 campaign, was eventually interviewed last August, after Congress began asking questions.

The congressional inquiry centers on dozens of pages of internal S.E.C. documents that Mr. Aguirre turned over to Congress and were obtained by The New York Times. The documents, including e-mail messages from Mr. Samberg and his associates, as well as contemporaneous e-mails from investigators, provide the first inside look at the case, and shed light on why the two Senate panels are interested in the matter.

The primary focus of the congressional inquiry is the S.E.C.'s investigation into Pequot's purchase of stock in Heller Financial, a financial services firm, and the dispute over taking Mr. Mack's testimony. The documents say that Pequot became the nation's biggest purchaser of Heller stock in the four weeks before the company was acquired by GE Capital in July 2001. Mr. Samberg bet $44 million on Heller and wanted to invest even more, according to the documents, but his trader could not fill all the orders.

The file shows that after Mr. Aguirre was blocked from questioning Mr. Mack about the Heller deal, Mr. Hanson, the S.E.C. branch chief, acknowledged in e-mail messages that he had discussed Mr. Mack's "political clout" and the "juice" of his lawyers with officials at the commission.

In an exchange of e-mails in the summer of 2005, Mr. Hanson said that he had merely been trying to "alert folks above me," and that politics did not influence S.E.C. decisions. Mr. Aguirre replied: "Bob, this is spin. You told me it would be tough to take Mack's testimony because he has political clout."

In the documents, S.E.C. officials argued that Mr. Aguirre was not justified in taking Mr. Mack's testimony because he could not show that Mr. Mack had inside information or a clear motive for giving it to Mr. Samberg. But Mr. Aguirre said he was only asking for permission to interview Mr. Mack, not bring charges.

The file portrays the S.E.C. as a place where stock exchange referrals of suspected insider trading can languish for years without serious investigation.

In the Pequot case, senators are examining how the S.E.C. handled a total of 18 referrals. In addition to the Heller deal, they include an investigation involving federal prosecutors into whether the hedge fund bought Microsoft options based on inside information. E-mails show that Mr. Samberg solicited information about the software company's financial performance from a Microsoft manager he was recruiting shortly before Pequot invested in the company.

"I shouldn't say this, but you have probably paid for yourself already!" Mr. Samberg wrote to the former Microsoft manager as he was preparing to join Pequot in 2001.

None of the 18 referrals, including the one involving Microsoft, led to an enforcement action, according to people briefed on the matter.

Mr. Aguirre's documents have surfaced amid rising concern on Capitol Hill about the lightly regulated world of hedge funds. The chairman of the finance committee, Senator Charles E. Grassley, Republican of Iowa, said last week that after questioning S.E.C. officials about the Pequot investigation, "my initial concerns haven't been put to rest by what I've learned so far."

The file is not a full record of Mr. Aguirre's investigation, and it is silent about what happened in the inquiry after he left the commission. In the papers, Mr. Aguirre acknowledged before his firing that he had not proved that Pequot had engaged in insider trading, or that Mr. Mack ever had inside information about Heller.

Since The New York Times first reported Mr. Aguirre's allegations last June, the inspector general for the S.E.C. reopened his investigation into the firing after it was disclosed that he had not interviewed Mr. Aguirre. The inspector general, whose conduct is also being examined by the Senate, declined to comment.

Mr. Aguirre declined to be interviewed for this article, but in an Aug. 21 letter, he told the banking committee, which oversees the S.E.C., that he had little faith in either investigation. "The same I.G. who did the first whitewash would do the new one," he wrote. "The senior enforcement attorneys who pretended no grounds existed to take Mack's testimony will now pretend to take Mack's testimony."

In a statement, Jeanmarie McFadden, a spokeswoman for Morgan Stanley, said: "Mr. Aguirre's allegations against John Mack are irresponsible and without any evidence whatsoever to support them. John Mack had nothing to do with the S.E.C.'s decision if or when it would seek his testimony. As soon as he was asked, John Mack immediately agreed to provide his testimony and was subsequently advised that the S.E.C. would take no action regarding him in this matter."

Jonathan Gasthalter, a Pequot spokesman, said in a statement: "The S.E.C. staff conducted an extensive, two-year investigation of Pequot's trading and that investigation is over. During the course of the S.E.C.'s investigation, the U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York reviewed the firm's 2001 trades in Microsoft and concluded that no action was warranted."

Officials at the S.E.C. declined to comment on the Pequot investigation and its outcome. But Walter G. Ricciardi, deputy director of enforcement, said that if investigators uncovered evidence that supported an insider trading case, they would pursue it vigorously. He denied Mr. Aguirre's contention that referrals from the stock exchanges languish, saying that the commission's staff follows up on three-quarters of the 350 to 450 referrals received each year.

"Insider trading is a very big priority for us," Mr. Ricciardi said. "We recognize that the integrity of the marketplace is at stake."

Focusing on the Heller Deal

The following account is largely based on the investigative files and letters Mr. Aguirre sent to Senate investigators in August.

According to these records, two days after joining the commission in September 2004, Mr. Aguirre was assigned to look into suspicious trading by Pequot in an information management company shortly before it was acquired in 2003.

In a matter of months, Mr. Aguirre said he discovered 13 referrals involving Pequot that had not been fully investigated by the S.E.C. Eventually, he would look into 18 referrals, including one older one where Pequot suddenly began buying the stock of Heller Financial.

That referral soon became the focus of the S.E.C.'s Pequot investigation.

What intrigued federal investigators, Mr. Aguirre said, was that before buying Heller stock, Mr. Samberg apparently did not follow the financial services industry or Heller. Mr. Samberg's bet had paid off: On July 30, 2001, the GE Capital Corporation announced that it was buying Heller, sending Heller's stock up 50 percent. Pequot made $18 million on the deal, primarily by investing in Heller, but also by short-selling GE Capital's parent, General Electric, which dropped on news of the buyout.

After the deal was announced Mr. Samberg sent an e-mail containing six "smiley" faces, Mr. Aguirre said.

According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Samberg told the S.E.C. in May 2005 that he had six reasons for buying Heller stock, including the company's strong financial model, analysts' reports and speculation that Heller might be a takeover candidate.

But Mr. Aguirre says that when Mr. Samberg testified a second time in June, he was less certain, saying he had "no recollection specifically of how I started the Heller investment other than to know that I had been doing this for many years and recognized these opportunities when they come up."

Mr. Samberg said he could not recall seeing any newspaper articles about Heller or point to any specific analysts' reports he had read about the company, according to an e-mail Mr. Aguirre sent to his supervisor, Mr. Hanson, on June 27, 2005. Nor did Mr. Samberg remember speaking with others at Pequot about the deal, Mr. Aguirre wrote. After Mr. Aguirre was fired, the S.E.C. interviewed Mr. Samberg a third time, but the files do not reflect what he said.

Microsoft Trading Raises Concern

Beyond Mr. Samberg's testimony, Mr. Aguirre said his suspicions were fueled by Pequot's trading in Microsoft.

In early 2001, Mr. Samberg sought financial information on Microsoft from a product manager at the company, David Zilkha, whom he was trying to recruit, according to Mr. Aguirre.

"Might as well pick your brain before you go on the payroll," Mr. Samberg wrote in an e-mail message to Mr. Zilkha on Feb. 28, 2001. After expressing unhappiness with Pequot's research on Microsoft, Mr. Samberg asked: "Do you have any current views that could be helpful?"

On April 6, 2001, Mr. Samberg pressed Mr. Zilkha about Microsoft's upcoming earnings report. "Any tidbits you might care to lob in," Mr. Samberg asked in an e-mail, after noting "the recurring indications from knowledgeable people" that Microsoft's earnings might fall short.

Mr. Zilkha responded the next day, saying he would get back to him "ASAP."

There is no record of Mr. Zilkha's response or evidence that he passed information to Mr. Samberg.

Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee that between April 9 and 11, 2001, Mr. Samberg bought 30,000 options contracts, apparently believing Microsoft "would beat its earnings, the reverse of his belief stated in his e-mail."

A little more than a week later, on April 19, Microsoft reported better-than-expected earnings, sending its stock sharply higher the next day. Mr. Samberg made a $12 million profit on his Microsoft options, Mr. Aguirre said. The next day Mr. Samberg sent Mr. Zilkha, still three days away from joining Pequot, the gushing e-mail that said, "you have probably paid for yourself already." On Mr. Zilkha's first day on the job, Mr. Samberg alerted others to the new employee's "great p.& l." — or profit and loss — based on his Microsoft "input."

Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee that "critical gaps in the evidence" prevented the S.E.C. from charging anyone with insider trading in connection with the Microsoft investigation. The Justice Department also took no action.

Mr. Zilkha, who no longer works for Pequot, declined to comment. But his lawyer, Henry Putzel III, issued a statement: "David Zilkha worked in a nonfinancial capacity, primarily in marketing for the MSN division of Microsoft. For approximately five months before his employment at Pequot, Mr. Zilkha was on family leave from Microsoft. David Zilkha never obtained and did not communicate any material, nonpublic information, nor did he attempt to do so."

A Dispute Over Testimony

The Zilkha e-mail messages fed Mr. Aguirre's belief that Mr. Samberg might have had nonpublic information when, around the same time, he invested in Heller Financial. His suspicion fell on Mr. Mack, a longtime friend of Mr. Samberg's who was Pequot's chairman for several weeks in June 2005. "There are hundreds of Pequot e-mails referring to Mack, including a dozen in July 2001," Mr. Aguirre wrote in a June 2005 e-mail message to S.E.C. officials.

None of those e-mails show Mr. Mack passing on any tips about the Heller deal. Nor do they prove that he even knew about the deal before Pequot started buying Heller stock on July 2, 2001.

But what the e-mails and trading records do show, Mr. Aguirre believed, was enough circumstantial evidence to warrant taking Mr. Mack's testimony — a standard procedure in such a situation, he said — and to issue more subpoenas to Credit Suisse First Boston, the investment bank that advised Heller during its talks with G.E. Mr. Mack became chief executive of Credit Suisse in July 2001.

In e-mails to S.E.C. officials in the summer of 2005, Mr. Aguirre made his case, noting that Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack were close and trusted each other, and that Mr. Mack was allowed to invest in hot Pequot funds and financings. In addition, Mr. Aguirre speculated that Mr. Mack might have learned about the upcoming Heller-GE Capital deal while negotiating his job with Credit Suisse. Mr. Mack began at Credit Suisse on July 12, 2001, a little more than a week after Pequot began buying Heller stock. Pequot continued to buy Heller stock in the following weeks.

"Samberg's aggressive buying of Heller suggests he received the tip shortly before July 2," Mr. Aguirre said in an e-mail to Mr. Hanson, his S.E.C. supervisor. And Pequot's e-mails show that Mr. Samberg and Mr. Mack spoke after the market closed on Friday, June 29, according to Mr. Aguirre. "That matched perfectly with Samberg's decision to begin buying Heller with a vengeance the next trading day after he spoke with Mack," Mr. Aguirre said in his letter to the banking committee.

The committee files show that until late June of last year, S.E.C. officials appeared to support Mr. Aguirre's investigation. Around that time, Mr. Aguirre said, his supervisors authorized him to contact the Federal Bureau of Investigation and a federal prosecutor about the investigation.

But when Morgan Stanley was considering hiring Mr. Mack as chief executive, Mr. Aguirre said, a regulatory official at the investment bank called to ask if Mr. Mack was a serious target in the Pequot investigation. The official "explained that the prospect of such an action against Mack could affect Morgan Stanley's decision whether to rehire him as its C.E.O.," Mr. Aguirre told the banking committee.

Before answering, Mr. Aguirre said, he consulted with his two supervisors, Mr. Hanson and Mark Kreitman, an assistant director of enforcement at the agency. According to Mr. Aguirre, Mr. Kreitman favored telling Morgan Stanley that Mr. Mack was indeed a target, but first he informed his boss, Paul R. Berger, an associate director of enforcement, by speakerphone.

With Mr. Aguirre listening in, Mr. Berger quickly overruled Mr. Kreitman, saying in effect that the S.E.C. would most likely not file charges against Mr. Mack and that nothing should be said to Morgan Stanley, Mr. Aguirre said.

Mr. Aguirre was stunned. He told the banking committee that after the call, "The usual routines and protocols went out the window." Suddenly, Mr. Aguirre said, he was excluded from senior staff meetings about the Pequot investigation. And subpoenaed records that ordinarily would go directly to him were instead directed to Linda Thomsen, the agency's chief of enforcement, he said.

Mr. Berger, now a lawyer at Debevoise & Plimpton, declined to comment.

For the next two months, Mr. Aguirre pressed his superiors for permission to take Mr. Mack's testimony. He failed to change their minds.

"I need greater specificity than the information provided here," Mr. Kreitman wrote in a July 25, 2005, e-mail to Mr. Aguirre. Mr. Kreitman said the evidence of motive "may have substance but it's too vague." And while contacts between Mr. Mack and Mr. Samberg "were potentially significant," they were not "aberrational."

"I have indicated repeatedly that concrete evidence of when Mack obtained access to material nonpublic information re the G.E./Heller deal is the sine qua non for focused investigation of Mack," Mr. Kreitman wrote.

To Mr. Aguirre, this standard had not been applied to other executives he had subpoenaed. Just as troubling, he said, were references by Mr. Hanson to the power of Mr. Mack and his lawyers, who included former S.E.C. officials.

"Mack's counsel will have 'juice,' as I described last night — meaning that they may reach out to Paul and Linda (and possibly others)," Mr. Hanson told Mr. Aguirre in an e-mail on Aug. 4, 2005. The reference apparently was to Mr. Berger and Ms. Thomsen.

Three weeks later, on Aug. 24, Mr. Hanson again acknowledged Mr. Mack's status. "Most importantly the political clout I mentioned to you was a reason to keep Paul and possibly Linda in the loop on the testimony," Mr. Hanson wrote. But he added: "As far as I know politics are never involved in determining whether to take someone's testimony. I've not seen it done at this agency."

Mr. Aguirre disputed Mr. Hanson's account, calling it "spin," and added: "An artificially high barrier has been set for his exam. I do not think this is proper."

Mr. Ricciardi of the S.E.C., speaking generally, said, "Every day enforcement deals with powerful people and we treat them equally with an appropriate level of fairness for the people being investigated and fierceness for the investors we protect." He also said that lawyers representing possible targets often approach top enforcement officials. “They don’t have to be a famous lawyer, and they don’t have to have a famous client,” he said.

An S.E.C. spokesman declined to provide comments from Mr. Kreitman, Mr. Hanson or Ms. Thomsen.

By the end of August, Mr. Aguirre was complaining that the Heller investigation “has slowed to a snail’s pace.” He was fired about a week later while on vacation.

In late August of this year, Senator Grassley, the finance committee chairman, wrote to the S.E.C. chairman, Christopher Cox, raising questions about how the agency handled the investigation. He wrote that congressional investigators had found that the S.E.C.’s Heller inquiry had stopped, and had resumed only after Congress began looking at the matter.

Senator Grassley also took the inspector general’s office to task, saying it had shown little interest in Mr. Aguirre’s contention that Mr. Mack’s political clout was a factor in not taking his testimony last year.

The inspector general “closed its inquiry, claiming it found no evidence that S.E.C. officials had referenced Mack’s political clout,” Mr. Grassley wrote, adding, “Contrary to the I.G. report, however, documentary evidence exists and corroborates” that assertion.

A Test For The SEC's Chief (LAT)

By Jonathan Peterson

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Christopher Cox is being forced out of his comfort zone to tackle a shareholder rights issue.

WASHINGTON — In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox is widely credited with bringing accord to a panel that was bitterly divided over how aggressive it should be in policing corporate wrongdoing in the wake of Enron and other scandals.

The former Republican congressman from Newport Beach has shepherded a handful of reform-oriented measures without controversy, steering clear of proposals on which the odds of finding common ground appeared slim.

Now, however, a federal appeals court decision has tossed a grenade-like issue into the SEC's chambers — putting Cox's diplomatic and leadership skills to their toughest test.

The court decision is forcing the agency to again confront demands to give shareholders a bigger say in the nomination of corporate directors. Former SEC Chairman William H. Donaldson unveiled a plan to do so in 2003, but it fizzled after triggering a partisan split on the commission and generating business opposition so fierce that many believe it contributed to Donaldson's departure.

Although the panel's makeup has changed, it is not clear that the group of three Republicans and two Democrats can take more than a cautious step to open up elections before exposing its own ideological differences. Nor is it clear that Cox is prepared to follow his predecessor in bringing up matters that force him to cast contentious, tie-breaking votes.

"Having a unanimous commission is ideal, and Chairman Cox has done an excellent job of building consensus," said Harvey J. Goldschmid, who left the SEC last year and is now a professor at Columbia University School of Law. "But on issues of this significance, doing the right thing is of far greater consequence than having a dissenting vote."

Goldschmid, a Democrat, believes regulators should make it easier for shareholders to nominate candidates for corporate boards and to have these nominees included in a company's official election materials.

For years, the SEC has allowed companies to reject such requests. In September, however, the U.S. Court of Appeals for the 2nd Circuit ruled that the agency was wrong when it allowed insurer American International Group Inc. to block such a resolution by the pension plan for the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees.

The court found that despite the SEC staff's routine rejection of such requests, the agency's policy statements on the matter had been contradictory.

Within hours of the ruling, the SEC said it would address the issue at an October meeting to make sure its rules were applied consistently.

But soon before the meeting last week, the SEC postponed the public airing until December.

"It's simply not soup yet," one official said.

Regulators now hope that in December they will be able to offer companies guidance on the issue.

More broadly, they are trying to write a rule that would give shareholders greater rights to place independent board candidates on the corporate ballot card.

In an interview, Cox expressed support for the basic principle that shareholders deserve a say in the corporate nomination process.

"The right of the owners of the company to choose the directors who represent them is fundamental," he said. "The Securities and Exchange Commission has among its significant responsibilities protecting that right."

The matter of moving beyond principle to a specific proposal is where the issue gets thorny and emotions get hot, and Cox declined to elaborate on his views.

For investor activists, including unions and public pension funds, the goal of nominating board members goes to the heart of shareholder democracy. Inside the executive suite, however, that same goal may be seen as an unwelcome effort by special interests to meddle in running the company.

Currently, shareholders who wish to oppose nominees that are handpicked by the company have little choice other than to withhold their votes or shoulder postage costs for a write-in revolt — limits that place a heavy burden on all challenges.

In 2004, for example, the full-bore assault on Michael Eisner as chairman of Walt Disney Co. was deemed a big success when about 45% of shareholders withheld their support.

Cox, who as chairman of the House Committee on Homeland Security tried to smooth over differences between its Republican and Democratic members, has tried to keep schisms out of the five-member SEC, which was deeply divided before he took the helm in 2005.

Among the most divisive issues was the matter of shareholder rights to nominate directors. That measure prompted the biggest barrage of public comments, pro and con, in the agency's history.

Donaldson, a former Wall Street investment banker, was unable to win support among fellow Republicans, and business groups complained angrily about his proposal to the White House, which accepted his resignation.

Republican Commissioners Paul S. Atkins, a leading opponent of the 2003 proposal, and newcomer Kathleen L. Casey did not respond to requests for comment. Democratic Commissioners Roel C. Campos and Annette L. Nazareth are known to sympathize with the shareholders' goal, although Nazareth has publicly supported a cautious, go-slow approach this time around.

"I don't think the commission wants to go back to that experience" of 2003, said Fred R. Buenrostro Jr., chief executive of the California Public Employees' Retirement System. He recently led a delegation to meet with each commissioner on the matter.

A technology enthusiast, Cox would like to defuse the shareholder voting issue, at least in part, through the Internet's potential to give investors an easy and cheap way to make their feelings known. He called it a "happy coincidence" that a separate proposed rule allowing companies to deliver their election materials on the Internet is also scheduled for the December meeting.

"In the future the Internet will help alleviate a great deal of the expense that has made it difficult for shareholders to participate in the process," he said.

Activists, however, generally don't view access to the Web as the full answer to their goal of democratizing board elections, and they want to be able to place the names of independent candidates directly on corporate ballot cards.

When a company continually ignores shareholder resolutions, or when executives or board members engage in misconduct, such efforts may be necessary, they contend. Revelations that Hewlett-Packard Co. detectives spied on board members and journalists, for example, recently prompted a group of pension funds to propose that the company alter its rules so that shareholders could nominate members of the board.

Activists say the goal is no less than democracy: "If it's good enough in Afghanistan and Iraq, why not in corporate boardrooms?" asked CalPERS' Buenrostro.

On the other side, however, business lobbyists are making the case that a rule change could do more harm than good. Corporate America, they contend, is still absorbing the Sarbanes-Oxley reforms that were passed after the Enron debacle. Further, they say that other changes, such as growing acceptance of a majority-vote requirement to win board seats, have improved governance and made directors more vigilant than ever.

They oppose a broader role for shareholders in board elections.

"This would be tremendously disruptive and could require expenditure of significant corporate resources and discourage directors from serving on corporate boards," cautioned Steve Odland, CEO of Office Depot Inc., in a letter to the SEC on behalf of the Business Roundtable, which represents large U.S. corporations.

Since taking the helm in August 2005, Cox has helped impose stricter disclosure rules for executive compensation and new restrictions on "soft dollar" arrangements that reward stockbrokers with higher commissions in return for research and other services.

Shareholder voting, however, goes directly to the balance of power between management and shareholders, making a pain-free compromise harder to reach. Moreover, establishing a rule could require difficult decisions on how large a bloc of shareholders is required to merit a say in nominations and how long they should own their shares.

The proposal from the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, for example, would apply to shareholders owning 3% of a company's stock for a year or more. These and other details are grist for the emerging SEC debate.

"Chairman Cox has worked hard and successfully to keep commissioners on the same page," said Amy Borrus, deputy director of the Council of Institutional Investors, which represents public, labor and corporate pension funds whose combined assets exceed $3 trillion. "Proxy access, though, will be a tough test of his consensus-building skills."

CRIMINAL LAW:

Pundit Settles Case On Education Laws (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

The Justice Department has reached a settlement with conservative commentator Armstrong Williams, closing a yearlong investigation into his promotion of Bush administration education reforms.

The final eight-page agreement among Mr. Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications, was reached Thursday.

The carefully worded settlement papers, a copy of which was obtained by The Washington Times, state that Mr. Williams is not guilty of any criminal violations, but must repay a portion of his fee to the federal government. According to the documents, Mr. Williams will have to pay $34,000 to settle the case.

"It's a complete and absolute vindication for me as far as my involvement in this. I did not break the law," Mr. Williams said.

He became the central figure last year in a brouhaha in which the Education Department contracted with several radio, television and print commentators to promote the No Child Left Behind Act.

House Democrats and Republicans denounced the public relations deal as an illegal propaganda campaign using taxpayers' dollars.

Mr. Williams' contract with Ketchum required that he create two television and two radio advertisements regarding the effectiveness of No Child Left Behind, which settlement papers state he performed.

It also called for Mr. Williams to "actively promote" the law to minorities as part of a six-month outreach program, but he said he refused to honor that portion of the contract.

"If I had done that, it would have been unethical and illegal," he said. "So basically, I have to pay them $34,000 back for not breaking the law."

The incident damaged the reputations of many journalists because the public viewed many of the people used to promote the education law as journalists, not as opinion writers and pundits on television and radio talk shows.

"The one thing I do regret, and I have always said this, is not disclosing this contract and my duties to my media clients who run my columns and broadcast commentaries," Mr. Williams said.

Bush's Family Profits From 'No Child' Act (LAT)

By Walter F. Roche Jr., Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

A company headed by President Bush's brother and partly owned by his parents is benefiting from Republican connections and federal dollars targeted for economically disadvantaged students under the No Child Left Behind Act.

With investments from his parents, George H.W. and Barbara Bush, and other backers, Neil Bush's company, Ignite! Learning, has placed its products in 40 U.S. school districts and now plans to market internationally.

At least 13 U.S. school districts have used federal funds available through the president's signature education reform, the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, to buy Ignite's portable learning centers at $3,800 apiece.

The law provides federal funds to help school districts better serve disadvantaged students and improve their performance, especially in reading and math.

But Ignite does not offer reading instruction, and its math program will not be available until next year.

The federal Department of Education does not monitor individual school district expenditures under the No Child program, but sets guidelines that the states are expected to enforce, spokesman Chad Colby said.

Ignite executive Tom Deliganis said that "some districts seem to feel OK" about using No Child money for the Ignite purchases, "and others do not."

Neil Bush said in an e-mail to The Times that Ignite's program had demonstrated success in improving the test scores of economically disadvantaged children. He also said political influence had not played a role in Ignite's rapid growth.

"As our business matures in the USA we have plans to expand overseas and to work with many distinguished individuals in Asia, Europe, the Middle East and Africa," he wrote. "Not one of these associates by the way has ever asked for any access to either of my political brothers, not one White House tour, not one autographed photo, and not one Lincoln bedroom overnight stay."

Funding laws unclear

Interviews and a review of school district documents obtained under the Freedom of Information Act found that educators and legal experts were sharply divided over whether Ignite's products were worth their cost or qualified under the No Child law.

The federal law requires schools to show they are meeting educational standards, or risk losing critical funding. If students fail to meet annual performance goals in reading and math tests, schools must supplement their educational offerings with tutoring and other special programs.

Leigh Manasevit, a Washington attorney who specializes in federal education funding, said that districts using the No Child funds to buy products like Ignite's would have to meet "very strict" student eligibility requirements and ensure that the Ignite services were supplemental to existing programs.

Known as COW, for Curriculum on Wheels (the portable learning centers resemble cows on wheels), Ignite's product line is geared toward middle school social studies, history and science. The company says it has developed a social studies program that meets curriculum requirements in seven states. Its science program meets requirements in six states.

Most of Ignite's business has been obtained through sole-source contracts without competitive bidding. Neil Bush has been directly involved in marketing the product.

In addition to federal or state funds, foundations and corporations have helped buy Ignite products. The Washington Times Foundation, backed by the Rev. Sun Myung Moon, head of the South Korea-based Unification Church, has peppered classrooms throughout Virginia with Ignite's COWs under a $1-million grant.

Oil companies and Middle East interests with long political ties to the Bush family have made similar bequests. Aramco Services Co., an arm of the Saudi-owned oil company, has donated COWs to schools, as have Apache Corp., BP and Shell Oil Co.

Neil Bush said he is a businessman who does not attempt to exert political influence, and he called The Times' inquiries about his venture — made just before the election — "entirely political."

Big supporters

Bush's parents joined Neil as Ignite investors in 1999, according to U.S. Securities and Exchange Commission documents. By 2003, the records show, Neil Bush had raised about $23 million from more than a dozen outside investors, including Mohammed Al Saddah, the head of a Kuwaiti company, and Winston Wong, the head of a Chinese computer firm.

Most recently he signed up Russian fugitive business tycoon Boris A. Berezovsky and Berezovsky's partner Badri Patarkatsishvili.

Barbara Bush has enthusiastically supported Ignite. In January 2004, she and Neil Bush were guests of honor at a $1,000-atable fundraiser in Oklahoma City organized by a foundation supporting the Western Heights School District. Proceeds were earmarked for the purchase of Ignite products.

Organizer Mary Blankenship Pointer said she planned the event because district students were "utilizing Ignite courseware and experiencing great results. Our students were thriving."

However, Western Heights school Supt. Joe Kitchens said the district eventually dropped its use of Ignite because it disagreed with changes Ignite had made in its products. "Our interest waned in it," he said.

The former first lady spurred controversy recently when she contributed to a Hurricane Katrina relief foundation for storm victims who had relocated to Texas. Her donation carried one stipulation: It had to be used by local schools for purchases of COWs.

Texas accounts for 75% of Ignite's business, which is expanding rapidly in other states, Deliganis said.

The company also has COWs deployed in North Carolina, Virginia, Nevada, California, the District of Columbia, Georgia and Florida, he said.

COWs recently showed up at Hill Classical Middle School in California's Long Beach Unified School District. A San Jose middle school also bought Ignite's products but has since closed.

Neil Bush said Ignite has more than 1,700 COWs in classrooms.

Shift in strategy

DOJ_NMG_0084691

But Ignite's educational strategy has changed dramatically, and some are critical of its new approach. Shortly after Ignite was formed in Austin, Texas, in 1999, it bought the software developed by another small Austin firm, Adaptive Learning Technology.

Adaptive Learning founder Mary Schenck-Ross said the software's interactive lessons allowed teachers "to get away from the mass-treatment approach" to education. When a student typed in a response to a question, the software was designed to react and provide a customized learning path.

"The original concept was to avoid 'one size fits all.' That was the point," said Catherine Malloy, who worked on the software development.

Two years ago, however, Ignite dropped the individualized learning approach. Working with artists and illustrators, it created a large purple COW that could be wheeled from classroom to classroom and plugged in, offering lessons that could be played to a roomful of students.

The COWs enticed students with catchy jingles and videos featuring cartoon characters like Mr. Bighead and Norman Einstein. On Ignite's website, a collection of teachers endorsed the COW, saying that it eliminated the need for lesson planning. The COW does it for them.

The developers of Adaptive Learning's software complain that Ignite replaced individualized instruction with a gimmick.

"It breaks my heart what they have done. The concept was totally perverted," Schenck-Ross said.

Nevertheless, Ignite found many receptive school districts. In Texas, 30 districts use COWs.

In Houston, where Neil Bush and his parents live, the district has used various funding sources to acquire $400,000 in Ignite products. An additional $240,000 in purchases has been authorized in the last six months.

Correspondence obtained by The Times shows that Neil Bush met with top Houston officials, sent e-mails and left voice mail messages urging bigger and faster allocations. An e-mail from a school procurement official to colleagues said Bush had made it clear that he had a "good working relationship" with a school board member.

Another Ignite official asked a Texas state education official to endorse the company. In an e-mail, Neil Bush's partner Ken Leonard asked Michelle Ungurait, state director of social studies programs, to tell Houston officials her "positive impressions of our content, system and approach."

Ungurait, identified in another Leonard e-mail as "our good friend" at the state office, told her superiors in response to The Times' inquiry that she never acted on Leonard's request.

Leonard said he did not ask Ungurait to do anything that would be improper.

Houston school officials gave Ignite's products "high" ratings in eight categories and recommended approval.

Some in Houston's schools question the expenditures, however. Jon Dansby was teaching at Houston's Fleming Middle School when Ignite products arrived.

"You can't even get basics like paper and scissors, and we went out and bought them. I just see red," he said.

In Las Vegas, the schools have approved more than $300,000 in Ignite purchases. Records show the board recommended spending $150,000 in No Child funding on Ignite products.

Sources familiar with the Las Vegas purchases said pressure to buy Ignite products came from Sig Rogich, an influential local figure and prominent Republican whose fundraising of more than $200,000 for President Bush's 2004 reelection campaign qualified him as a "Bush Ranger."

Rogich, who chairs a foundation that supports local schools, said he applied no pressure but became interested in COWs after Neil Bush contacted him. Rogich donated $6,000 to purchase two COWs for a middle school named after him.

Christy Falba, the former Clark County school official who oversaw the contracts, said she and her husband attended a dinner with Neil Bush to discuss the products. She said Rogich encouraged the district "to look at the Ignite program" but applied no pressure.

Mixed reviews

Few independent studies have been done to assess the effectiveness of Ignite's teaching strategies. Neil Bush said the company had gotten "great feedback" from educators and planned to conduct a "major scientifically valid study" to assess the COW's impact. The results should be in by next summer, he said.

Though Ignite's products get generally rave reviews from Texas educators, the opinion is not universal.

The Tornillo, Texas, Independent School District no longer uses the Ignite programs it purchased several years ago for $43,000.

"I wouldn't advise anyone else to use it," said Supt. Paul Vranish. "Nobody wanted to use it, and the principal who bought it is no longer here."

Ignite's website features glowing videotaped testimonials from teachers, administrators, students and parents.

DOJ_NMG_0084692

Many of the videos were shot at Del Valle Junior High School near Austin, where school district officials allowed Ignite to film facilities and students.

In the video, a student named India says: "I was feeling bad about my grades. I didn't know what my teacher was talking about." The COW changed everything, the girl's father says on the video.

Lori, a woman identified as India's teacher, says the child was not paying attention until the COW was brought in.

The woman, however, is not India's teacher, but Lori Anderson, a former teacher and now Ignite's marketing director. Ignite says Anderson was simply role-playing.

In return for use of its students and facilities, a district spokeswoman said Ignite donated a free COW. Five others were purchased with district funds.

District spokeswoman Celina Bley acknowledged that regulations bar school officials from endorsing products. But she said that restriction did not apply to the videos.

"It is illegal for individuals to make an endorsement, but this was a districtwide endorsement," Bley said in an e-mail.

Exclusive: Feds Probe A Top Democrat's Relationship With AIPAC (TIME)

By Timothy J. Burger, Washington

Time, October 22, 2006

The Department of Justice is investigating whether Rep. Jane Harman and the pro-Israel group worked together to get her reappointed as the top Democrat on the House Intelligence Committee

Did a Democratic member of Congress improperly enlist the support of a major pro-Israel lobbying group to try to win a top committee assignment? That's the question at the heart of an ongoing investigation by the FBI and Justice Department prosecutors, who are examining whether Rep. Jane Harman of California and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee, according to knowledgeable sources in and out of the U.S. government.

The sources tell TIME that the investigation by Justice and the Federal Bureau of Investigation, which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf. Harman said Thursday in a voicemail message that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be "irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous." On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation. "Congresswoman Harman has asked me to follow up on calls you've had," Olson said. "She is not aware of any such investigation, does not believe that it is occurring, and wanted to make sure that you and your editors knew that as far as she knows, that's not true... . No one from the Justice Department has contacted her." It is not, however, a given that Harman would know that she is under investigation. In a follow-up phone call from California, Olson said Harman hired him this morning because she takes seriously the possibility of a media report about an investigation of her, even though she does not believe it herself.

A spokesman for AIPAC, a powerful Washington-based organization with more than 100,000 members across the U.S., denied any wrongdoing by the group and stressed that it is not taking sides in regards to the committee assignment. Spokespersons for Justice and the FBI declined to comment. The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin. Franklin pleaded guilty a year ago to three felony counts involving improper disclosure and handling of classified information about the Middle East and terrorism to the two lobbyists, who in turn are accused of passing it on to a journalist and a foreign government, widely believed to be Israel. The two lobbyists, who have denied any wrongdoing but were dismissed by AIPAC in April of 2005, were indicted on felony counts of conspiring with government officials to receive classified information they were not authorized to have access to and providing national defense information to people not entitled to receive it.

Around mid-2005, the investigation expanded to cover aspects of Harman's quiet but aggressive campaign to persuade House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to reappoint her to the prestigious position on the House intel panel. The alleged campaign to support Harman for the leadership post came amid media reports that Pelosi had soured on her California colleague and might name Rep. Alcee Hastings of Florida, himself a major supporter of Israel, to succeed Harman.

The sources say the probe also involves whether, in exchange for the help from AIPAC, Harman agreed to help try to persuade the Administration to go lighter on the AIPAC officials caught up in the ongoing investigation. If that happened, it might be construed as an illegal quid pro quo, depending on the context of the situation. But the sources caution that there has been no decision to charge anyone and that it is unclear whether Harman and AIPAC acted on the idea.

AIPAC spokesman Patrick Dorton denies that the organization has engaged in any improper conduct. "Both Congressman Hastings and Congresswoman Harman are strong leaders on issues of importance to the pro-Israel community and would be exemplary Democratic leaders for the House intelligence committee," Dorton said. "AIPAC would never engage in a quid pro quo in relation to a federal investigation or any federal matter and the notion that it would do so is preposterous. AIPAC is not aware that the Justice Department is looking into issues involving the intelligence committee, and has not been asked any questions or contacted by the government on this matter, but certainly would cooperate with any inquiry." Dorton added that AIPAC has previously been assured that the organization and its current employees are not being investigated. In this same investigation, the Justice Department has previously suggested that AIPAC had questionable motives in trying to help a valued government contact remain in a sensitive national security post. The Justice Department alleges in its indictment of Franklin that he asked one of the two AIPAC lobbyists to "put in a good word" for him in seeking assignment to the National Security Council. The document says the AIPAC official noted that such a job would put Franklin "by the elbow of the President" and said he would "do what I can."

AIPAC lists praise from Pelosi among a series of quotes from world leaders on its website: "The special relationship between the United States and Israel is as strong as it is because of your [AIPAC's] fidelity to that partnership..." But congressional sources say Pelosi has been infuriated by pressure from some major donors lobbying on behalf of Harman. In a story touching on tensions between Pelosi and Harman, an alternative California publication, LA Weekly, reported in May that Harman "had some major contributors call Pelosi to impress upon her the importance of keeping Jane in place. According to these members, this tactic, too, hasn't endeared Harman to Pelosi."

A congressional source tells TIME that the lobbbying for Harman has included a phone call several months ago from entertainment industry billionaire and major Democratic party contributor Haim Saban. A Saban spokeswoman said he could not be reached for comment. A phone call pushing for a particular member's committee assignment might be unwelcome, but it would not normally be illegal on its own. And it is unclear whether Saban — who made much of his fortune with the Mighty Morphin Power Rangers children's franchise — knew that lobbying Pelosi might be viewed by others as part of a larger alleged plan.

Saban has donated at least $3,000 to Harman's campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records, and the Saban Center for Middle East Policy, which he sponsors at the prestigious Brookings Institution, boasts Harman among its biggest fans. "When the Saban Center talks, I listen," Harman said at a Saban Center briefing in February on U.S. strategy in Iraq. Harman quipped that, in order to attend the session at Brookings, she had to "blow off" a senior intelligence official's appearance before a House committee.

Houston Homicides Spike; Evacuees Cited (AP)

Evacuees from Hurricane Katrina have contributed to an increase in Houston's annual murder rate, which could climb this year to its highest level in more than a decade, police said.

Houston had 316 homicides as of Oct. 16. That's an increase of 25 percent from the 252 slayings tallied at this time last year, putting the city on pace to record nearly 400 killings before the end of 2006.

"We recognize that the homicide rate is up as far as raw numbers and as well as percentages relative to the population," Capt. Dwayne Ready said. "We also recognize that Katrina evacuees continue to have an impact on the murder rate."

When Katrina swamped New Orleans last year, 250,000 people fled to Houston. As many as 150,000 evacuees remain in the city.

Houston's homicide rate has been much higher in the past, especially 1981, when the city was dubbed the nation's murder capital with 701 slayings. Even if the city reaches 400 homicides, Ready said, "it's not a bleak picture."

At least 65 slayings in 2006 have been classified as Katrina-related, meaning either the victim, suspect or both evacuated to Houston after Katrina. Police have not kept records of how evacuees have affected crime rates other than homicide.

The murder rate began to rise at the end of last year, when the city recorded 334 homicides. During the previous 10 years, Houston never exceeded the 316 slayings counted in 1995.

U.S. Summit Considered Some Options On School Safety (NYJN)

By Leah Rae, THE JOURNAL NEWS

New York Journal News, October 22, 2006

President Bush's school security conference this month considered a long list of safety strategies, including emergency planning, metal detectors, student counseling and even God.

"We call this in education a 'teachable moment,' " U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said during the Oct. 10 conference in Maryland, which was organized after the shooting deaths of five Amish girls in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 and two other deadly attacks in Colorado and Wisconsin.

The emphasis was on the need for communication and planning. Panelists stressed that most school attacks carried out by students followed some form of warning. They reviewed danger signs, such as a student's sudden changes in behavior, depression and suicidal thoughts.

Cathy Paine, a school psychologist who witnessed a 1998 shooting in Springfield, Ore., said schools there were forming "care teams" of teachers who discussed concerns about students and connected them to mental health services.

Craig Scott, whose sister was killed at Columbine, called for more moral guidance, and education "that touches and teaches the heart and helps form the character."

Security precautions like metal detectors were another strategy under discussion, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed out that one in five school shootings occurred outside a school building.

The conference was criticized for not exploring another angle: the prevalence of guns, a common denominator in the recent attacks.

"Let's make sure that gun owners are responsible," state Assemblywoman Amy Paulin, D-Scarsdale, said last week. "I really believe that that's the more important angle. I don't know that we want to have barriers to our local schools."

An Unwelcome Discovery (NYT)

By Jeneen Interlandi

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

On a rainy afternoon in June, Eric Poehlman stood before a federal judge in the United States District Court in downtown Burlington, Vt. His sentencing hearing had dragged on for more than four hours, and Poehlman, dressed in a black suit, remained silent while the lawyers argued over the appropriate sentence for his transgressions. Now was his chance to speak. A year earlier, in the same courthouse, Poehlman pleaded guilty to lying on a federal grant application and admitted to fabricating more than a decade's worth of scientific data on obesity, menopause and aging, much of it while conducting clinical research as a tenured faculty member at the University of Vermont. He presented fraudulent data in lectures and in published papers, and he used this data to obtain millions of dollars in federal grants from the National Institutes of Health — a crime subject to as many as five years in federal prison. Poehlman's admission of guilt came after more than five years during which he denied the charges against him, lied under oath and tried to discredit his accusers. By the time Poehlman came clean, his case had grown into one of the most expansive cases of scientific fraud in U.S. history.

"I need to start out by apologizing," Poehlman said now, standing at the lectern before the judge. Speaking quickly and stammering occasionally, he apologized to friends and former colleagues, some of whom were listening in the back of the courtroom. He apologized to his mother, who sat in the front row, crying. And he apologized to Walter DeNino, the former protégé who turned him in, who was also sitting in the courtroom, several rows back on the prosecution's side.

"I have wanted to say I'm sorry for five years," Poehlman said, without turning around to face DeNino. "I want to make it very clear I am remorseful. I accept the responsibility. There's no way that I can turn back the clock. And I'm not that individual that I was years ago."

Before his fall from grace, Poehlman oversaw a lab where nearly a dozen students and postdoctoral researchers carried out his projects. His research earned him recognition among his peers and invitations to speak at conferences around the world. And he made nearly $140,000, one of the top salaries at the University of Vermont. All of that began to change six years ago, when DeNino took his concerns about anomalies in Poehlman's data to university officials. The subsequent investigation — a collaboration among the University of Vermont, the Office of Research Integrity (which is within the Department of Health and Human Services) and the United States Department of Justice — uncovered fraudulent research that stretched back through almost half of Poehlman's career. The revelations led to the retraction or correction of 10 scientific papers, and Poehlman was banned forever from receiving public research money. He was only the second scientist in the United States to face criminal prosecution for falsifying research data.

At 50, with his career in ruins and his reputation destroyed, Poehlman could only hope to avoid one final humiliation: becoming the first researcher sentenced to prison for scientific misconduct. Citing the nearly $200,000 Poehlman had paid in restitution, his attorneys had asked the judge to sentence him to supervised probation. "I am hoping that you can consider this sentence fair and just to me, as well as the community," Poehlman pleaded, without "a sentence of incarceration or imprisonment."

In the fall of 2000, Walter DeNino was comparing measurements in some data Poehlman had given him when he found something odd. DeNino, who was then 24, had started working in Poehlman's lab during his senior year at UVM. The young man admired the senior researcher and enjoyed the camaraderie of his peers. Poehlman pushed his team hard, but he was also charming and energetic, and he attracted people who were active athletes like himself. Lab members regularly went to the campus gym during lunch breaks and often competed in marathons together. Poehlman ran daily with students and colleagues alike.

DeNino fit in right away. A driven athlete, he ran so much in high school that he suffered dozens of tiny stress fractures in both legs. When a doctor suggested he run less, DeNino responded by riding his bike more. During college, after finishing in the top three in three triathlons, he was invited to join the U.S.A. Triathlon Olympic Resident Team to train in California and Colorado.

Professionally ambitious, DeNino graduated with a double major in nutritional sciences and dietetics at UVM and won several awards for the research he completed under Poehlman's tutelage. When Poehlman invited him back to the lab as a paid technician — allowing him to continue to train for the Olympics part time — DeNino saw it as the ideal way to strengthen his candidacy for medical school. Although technicians are usually at the bottom of the lab hierarchy, carrying out the more mundane aspects of their principal investigator's work, a generous scientist will give them credit on publications. DeNino figured that getting his name on one of Poehlman's papers could make the difference on a med-school application.

The fall that DeNino returned to the lab, Poehlman was looking into how fat levels in the blood change with age. DeNino's task was to compare the levels of lipids, or fats, in two sets of blood samples taken several years apart from a large group of patients. As the patients aged, Poehlman expected, the data would show an increase in low-density lipoprotein (LDL), which deposits cholesterol in arteries, and a decrease in high-density lipoprotein (HDL), which carries it to the liver, where it can be broken down. Poehlman's hypothesis was not controversial; the idea that lipid levels worsen with age was supported by decades of circumstantial evidence. Poehlman expected to contribute to this body of work by demonstrating the change unequivocally in a clinical study of actual patients over time. But when DeNino ran his first analysis, the data did not support the premise.

When Poehlman saw the unexpected results, he took the electronic file home with him. The following week, Poehlman returned the database to DeNino, explained that he had corrected some mistaken entries and asked DeNino to re-run the statistical analysis. Now the trend was clear: HDL appeared to decrease markedly over time, while LDL increased, exactly as they had hypothesized.

Although DeNino trusted his boss implicitly, the change was too great to be explained by a handful of improperly entered numbers, which was all Poehlman claimed to have fixed. DeNino pulled up the original figures and compared them with the ones Poehlman had just given him. In the initial spreadsheet, many patients showed an increase in HDL from the first visit to the second. In the revised sheet, all patients showed a decrease. Astonished, DeNino read through the data again. Sure enough, the only numbers that hadn't been changed were the ones that supported his hypothesis.

Confused by the discrepancy between the data sets, DeNino went back to Poehlman and asked to see the patient files. When Poehlman brushed him off, a disquieting feeling came over DeNino. Seeking advice, he e-mailed Andre Tchernof, a former postdoctoral fellow of Poehlman's who had recently left to head his own lab in Quebec City. Tchernof confided to DeNino that something similar had happened before to another lab member.

"He confronted him with the fact that it did not add up," Tchernof wrote in an e-mail message to DeNino. "The response was a job-loss threat, more or less." Tchernof warned DeNino to proceed cautiously. Being associated with either falsified data or a frivolous allegation against a scientist as prominent as Poehlman could end DeNino's career before it even began. Poehlman also had a reputation for playing favorites in the lab. While DeNino had always been on Poehlman's good side, both he and Tchernof had seen Poehlman reduce other subordinates to tears for relatively minor infractions. If Poehlman's career was on the line, there was no telling what he would do to protect himself.

DeNino shared his concerns over the data with a handful of graduate students and postdocs and discovered that others had questions, too. Emboldened, he approached Dwight Matthews, a faculty member who shared lab space with Poehlman. Matthews and Poehlman had written a number of papers and grants together over the years, and DeNino worried that Matthews might alert Poehlman to his suspicions. But DeNino could not shake the feeling that Poehlman was hiding something, and he wanted guidance from a faculty member.

"First, understand that no matter how you proceed, everyone loses," Matthews told DeNino when they met to discuss Poehlman. "Your career will be ruined because no one is going to protect you." Matthews was brutally frank. "The university will come out bad," he continued, "and Eric's reputation will be destroyed." He told DeNino that he would have to decide for himself what to do. As an afterthought, Matthews told me in a recent interview, he offered one suggestion: "If you're going to do something, make sure you really have the evidence."

DeNino spent the next several evenings combing through hundreds of patients' records in the lab and university hospital, trying to verify the data contained in Poehlman's spreadsheets. Each night was worse than the one before. He discovered not only reversed data points, but also figures for measurements that had never been taken and even patients who appeared not to exist at all. In the mornings he would return to the lab and continue working as Poehlman's technician, waiting for the right moment to confront the principal investigator.

The scientific process is meant to be self-correcting. Peer review of scientific journals and the ability of scientists to replicate one another's results are supposed to weed out erroneous conclusions and preserve the integrity of the scientific record over time. But the Poehlman case shows how a committed cheater can elude detection for years by playing on the trust — and the self-interest — of his or her junior colleagues.

The principal investigator in a lab has the power to jump-start careers. By writing papers with graduate students and postdocs and using connections to help obtain fellowships and appointments, senior scientists can help their lab workers secure coveted tenure-track jobs. They can also do damage by withholding this support.

A less self-assured person than DeNino might never have questioned Poehlman's revised data in the first place — and not just because it might have meant risking future job prospects. The principal investigator is not just a boss; he is also a teacher with knowledge and experience. "Trust is an essential component in any relationship, but especially between a student and mentor, especially in a research environment," Tchernof told me in a telephone conversation last spring, before Poehlman's sentencing hearing. "If you didn't trust the person you were working with, you'd have to check every single raw data point. It simply would not work. But then it takes a substantial amount of doubt to overcome that established trust."

Once that trust has been breached, the aftershocks can be far-reaching. Not only does any research touched by tainted data have to be re-examined, but high-profile cases of misconduct can also shake public confidence. "We already have a large subculture in society of people who don't trust science to begin with," says John Dahlberg, one of the Office of Research Integrity investigators who oversaw Poehlman's case. "This doesn't help at all."

Most people involved in Poehlman's case say that fraud as extensive as his represents an uncommon pathology, similar to what drove the South Korean scientist who claimed to have cloned human stem cells or the Lucent Technologies physicist who falsified extensive amounts of nanotechnology data. More frequent, according to a study published in Nature in June 2005, are smaller lapses in ethical judgment, like failing to present data that contradicts your previous research or inappropriately assigning author credit. Brian Martinson, who conducted that study with colleagues from the University of Minnesota, suggests that those gray areas, which many scientists inhabit at one time or another during their careers, portend a greater ailment for the scientific process. Minor transgressions, largely undetected and easily rationalized, can build up like plaque, compromising scientific integrity over time.

In late October 2000, as DeNino's suspicions festered, Poehlman was presented with the Lilly Scientific Achievement Award at the annual conference of the North American Association for the Study of Obesity. The weeklong event took place in Long Beach, Calif., and Poehlman and his entire lab flew out to celebrate. More than 100 scientists attended Poehlman's 40-minute lecture, in which he summarized the research he had conducted over the past decade. Much of the work he discussed focused on energy dysregulation — an imbalance between the energy a person consumes and what he expends. This imbalance grows more pronounced as a person ages, or when a woman reaches menopause, and it can lead to a loss of muscle mass and an increase in total body fat, which, in turn, may predispose older people to obesity and cardiovascular disease.

Because most studies that examine the physiology of aging look at only one point in time, researchers can't tell whether the differences measured are because of age, menopause or individual variation. Poehlman's longitudinal study on menopause collected the same measurements from each person twice over a six-year period. This enabled him to show, for the first time, that some metabolic changes were from menopause, not aging. Published in 1995 in the Annals of Internal Medicine, the study confirmed a long-held assumption and helped establish Poehlman's reputation.

As he summarized this and other work for his colleagues, Poehlman exuded grace and confidence, mixing scientific slides with pictures of his lab team and waxing philosophical about the themes that had shaped his career. He mentioned the outstanding work of his assistants and concluded with the following advice: "Work with people who are smarter than you."

Andre Tchernof left Poehlman's lab two months before the Long Beach meeting but attended the Lilly Award lecture with his former labmates. The facet of Poehlman's research that most interested Tchernof involved whether hormone-replacement therapy — providing menopausal patients with supplemental estrogen — could help them lose weight. When he was still in Poehlman's lab, Tchernof had analyzed H.R.T. data from what was apparently the same group of patients Poehlman was discussing in his talk and had found no significant difference in abdominal-fat loss between women who took estrogen and women who didn't. But the slides Poehlman presented at the meeting showed a big difference: women who had received estrogen lost twice as much abdominal fat as those not taking supplements.

"I have no idea where those numbers came from," Tchernof whispered to DeNino, who was sitting next to him in the front row. "That's not what we found, at all."

After the presentation, Tchernof and Poehlman went running along the beach outside their hotel. The two enjoyed a warm relationship during Tchernof's time as a postdoc. Now Tchernof found himself questioning Poehlman on the H.R.T. data he'd presented. Poehlman assured him that the data were fine and brushed off Tchernof's suggestion to double-check the numbers. As he stretched his muscles under the waning Pacific sunlight, Tchernof could not shake the feeling that something was very wrong.

By December, DeNino's relationship with Poehlman had deteriorated badly. When Poehlman learned that DeNino was raising questions about data integrity with other people in the lab, they all but stopped talking to each other. Late in the month, following a series of letters, e-mail and confrontations between Poehlman and DeNino, none of which laid the technician's concerns to rest, DeNino went to Thomas Mercurio, the university's general counsel, to lodge a formal, written accusation of scientific misconduct against his former mentor. The process he set in motion would take almost six years to conclude.

All universities that receive public money to conduct research are required to have an integrity officer who ensures compliance with federal guidelines. But policing its scientists can be a heavy burden for a university. "It's your own faculty, and there's this idea of supporting and nurturing them," says Ellen Hyman-Browne, a research-compliance officer at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, a teaching hospital. Moreover, investigations cost time and money, and no institution wants to discover something that could cast a shadow on its reputation.

"There are conflicting influences on a university where they are the co-grantor and responsible to other investigators," says Stephen Kelly, the Justice Department attorney who prosecuted Poehlman. "For the system to work, the university has to be very ethical."

Dr. Burton Sobel, the chairman of Poehlman's department, was determined to do everything by the book. After meeting with DeNino, whom he later described as "forthright, composed, clearly troubled," he contacted Poehlman, saying he needed to discuss something unpleasant with him. Sobel was astonished by Poehlman's response. The accused scientist gave him the impression that nothing was wrong and seemed mostly annoyed by all the fuss. In his written response to the allegations, Poehlman suggested that the data had gotten out of hand, accumulating numerous errors because of handling by multiple technicians and postdocs over the years.

"I found that noncredible, really, for an investigator of Eric's experience," Sobel later told the investigative panel.

"There had to be a backup copy that was pure," Sobel reasoned before the panel. "You would not have postdocs and lab techs in charge of discrepant data sets." But Poehlman told Sobel that there was no master copy. Once the formal inquiry got under way, Poehlman called Sobel at home and asked him to stop the proceedings, telling him there was nothing to it. Sobel refused, assuring Poehlman that it was in everyone's best interest to proceed. He sensed that Poehlman's facade of indifference was beginning to crack.

Two days after DeNino filed his formal accusation, Richard Galbraith, the program director of the university's General Clinical Research Center, escorted the campus police chief to Poehlman's office. It was the week between Christmas and New Year's Day, and only a handful of researchers continued to hunch over their lab benches. Galbraith had the task of impounding the evidence necessary for an investigation into DeNino's claim.

Galbraith had personally recruited Poehlman to UVM. Poehlman started his career at the university in 1988 but left during a mass exodus of clinical researchers. When Galbraith came to the university in 1995, he figured the best way to revive the ailing clinical-research center was to hire prominent scientists with the potential to secure grants. Poehlman, who had just published his menopause study, seemed an ideal candidate to bring both prestige and grant money to the institution.

Some faculty members had expressed misgivings about Poehlman. Galbraith never quite got the full story about why he left in the first place, but during the recruitment, rumblings surfaced about Poehlman's tactics and data. When he met with the investigative panel, five years later, Galbraith recalled questioning everybody he could think of. Poehlman had definitely stepped on some toes and made a name as an aggressive self-promoter, but this was nothing remarkable for a successful researcher. And no one had any evidence of misconduct. Not wanting to disqualify such a promising candidate based on rumors, the university decided to hire Poehlman in 1996. And Poehlman delivered for the university, securing $2.9 million in N.I.H. grants out of the $11 million he had applied for.

The inquiry itself fell to five faculty members picked by the dean of the medical school. One of them, Charles Irvin, had just joined UVM's College of Medicine from a research institute affiliated with the University of Colorado. Irvin had only one experience with a misconduct investigation, and he remembered it as an insignificant case. "What we'd been told at U.C. Denver was that most of these cases are alike — they tend to be trivial or they tend to be 'he said, she said,' " he told me. "You just don't know because there tends to be insufficient data to do anything."

When the panel investigating Poehlman began to meet in January 2001, however, Irvin realized that this case was different. The panel's search quickly expanded beyond DeNino's initial accusation, and the body of evidence it accumulated — through a careful review of Poehlman's computer hard-drive and interviews with DeNino and others — revealed a disturbing pattern of blame-shifting and backpedaling.

"It was clear after a very short period of time that this was not trite, it was not trivial, but the allegations were in all likelihood some substantive thing," Irvin explained. "And then once you get a little further down, after you come across a couple of things, well, for me, it was like, Oh, boy."

On Feb. 9, 2001, Poehlman appeared before the panel to address the charges against him. Irvin was appalled by his responses. Poehlman's entire defense seemed to hinge on a series of flimsy notions. First, he attributed his mistakes to his own self-proclaimed ineptitude with Excel files. Then, when pressed on how fictitious numbers found their way into the spreadsheet he'd given DeNino, Poehlman laid out his most elaborate explanation yet. He had imputed data — that is, he had derived predicted values for measurements using a complicated statistical model. His intention, he said, was to look at hypothetical outcomes that he would later compare to the actual results. He insisted that he never meant for DeNino to analyze the imputed values and had given him the spreadsheet by mistake. Although data can be imputed legitimately in some disciplines, it is generally frowned upon in clinical research, and this explanation came across as hollow and suspicious, especially since Poehlman appeared to have no idea how imputation was done.

"Why did Walter . . . say all these things and go to this length?" Irvin asked Poehlman, according to the hearing transcript. "I mean, to me that is the crux of it, is the motivation" for the allegations.

Poehlman responded that DeNino was very popular in the lab and had influenced others to follow his lead.

"I feel like they were plotting during this time," Poehlman told Irvin. "I am as shocked as you are."

When the university decided to proceed from an inquiry to a formal investigation, Poehlman fought back, seeking an injunction from Judge William K. Sessions against UVM and stalling the proceedings for several months. During this time, Poehlman tried to undermine DeNino's credibility as a whistle-blower by suggesting that the technician was homophobic — Poehlman is gay — among other things. Eventually, DeNino hired his own attorney, Philip Michael of the New York firm Troutman Sanders.

"A lot of whistle-blowers are retired," Michael, who specializes in such cases, said recently. "For Walter, this is something that will follow him for the rest of his life."

Poehlman's desperate defense, however, eventually unraveled. After the injunction was dropped, a two-year investigation by UVM led to further review of Poehlman's work by the integrity office. By March 2005, his case had expanded to include a rare criminal prosecution by the United States Department of Justice. By then Poehlman had left UVM for the University of Montreal. But with the threat of prison looming, Poehlman changed his mind and offered his full cooperation.

He waived his right to an indictment and pleaded guilty to falsifying information on a federal grant application. He also agreed to pay $180,000 to settle a civil complaint filed by the University of Vermont plus $16,000 in attorneys' fees for DeNino. The plea came with an especially devastating admission: he acknowledged that his most noted research, the longitudinal study on menopause, was almost entirely fabricated. Poehlman had tested only 2 women, not 35.

The length of time that Poehlman perpetrated his fraud — 10 years — and its scope make his case unique, even among the most egregious examples of scientific misconduct. Some scientists believe that his ability to beat the system for so long had as much to do with the research topics he chose as with his aggressive tactics. His work was prominent, but none of his studies broke new scientific ground. (This may also be why no other scientists working in the field have retracted papers as a result of Poehlman's fraud.) By testing undisputed assumptions on popular topics, Poehlman attracted enough attention to maintain his status but not enough to invite suspicion. Moreover, replicating his longitudinal data would be expensive and difficult to do.

"Eric excelled at telling us what we wanted to hear," Matthews, Poehlman's former colleague, told me. "He published results that confirmed our predisposed hypotheses." Steven Heymsfield, an obesity researcher at Merck Pharmaceuticals in New Jersey, echoed Matthews's sentiments and added that Poehlman's success owed more to his business sense and charisma than to his aptitude as a scientist.

"In effect, he was a successful entrepreneur and not a brilliant thinker with revolutionary ideas," Heymsfield wrote me via e-mail. "But deans love people who bring in money and recognition to universities, so there is Eric."

At his sentencing hearing, Poehlman took responsibility for his actions, but between the lines, he seemed to be placing some blame on the system that requires principal investigators to raise money for their research through government grants.

"I had placed myself, in all honesty, in a situation, in an academic position which the amount of grants that you held basically determined one's self-worth," he told the court in June. "Everything flowed from that." With a lab full of people dependent on him for salaries, Poehlman said he convinced himself that altering some data was acceptable, even laudable. "With that grant I could pay people's salaries, which I was always very, very concerned about."

He continued: "I take full responsibility for the type of position that I had that was so grant-dependent. But it created a maladaptive behavior pattern. I was on a treadmill, and I couldn't get off."

Having all those people to pay, of course, was not just a burden; it was proof of his success. Poehlman wasn't after the grant money for his own material benefit. He was seduced by a different kind of status. "Certainly there is this point of having a grant because it raises your esteem and raises your standing vis-à-vis your colleagues," he told the court. The big publications, the National Institutes of Health grants, the invitations to speak, all gave him a feeling of importance. He was a man of prestige in his community.

Had Poehlman done the hard work in the menopause study, had he followed through on the unexpected data on lipids, he might have eventually achieved the same status. That is the tragic twist. "Much is revealed when studies don't go the way you expect them to," says Sally Jean Rockey of the N.I.H. "Because Poehlman was working in critical areas for lots of people, what he learned would have been important either way."

On that day in the courthouse just a few miles from the university where he had so enjoyed playing the role of prominent scientist, Poehlman cast himself as a changed man, one with a new, humbler vision for his future. He implored the judge to spare him a prison sentence so that he could spend time with his ailing father and continue teaching science to elementary-school children, which he had been doing for the past year. He also outlined a plan for community service that included talking to other students and scientists about the error of his ways.

Federal sentencing guidelines called for five years in prison based on the amount of grant money Poehlman had obtained using fraudulent data. But no scientist had ever spent time in prison for fabricating data. (One did spend 60 days in a halfway house.)

Rockey, who delivered a statement to the court on behalf of the N.I.H., said that lost grant money was not the only, or even the most significant, cost incurred. "Science is incremental," she said, explaining that most scientific advances build on what came before. "When there's a break in the chain, all the links that follow that break can be compromised." Moreover, she said, fraud as extensive as Poehlman's would inevitably lead to further erosion of the public's trust in science. Poehlman's sentence, she said, should send a clear message to the scientific community and the public at large that fraud would not be tolerated.

The sentencing judge was William Sessions, the same judge to whom Poehlman denied all allegations of misconduct at the injunction hearings four years earlier. He told Poehlman to stand and receive his sentence: one year and one day in federal prison, followed by two years of probation.

"When scientists use their skill and their intelligence and their sophistication and their position of trust to do something which puts people at risk, that is extraordinarily serious," the judge said. "In one way, this is a final lesson that you are offering."

DeNino, who wore a dark suit and tie to the hearing, betrayed no emotion as the sentence was read. When I asked him about it later, he said that Poehlman "deserves every single day he serves in prison." Nothing Poehlman had said, not the least his personal apology to DeNino, changed the young man's opinion about his former mentor. "I don't believe for a second that any of what he said was sincere," he told me. "Of course he's going to say those things now that he's facing a prison sentence."

After the hearing, Poehlman walked through downtown Burlington with his mother and a group of young colleagues from Montreal who had come to show their support. The rain had stopped and the sun cast a bright shimmer over the wet cobblestone streets. When I approached Poehlman on Church Street, he was warm and gracious. We talked briefly about his time teaching at the American University in Tehran, his plans to continue teaching elementary school — anything but his impending prison sentence. We agreed to have that discussion in the near future. But there were just 60 days standing between Poehlman and a year in federal prison, and he wanted to sort out his affairs and prepare himself for what lay ahead.

"I just need some time," he said apologetically. "We can sit down one day soon." But as the summer progressed and 60 days became 30 and then 20, Poehlman did not respond to repeated e-mail messages, telephone calls and letters. Finally, two weeks before his sentence was set to begin, I reached his mother. Eric had decided to start his sentence early, she explained, and he wouldn't be talking about what happened anymore.

CIVIL RIGHTS:

A Fight To Keep Schools Integrated (LAT)

By Jenny Jarvie, Times Staff Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

In Birmingham, Ala., a group of residents and activists opposes a bid to end a court's school desegregation order.

For 35 years under court order, the yellow buses have picked up black children from the city's Oxmoor Valley and carried them up the hill and across city limits to affluent, mostly white suburban public schools.

Rita Jones Turner was one of the first children to be bused to Vestavia Hills after a 1970 federal court order required the district to enroll African Americans from her neighborhood. The bus, which was often late and sometimes never came, took her to a middle school where teachers tried to put her in remedial classes and white classmates tore her barrettes from her hair.

Today, her youngest son, a ninth-grader at Vestavia Hills High School, makes the same journey up the hill into a friendlier environment.

But last month, he came home with a letter informing her that the Vestavia Hills school board had filed a motion to end the desegregation order. The district is among a growing number across the nation seeking to have the decades-old orders overturned; this year, dozens have succeeded.

Now, Jones Turner, a 45-year-old consumer debt counselor, finds herself struggling against the idea that the personal hardships she endured during the 1970s would just be part of a failed social experiment.

"We were used, mistreated, downtrodden and discriminated against," she said, her firm voice swelling as she retraced her old bus route one recent afternoon. "I have no problem with being a sacrificial lamb for the good of the community, but to have the system back out now is not fair. They made a commitment to educate black children."

Home of civil rights history

Those fighting to keep the order in place are particularly disappointed that the issue would be revisited in Birmingham, where so much of the civil rights movement's history was made. In the last 15 years, city leaders have built museums and monuments to commemorate the four schoolgirls who died in the 1963 bombing of a black church, and the demonstrators who were met with attack dogs in a march led by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. the same year.

But the district says its request is a matter of economics, not race — that absorbing the children of Oxmoor Valley is an unfair burden on its budget.

Vestavia Hills' desegregation order was to be in place until 25% of the school system's population was African American. Today, 7% of its students are black, with about a quarter of those coming from Oxmoor Valley. Some vestiges of the old South remain: The Vestavia Hills High School mascot is the Rebel, depicted as a white-haired man in Confederate-era garb; although the practice is now discouraged by the school, some students still display Confederate flags at football games.

After the U.S. Supreme Court's landmark 1954 Brown vs. Board of Education decision found school segregation to be unconstitutional, and a follow-up ruling in 1968, many school systems were ordered to bus children from other districts to achieve integration.

This fall, the justices will hear appeals from parents in Seattle and in Louisville, Ky., who say it is unconstitutional for officials to consider race when deciding what school a student will attend. Meanwhile, over the last 15 years, courts have lifted desegregation orders in more than 100 school districts from Alabama to California — often after districts showed they were making a good faith effort, successful or not, to achieve racial integration. This year, federal courts have sided 36 times with districts seeking to overturn desegregation orders involving the Justice Department.

Only a few requests to end the orders have been rejected. In June, for example, a federal appeals court upheld a lower court decision to keep the school district of Little Rock, Ark., under its desegregation order, arguing it did not sufficiently appraise how its academic programs helped black students.

Opponents come together

In Birmingham, a well-connected group of civil rights activists, lawmakers, attorneys, pastors and residents has come together over the last month to oppose Vestavia Hills' request to end the desegregation order.

"They are saying to Martin Luther King, 'To hell with your dream: This is 2006 and it's business as usual in Vestavia Hills,' " said the Rev. Jonathan McPherson, who was jailed with King in 1963 and is board chairman of the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's Birmingham chapter.

The Vestavia Hills desegregation order was issued after the affluent southeastern suburb established its own school system to avoid sending its children to integrated Birmingham city schools. A federal judge ruled that the 99% white system had to accept children from a designated portion of the neighboring Oxmoor Valley.

Now, Vestavia Hills is asking a federal judge to grant it unitary status, freeing it from court supervision and further desegregation obligations.

"It feels like we're back in the '60s again," said Theodore Lawson, a Jefferson County attorney who lives in Oxmoor Valley and opposes lifting the order. "If this is not racism, what is it?"

Vestavia Hills Supt. Jamie Blair said the issue was one of funding and capacity. In the last four years, he said, the number of Oxmoor students in the district has risen from 75 to 132.

"Simply put, it's an overcrowding issue," he said. "Our city has no control over the amount of housing built in that area. We're providing schooling to all the folk in Oxmoor, but their tax dollars go to the city of Birmingham."

Oxmoor Valley, which at the time of the court order was home to a small community of mostly poor blacks, is a nearly 8,000-acre pine forest south of downtown Birmingham. An increasing number of real estate developers are now eyeing the valley, attracted in part by its school zoning. Two upscale subdivisions have been built in the last decade, and hundreds more homes and apartments are planned.

The valley's new residents — mostly African American professionals — bristle at the notion that Vestavia Hills schools are overcrowded. Not all of the new homes in Oxmoor Valley, they note, are zoned to the Vestavia Hills school district. Furthermore, Vestavia Hills recently annexed two predominantly white communities.

"The only effort to relieve overcrowding has been to remove 132 black students from the school system," said Lawson, who is president of the Ridgeview Estates subdivision association.

According to Vestavia Hills' request, which is now before a federal judge, the school system would continue educating the 132 students now enrolled from Oxmoor Valley and offer enrollment to their younger siblings. Other students would attend Birmingham city schools. A U.S. district judge has scheduled a status conference on the case for Wednesday.

Since the board publicized its request, supporters of the 1970 court order have scrutinized Vestavia Hills' progress on racial desegregation.

Although a small number of African Americans have moved to Vestavia Hills in recent years, it remains one of most exclusively white areas of Jefferson County. According to the 2000 census, Vestavia Hills has a 94% white population and a median household income of $70,000. In contrast, Birmingham has a 24% white population and a median household income of $26,000. Only 5% of Birmingham public school students are white.

In a legal strategy meeting last month at the Oxmoor Valley home of Birmingham City Councilor Miriam Witherspoon, residents noted the Vestavia Hills school district's low number of black administrators (1 out of 16), the relatively high number of black special-education students (60 out of 546), and that just 3% of the district's teachers are black.

"The schools are as segregated in 2006 as they were in 1966," said Ronald Jackson, executive director of Citizens for Better Schools, a watchdog group in Birmingham.

Vestavia Hills viewpoints

On a recent day in Vestavia Hills, many of the parents picking up their children from football at Louis Pizitz Middle School were reluctant to talk about the court order.

Waiting for her ninth-grade son in a navy-blue Lexus, Kim Tortorice, who is white, said she did not believe race was an issue.

"Our school really is a melting pot," she said. "We have Chinese, Mexican, Russian."

Vestavia, she thought, was handling the situation fairly.

"I just think everyone should pay the same property tax, that's all," she said. "I work hard. Those people across town don't pay our property taxes."

But Darryl Dancey, 40, an African American truck driver who moved to Vestavia Hills last year for the benefit of his children's education, said he hoped the court order would stay in place.

"The original decision was for integration," he said with a shrug. "I don't think integration has truly happened yet."

A.C.L.U. Allies Start Web Site To Rebut Critics Of Leadership (NYT)

By Stephanie Strom

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

Supporters of the leadership of the American Civil Liberties Union have created a Web site in response to one started last month by critics of that leadership.

“This Web site came about because those of us who know the A.C.L.U. very well were very disturbed that a few unhappy people were attacking the organization at a time when the A.C.L.U. is doing such a great job — and is greatly needed,” said Laura W. Murphy, a former director of the organization’s Washington office and a leader behind the new Web site, voicesfortheaclu.org.

Ms. Murphy said the critics were “simply dead wrong, and we are saying enough is enough.”

Ira Glasser, a former executive director of the civil liberties union and a founder of savetheaclu.org, the Web site calling for a change in the organization’s leadership, said his group had no complaint about the A.C.L.U.’s work or the growth of its membership and financing.

“The disagreement,” Mr. Glasser said, “is over whether those achievements excuse or justify the betrayal of fundamental principles we’re complaining about on the Web site. About those complaints, they have said not a single word.”

That site was started last month by more than 30 longtime supporters of the A.C.L.U. who say that actions taken by the executive director, Anthony D. Romero, and supported by the board have violated the organization's principles. For example, they questioned the extent of the organization's use of data mining to collect information on donors, a proposal to monitor employees' e-mail messages and efforts to control board members' access to staff members and information.

Voices for the A.C.L.U. has statements of support signed by, among others, the executive directors of 18 of the organization's state-level affiliates, senior A.C.L.U. staff members and leaders of nonprofit groups that work on some of the same issues, including Human Rights Watch and the Feminist Majority Foundation.

A spokeswoman for the civil liberties union, Emily Whitfield, said, "I think this Web site demonstrates that there is widespread support for the A.C.L.U.'s leadership and strong appreciation for the tremendous battle the A.C.L.U. is waging to defend our civil liberties at a time when they are under attack as never before."

The site is not affiliated with the A.C.L.U. Ms. Murphy said she and other former leaders had paid a firm less than $1,500 to set it up.

Janet Murguia, president and chief executive of the National Council of La Raza, the country's largest Hispanic advocacy group, said she had signed a statement of support for the A.C.L.U.'s leadership because she thought it was doing a good job.

"I understand that there are some issues among the board there," she said, "but I think the way we can weigh in is to express our confidence, particularly in Anthony Romero."

Ms. Murguia said she had not seen the site criticizing the leadership. "My understanding is, a lot of stuff on the Web site is a lot of insider-baseball-type stuff," she said, "and is really just a distraction from the good work the organization is doing."

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield Deal Reviewed (SFAL)

By Kevin Dobbs

Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader, October 22, 2006

Senate plans hearings after consolidation fears raised

The U.S. Justice Department has begun an antitrust investigation of Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would combine the nation's two largest hog producers.

Additionally, at the behest of Midwest lawmakers and farmers who worry the deal would hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and allow the merged company to inflate pork prices for consumers, a Senate antitrust committee is planning hearings on the matter. At such hearings, lawmakers often hear testimony from company executives and their critics.

"This merger takes place in an industry already witnessing the decline of independent family farmers and rapid consolidation in meat production and packing. If this merger goes through, farmers will have even fewer choices for selling their hogs, and consumers will certainly be affected by the deal," said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio.

DeWine chairs the Senate subcommittee that oversees antitrust concerns. He said in a recent statement that he plans to hold hearings on the Smithfield deal in the near future, and lawmakers "will need to scrutinize this deal very carefully."

A Justice Department spokeswoman would not confirm the deadline to complete the investigation. Nor has a date been set for the Senate committee hearings, according to Andrew Langworthy, a spokesman for DeWine.

But both could happen before the end of the year because Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, plans to finalize the acquisition in the first quarter of 2007. The company announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock.

Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, said shortly after the deal was announced that the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers and that he expects the Justice Department will approve the deal.

A national coalition of agriculture and consumer groups - including Dakota Rural Action and Dakota Resource Council - earlier this month lined up behind Sens. Tim Johnson and John Thune, both of South Dakota, and lawmakers from Iowa and Nebraska who called for the antitrust investigation.

If Smithfield completes the buy, it will own about 20 percent of the nation's hogs. That could limit independent hog producers' options and ability to get good prices for their meat, Johnson and Thune have said.

They worry that a mammoth Smithfield will have the power to stifle its competition, limit producers' options when it comes to selling their hogs and eventually inflate pork prices for consumers.

That, critics contend, should raise antitrust concerns for federal investigators.

Tom Buis, National Farmers Union president, said the livestock industry already is heavily concentrated, and allowing the acquisition "is only going to make the situation worse."

Smithfield's move for Premium Standard Farms is among a string of acquisitions and expensive projects the company has made this year. Last week, Smithfield announced a joint agreement with ContiGroup Cos. to build a $200 million beef processing facility in Oklahoma.

Smithfield had planned a $100 million update and expansion of its aging Morrell plant in Sioux Falls. Work was supposed to start earlier this year. But then the company launched into other projects, including the $571 million acquisition of ConAgra Foods' refrigerated meats business earlier this year.

The company since has put the Sioux Falls project on hold, and company officials have refused to provide any information on when or if the work ever will get under way.

But Ron Bell, the chief building official in Sioux Falls, said in a recent interview that, with winter around the corner, crews would have broken ground by now if they intended to start on the 232,000-square-foot expansion yet this year.

Federal Prosecutions Of Area Polluters Drop (HC)

By Harvey Rice

Houston Chronicle, October 22, 2006

Critics say U.S. Attorney's Office isn't doing enough to pick up where state has failed

After illegally using a pesticide to kill feral hogs — and in the process killing raccoons, mourning doves and crows — two Fayette County farmers were fined $500 in 2004.

That was the most recent conviction Houston's federal prosecutors have obtained on their own for an environmental crime. The lack of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office is remarkable for a city that has vied with Los Angeles for the title of the nation's smog capital, say environmentalists and some current and former officials.

"We've got more (pollution) than anyone else in the country and, therefore, we should have a lot of prosecutions," said Neil Carman, clean-air program director for the Sierra Club.

Carman, who worked for 12 years for the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, noted that the Houston Ship Channel has the largest concentration of petrochemical plants in the nation and that Harris and Brazoria counties rank among the nation's most polluted.

Data from the Transactional Records Access Clearing House show, however, that the number of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas dwindled from 20 in fiscal 1998 to zero in 2005, the last year for which figures are available.

Bigger federal roleU.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, who took office in March, said the figures collected by TRAC, a research group associated with Syracuse University, don't show that his office is involved in 17 cases under investigation or before a grand jury. The only two new prosecutions in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30, were led by a special unit based in Washington, D.C., he said.

The sharp decline worries Sabrina Strawn, executive director of the Galveston-Houston Association for Smog Prevention, which has asked the federal government to take a stronger role.

Although TCEQ has primary responsibility for enforcing environmental laws, many environmentalists say the state agency has been ineffective and that federal prosecutors have a duty to fill the void. Roger Haseman, who heads the Harris County district attorney's environmental unit, said TCEQ rarely brings pollution cases to his office.

"Many violations were handled informally, but you would come back a year later and (violators) would be doing it again," Carman said.

Rebecca Rentz, TCEQ's regional air-quality director, disagreed, saying the agency works hard to reduce pollution.

No specialized staffJustice Department figures collected by TRAC show Houston's federal prosecutors ranked 78th among 94 offices across the nation in the percentage of environmental referrals prosecuted in 2000-05. DeGabrielle said, however, that his office prosecutes such cases whenever it has the evidence.

The Southern District consists of 43 counties stretching from Huntsville to Laredo and has the largest concentration of petrochemical operations in the country, according to U.S. Coast Guard and Environmental Protection Agency data.

Despite environmental groups' complaints about pollution, 2005 was the first fiscal year since 1992 without at least one new federal environmental prosecution here.

Such cases ranked last among 11 types of cases prosecuted, according to TRAC data for 2000-05. Nationally, environmental prosecutions by all federal judicial districts ranked eighth.

The only other U.S. attorney's office in Texas with a port and a heavy petrochemical presence, the Beaumont-based Eastern District, filed two environmental prosecutions in fiscal 2005.

Unlike some U.S. attorneys' offices in cities with serious environmental problems, such as Los Angeles, New Orleans and Miami, Houston's has no full-time prosecutor or team of prosecutors specializing in such cases. Eric Schaeffer, a former EPA official who now leads the Environmental Integrity Project in Washington, D.C., says this region has a greater need than anyplace else.

EPA resources criticizedBut DeGabrielle said he doesn't have the staff or budget to spare someone for that role.

The only other office that can prosecute environmental crimes in Houston is the Harris County District Attorney's Office, whose environmental unit opened 203 cases last year, said Haseman, who has led the unit since 1991. Most cases were brought to him by a special Houston police unit.

The EPA brought at least three cases to his office last year, he said. TRAC data show the EPA took none to the U.S. Attorney's Office in fiscal 2005.

Shortly before his death in July, former U.S. Attorney Michael Shelby said he had never been satisfied with the number of environmental prosecutions by his office.

"This is one of the largest cities and ports in the world, and we can't generate one clean-air case? A city the size of ours deserves to have an aggressive environmental team," said Shelby, who was U.S. attorney here from December 2001 to June 2005.

He blamed the EPA, saying it has not provided enough investigators. Four EPA investigators here and one special agent in charge are responsible for all of the Southern District.

EPA denies understaffing

Via e-mail, the EPA denied being understaffed and said the TRAC data differ from its own. Officials refused to comment further.

Shelby said his office received so few EPA cases that his criminal enforcement chief urged him to have all environmental cases prosecuted by the Justice Department's environmental crimes section in Washington.

Although the advice was not followed, DeGabrielle said that unit is involved in three current environmental cases here, two of which led to the filing of charges.

Heavy workloadAmong the reasons for the scarcity of federal environmental prosecutions here is the U.S. Attorney's Office caseload, the heaviest in the nation. There also are budget constraints, priorities set in Washington and the complexity of environmental cases, prosecutors and environmental groups say.

TRAC figures show the local office prosecuted 20,758 cases of all types in fiscal 2005 — about 13,000 more than were handled by the Arizona office, the next-busiest.

"The immigration and narcotics cases that come in are overwhelming," DeGabrielle said. "All this at a time that I am down 13 prosecutors that I cannot hire because of our budget."

He said environmental crimes are not among the top priorities set by Attorney General Alberto Gonzales, but they will be prosecuted.

Environmental cases, especially violations of the Clean Air Act, are among the most difficult to prosecute, said Eric Reed, who handled such cases as an assistant U.S. attorney under Shelby.

The criminal cases are so hard to prove that many jurisdictions file lawsuits instead. Criminal cases require proof that someone meant to break the law, but civil cases often require only proof that a violation occurred.

Jim Tarr, a consultant who sat on the Texas Air Control Board in the 1970s, says it boils down to a political problem.

"And until those political problems get solved, the people of Houston will suffer," he said.

Power Execs Foresee Carbon Emission Caps (AP)

By Brad Foss

AP, October 22, 2006

When Duke Energy Corp. CEO James E. Rogers considers global warming, he sees more than a costly quagmire for the U.S. power industry; he sees grand monuments. Notre Dame in Paris, St. Peter's Basilica in Rome.

Rogers has adopted what he calls "cathedral thinking," a view that tackling climate change is a chance for the industry to leave a proud environmental legacy for future generations.

This philosophy may not deliver results as quickly as environmentalists would like, or sit well with all his counterparts, but it does aptly describe an approach toward reducing greenhouse gases that a small but growing number of power executives are embracing.

"The science says we need to act," said Rogers. Of course, shifting political winds are an equally persuasive force in an industry that accounts for almost 40 percent of U.S. carbon dioxide emissions.

Rogers and many other executives are convinced the United States is likely to join Europe in placing limits on carbon dioxide emissions — believed by scientists to cause global warming — perhaps as early as next decade. This rising expectation of mandatory carbon caps is reviving interest in nuclear power, accelerating the use cleaner coal-burning technologies and spurring investment in alternative fuels such as wind and biomass.

Some of the country's biggest power producers are even setting voluntary greenhouse-gas reduction goals now in hopes of gaining a competitive edge down the road.

"The first movers now kind of realize... there will be a carbon regime in this country," said Peter Fusaro, chairman of Global Change Associates and a longtime proponent of clean energy. "This is not just talk," he added.

Despite good intentions, however, it will likely be several decades before any meaningful progress is made on reducing carbon emissions, according to experts on energy and the environment. That is because half the country's electricity comes from burning coal — by far the largest industrial source of carbon dioxide — and the most promising technology for capturing these emissions and sequestering them underground is still in the experimental phase.

Meantime, the Edison Electric Institute, the industry's main trade association, is lobbying to prevent mandatory carbon caps, calling them an unnecessary financial burden at a time when the power industry needs to invest billions just to meet anticipated demand.

Rogers, who is the chairman of EEI through next June and welcomes economy-wide carbon caps, is at odds with the association's official position: it favors voluntary measures, a stance also advocated by the Bush administration.

U.S. electricity demand is expected to rise by about 1.5 percent a year, resulting in a 50 percent increase from current levels by 2030. Factor in the anticipated industrialization of China, India and other developing nations, and the global rate of growth for electricity demand is even higher.

The Electric Power Research Institute forecasts that, with today's technology, global carbon dioxide emissions will more than double by 2050 to 80 billion metric tons a year. The U.S. already accounts for more than 7 billion tons a year.

Increasing energy efficiency standards and deploying "improved versions" of today's power plants would substantially slow the rate of growth, according to EPRI, a non-profit that provides scientific and technical research on electricity. But in order to actually reduce annual global carbon dioxide emissions by 2050, EPRI estimates that nearly half of the world's electricity would need to come from carbon-free fuels, such as nuclear, wind and solar. Today, carbon-free fuels account for a third of global power generation.

This is one reason why some U.S. power executives vow to fight carbon limits unless the constraints are carried out worldwide.

"The issue is global warming, not U.S. warming," said Mike Morris, the chief executive of American Electric Power of Columbus, Ohio, the largest coal-burning utility in the country. Unless China, India and other developing nations also are forced to adopt costly alternatives to traditional fossil fuels, U.S. manufacturers — a major customer for AEP — will be at an unfair competitive disadvantage, Morris said.

But Morris has a pragmatic side as well, which is why AEP is part of a small group of companies that has voluntarily agreed to cap their carbon emissions in the United States as part of an experimental market that is based in Chicago.

Indeed, there is enough momentum at the state level that a critical mass of pragmatists say it would be foolish to ignore the writing on the wall in terms of eventual federal legislation.

· In California, Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger last month signed legislation aimed at reducing greenhouse gas emissions from utilities, refineries and manufacturing plants to 1990 levels by 2020.

· In the Northeast, a regional "cap and trade" system of buying and selling emissions allowances is being developed to cut greenhouse gases from Maine to Delaware.

· And more than 20 states require utilities to buy a share of their electricity from renewables such as wind, solar and geothermal energy.

Some opponents of mandatory carbon caps say the power industry would be better off with one federal standard than a hodgepodge of state regulations with which to comply. But, either way, the basic principle of putting a price on carbon is gaining traction: the Congressional Budget Office said last month that any cost-effective U.S. policy on global warming will require emissions taxes or a cap and trade system similar to Europe's.

It is against this backdrop of legislative activity at the state level — and with help from federal tax breaks included in last year's energy bill — that some utilities are tweaking their long-term strategies.

David Crane, the head of Princeton, N.J.-based NRG Energy, said at a recent conference that the industry's long-standing attitude of "see no carbon, hear no carbon, speak no carbon" is increasingly out of touch with mainstream American values.

Crane, who oversaw NRG's July acquisition of wind-farm developer Padoma Wind Power, predicted that "companies and industries which deny the issue will be marginalized."

The growing long-term appeal of carbon-free power in the U.S. is exemplified by the phenomenal growth of wind power, which has quadrupled since 2000 to more than 10,000 megawatts nationwide. That said, wind still represents less than 1 percent of all U.S. power capacity.

Perhaps more telling is the resurgence of interest in the U.S. for nuclear power, whose image was battered by the Three Mile Island accident in 1979 and bruised by the Chernobyl accident in 1986. Concerns about nuclear waste also run high.

But sensing that public resistance to nuclear will wane as concerns about global warming rise, more than a dozen companies, including Duke, NRG, Entergy Corp. and Exelon Corp., have notified the federal Nuclear Regulatory Commission that they plan to apply for licenses to build new reactors.

Notifications began pouring in after Congress passed an energy bill last summer that included tax credits and other perks to encourage nuclear power, which is also seen as a way to become less reliant on high and volatile natural-gas prices.

Constellation Energy Group Inc. of Baltimore, in a partnership with France's Areva called UniStar Nuclear, is considering building five new reactors, including one each at existing nuclear facilities in Maryland and New York.

For Constellation, nuclear is "the most preferred energy supply of the future," said Mike Wallace, head of the company's power-generation division.

If all goes smoothly, the first new reactor in the U.S. since the mid-1970s could be completed within ten years, analysts and industry officials said.

While nuclear presents a significant opportunity in the fight against carbon emissions, the country's unbridled dependence on traditional coal is a major obstacle.

More than 150 new coal plants have been proposed in the U.S., which has the world's largest coal reserves. And while there is much optimism about the long-term potential for "clean coal" technology, it will only be used in about 10 percent of the plants currently on the drawing board.

Even these so-called coal gasification plants will not solve global warming overnight. While they are far more efficient than older coal plants, the real promise rests in their compatibility with emissions-capture equipment. Unfortunately, "a laundry list of technical challenges" could take a decade or more to resolve, according to Revis James, director of EPRI's technology assessment division.

The dearth of simple carbon-free solutions leaves an executive like Duke's Rogers in a difficult position. Sure, he is making plans to add nuclear and coal-gasification power plants, but an important aspect of "cathedral thinking" is a recognition that addressing global warming requires immediate action.

For that reason, Rogers is promoting the need for greater energy efficiency whenever he can.

But in order for that to succeed, Rogers said elected officials and regulators will have to come up with financial incentives that will encourage utilities to sell less electricity.

"Hope," he said, "is not a plan."

Feds Set Sights On Gun Buys (ABH)

By Joe Johnson

Athens (GA) Banner-Herald, October 22, 2006

More investigations to target illegal sales

The owner of a Madison County gun shop told a convicted felon that silencers were "illegal as hell," but that he had a contact in Florida who could make one.

Within nine months, the felon bought two silencers from 46-year-old Michael Curtis Oakley of Athens, in addition to a revolver, three semi-automatic pistols, an assault rifle and boxes of ammunition - all without a background check or filling out the required paperwork.

That's the allegation in a complaint filed this week in U.S. District Court in Athens. An agent with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said that a felon wore a hidden camera and microphone to capture each illegal transaction, as he helped make a case against the owner of Oakley Outdoor Sports in downtown Colbert.

The complaint convinced a U.S. magistrate on Monday to authorize police and ATF agents to arrest Oakley for violating federal firearms regulations. The magistrate also signed warrants that led authorities to seize dozens of weapons from Oakley's gun shop and search his house at 356 Oak Meadows Drive, where officials confiscated documents and other evidence.

The agent's complaint purports to show how guns are winding up on the streets and in the wrong hands, even when the source is a federally licensed firearms dealer.

In a similar ATF sting last month, authorities arrested another Athens man and four others for allegedly trafficking in guns at the J&J Flea Market in Jackson County. According to indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Gainesville, the men weren't licensed firearms dealers, but they sold guns to convicted felons, illegal immigrants and an undercover ATF agent posing as an out-of state resident.

Agents seized 130 firearms in that case.

Firearms trafficking is not necessarily on the rise, but the number of investigations to find the source of illegal guns is, according to Special Agent Marc Jackson of the ATF's Atlanta field division.

"Part of our mission is to reduce violent crime and protect the public by disrupting the source (of illegal guns), and that source could be the dealers themselves," Jackson said.

Federal, state and local law enforcement agencies are working more closely in the wake of Project Safe Neighborhoods, according to Jackson. The 2001 initiative has tripled the number of suspects police and ATF agents forward to the U.S. Justice Department for prosecution, he said.

Backed by $1.5 billion in federal money, Project Safe Neighborhoods also has allowed the ATF to hire more agents to help state and local police to decide whether cases should be prosecuted on the federal level and train licensed dealers to spot "straw buyers" who buy guns in their own names for people who cannot.

"It's a collaborative effort which seeks to combat the problem of gun violence through more aggressive prosecutions," Jackson said.

Athens-Clarke police Lt. Mike Hunsinger, who heads the Western Judicial Circuit Drug Task Force, says his unit's investigations are the main way local police find illegal weapons, because guns and drugs go hand in hand.

"Any time we recover a firearm associated with a drug-related crime, we pursue federal prosecution if needed," Hunsinger said. "We're working more closely with the ATF than ever to conduct these investigations."

In Oakley's case, it took a criminal to catch another alleged criminal.

According to the ATF agent's complaint, an informant who pleaded guilty to unspecified drug charges, but hadn't yet been sentenced, told Athens-Clarke police last December that Oakley had sold guns to another convicted felon and known drug trafficker.

The informant was not given or promised anything in return for the information, according to the ATF agent, and had helped Athens-Clarke police in at least seven previous investigations that landed two other people in federal custody on drug and firearms charges.

Oakley allegedly violated several federal laws when he sold guns to the informant, including failing to note transactions in an "acquisition and disposition" ledger that licensed dealers are required to maintain.

Oakley's gun shop also held weapons that weren't registered under the National Firearms Act, according to the ATF complaint. Under the law, licensed dealers must register and pay taxes on certain firearms and accessories, like machine-guns and silencers.

Since it's illegal for a dealer to sell guns to certain people - convicted felons, illegal aliens, dishonorably discharged soldiers and people convicted of misdemeanor domestic violence - gun sellers must conduct background checks on customers.

And each time he sells a gun, the dealer must file a form with the ATF that has the buyer's information on it.

Dealers must keep records for each transaction for 20 years, according to Jackson, and those records help investigators trace the history of a gun used in a crime from the time it was made to the last time it was sold.

Joseph Thornton Jr., who manages Thornton's Pawn Center for his father, is a federally licensed gun dealer who says some dealers don't keep proper records because they are too lazy.

"There is a lot of paperwork you've got to do, but either you want to do the right thing or not," Thornton said. "We've been in business 27 years and I'd like to stay in business another 27 years, and if I abide by the law, I will be in business."

Some people sell guns without licenses because the black market is lucrative, according to Thornton, who said he saw an assault-style rifle sold at J&J Flea Market before last month's sting, and recognized the black market price was twice the legitimate value.

"There's so much money that can be made and people allow the fruit to become so tasty," he said.

TAX:

By Jeffrey H. Birnbaum

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Taxing Lessons, 20 Years In the Making

T wenty years ago today, President Ronald Reagan signed into law the broadest revision of the federal income tax in history. The Tax Reform Act of 1986 -- the biggest and most controversial legislative story of its time -- had lawmakers, lobbyists and journalists in Washington in an uproar for two years. Despite nearly dying several times, the measure eventually passed, producing a simpler code with fewer tax breaks and significantly lower rates. The changes affected every family and business in the nation.

In the years since, however, rates have gradually risen and Congress has passed nearly 15,000 changes to the tax law. Many of the loopholes that disappeared two decades ago are back. Now, as then, politicians (including President Bush) are branding the income tax unfair and calling for reform. And now, as then, few expect it to happen.

But what lessons from the tax revisions of 1986 might apply to a similar effort today?

1 Fair or simple -- take your pick. Politicians claim to desire a tax system that is both fair and simple, but one goal precludes the other. The tax code can be fair -- meaning that the government offers taxpayers incentives to do meritorious deeds such as buy houses and give to charity. Or it can be simple -- devoid of those exceptions and complications. But it can't be both. In '86, Congress bought off state and local governments by keeping their pet tax breaks alive, clearing the way for the elimination of hundreds of less resilient benefits and the creation of a much simpler code.

2 Divide and conquer. Divided government is a boon to reform, not an obstacle. In 1986, Republicans controlled the White House and the Senate while Democrats held the House. Neither party wanted the blame for killing a bill that the public favored, so the measure kept moving forward. If the Democrats take back the House, Senate or both in next month's elections, that could be good news for advocates of Tax Reform II.

3 Block K Street. Any tax-reform effort will be doomed if lobbying groups are united against it. In 1986, light industries such as wholesalers and consumer-products companies supported reform because they wanted lower tax rates, whereas heavy industries such as steel makers and oil refiners wanted to hold on to their tax breaks and thus tried to squash the bill. (In fact, the bill spurred so much lobbying on both sides that pundits dubbed it the Lobbying Relief Act of 1986.) A new tax reform would have to create -- or hope for -- a similar rift. However, K Street has grown much more powerful since then. Having learned the hard way 20 years ago, lobbyists are wise to that game now.

4 Stick it in neutral. Tax reform passed 20 years ago in part because its drafters decided early on that the measure should be "revenue neutral," that is, neither raise nor lower overall taxes. However, today's already stressed system doesn't raise enough money to fund the federal government and will soon be deeper in the hole thanks to the exploding costs of Social Security and Medicare. Any future reform probably would have to increase tax revenue, whether through rejiggering the code or by introducing new taxes -- making reform efforts that much more difficult and unlikely.

5 Don't lose those hedge clippers. The tax code is like shrubbery. The more severely it's pruned, the bigger and stronger it will grow back. Whatever changes a new bout of tax reform might bring, interest groups will almost certainly persuade Congress to clutter the code once again. If a second tax reform act comes to pass, rest assured that a third one will be needed a couple of decades later.

Newest Vets Fed Up With VA Care (CHIST)

By Shamus Toomey

Chicago Sun-Times, October 22, 2006

As an Army combat medic in Iraq, Sgt. Bob Stead was proud to wear the uniform and proud to help wounded soldiers.

DOJ_NMG_0084709

But after getting his right leg blown apart and becoming a wounded soldier himself in 2003, Stead says he often doesn't see the same level of pride from the Veterans Affairs Department workers who help treat him.

"If you've got a job taking care of veterans, you should be proud to come to work," said Stead, 34, of Addison.

So Stead went to Rosemont this weekend to try to do something about it. He was part of a national conference sponsored by Amvets that aims to improve the lives of young veterans by using their experiences to reshape the VA.

The first National Symposium for the Needs of Young Veterans drew hundreds of vets to the Hyatt Regency O'Hare during its four-day run, which ended Saturday. They listened to speakers like retired Gen. Tommy Franks and Democratic congressional nominee Tammy Duckworth, and broke into small groups to come up with answers.

VA holds off on commenting "The goal is to develop an update of the veterans' benefits system," said Thomas C. McGriff, national commander of Amvets. "The system really hasn't been looked at since World War II -- and we now have a new set of young veterans coming from Iraq and Afghanistan."

Amvets plans to compress what it learned from the vets into a report to be released Nov. 9 in Washington, D.C.

The VA had nearly a dozen senior benefits officials at the conference but will wait to see what recommendations Amvets develops before commenting, VA spokesman Ryan Steinback said.

For Stead, he wants to see more accountability for VA workers who deal directly with the veterans. He was injured outside of Fallujah three years ago and is still in constant pain from his leg injury.

He recognizes that, with his severe post traumatic stress disorder, he is not always the easiest patient to deal with. But he still fumes at "being treated like crap" at some VA facilities during his recovery. "The bottom line is, the vets are the customers," he said.

'No magic pill' Steinback said "we certainly hope that is not the average experience at our medical centers," and noted that VA centers nationwide have better customer satisfaction records than non-military hospitals.

At the Jesse Brown VA Medical Center on the Near West Side, a program named CREW -- Civility, Respect and Engagement in the Workplace -- was implemented in August. An outside consultant is on site, assessing the customer service environment, Steinback said. A goal is to make sure workers know that "only their best efforts are good enough for veterans," he said.

Stead knows there's "no magic pill" but hopes the Amvets efforts lead to something positive.

"I'm hoping that with a louder voice, if a mass of people come together with some ideas and say, 'This is what we want,' some measure of change can come," he said.

U.S. Stocks' Three-Week Rally Slows After Dow Reaches Record (BLOOM)

By Michael Tsang

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

Oct. 21 (Bloomberg) -- A three-week rally in U.S. stocks, which lifted the Dow Jones Industrial Average past 12,000 for the first time, slowed this week as earnings from Caterpillar Inc. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. underscored concern that profit growth has peaked.

Technology shares such as Applied Materials Inc. dropped after semiconductor-equipment orders slowed and Intel Corp., the world's largest chipmaker, said it plans to spend less this year.

``While the growth continues, it continues at a diminishing rate," said Cummins Catherwood, who helps manage $750 million at Walnut Asset Management LLC in Philadelphia. ``It gives you a little bit of pause in terms of your euphoria."

The Dow industrials added 0.4 percent to 12,002.37 after rising to a record three times this week. The Standard & Poor's 500 Index gained 0.2 percent to 1368.60. The Nasdaq Composite Index declined 0.6 percent to 2342.30.

For the Dow and the S&P 500, the gains were the smallest since the week ended in Aug. 4, while the Nasdaq's loss snapped a three-week winning stretch. Heightened concern that profit growth will deteriorate in coming quarters amid a slowing economy held back the market.

Earnings of S&P 500 companies will climb 8.8 percent in the first three months of 2007, according to Thomson Financial on Oct. 20. That would snap a string of 14 straight quarters of at least 10 percent growth, the longest such streak in five decades.

Economic Reports

Reports this week also cast more doubt on the economy's strength. Industrial production in September fell the most in a year, while manufacturing in the Philadelphia area unexpectedly contracted this month. The Conference Board's index of leading indicators, which points to the direction of the economy in the next three to six months, rose less than expected in September.

DOJ_NMG_0084710

Industrial stocks, which include Caterpillar, led declines among the 10 industry groups in the S&P 500 this week, falling 1 percent.

Caterpillar, whose fourfold gain has led the Dow's rally from the average's trough in October 2002, slumped more than 14 percent to $59.

The world's largest maker of earth-moving equipment said sales growth next year will be flat to 5 percent, citing a slowdown in the U.S. economy triggered by the housing slump. Its third-quarter profit also rose less than analysts' forecasts.

JPMorgan, the third-largest U.S. bank, paced declines among financial shares. The stock declined 2.2 percent to $47.12 after touching an all-time high last week.

`Some Apprehension'

Revenue from consumer banking declined after demand for mortgages slumped, JPMorgan said, while lower fees and interest income led to a drop in credit-card revenue.

``The rate of earnings growth is slowing and that is causing some apprehension in the market,'' said Joel Binder, who oversees about $1 billion as chief investment officer at Aurora, Illinois- based Old Second Wealth Management.

Technology-related shares posted some of the market's biggest declines. The Philadelphia Semiconductor Index, which tracks 19 chip-related companies, fell 5.1 percent for the week, the biggest such drop since July.

Chip-equipment companies reported September orders that indicate chipmakers may be slowing their capacity expansion for a third straight month, according to a report by Semiconductor Equipment & Materials International.

Meanwhile, Intel lowered its spending budget on new plants and equipment to a maximum of $5.9 billion from a forecast of about $6.2 billion.

Applied Materials, the world's biggest maker of semiconductor-production equipment, slid 9.3 percent to $17.25.

Good and Bad

Novellus Systems Inc., which also makes semiconductor- production equipment, slumped 7.7 percent to $26.81. The company forecast revenue that missed analysts' estimates.

SanDisk Corp., the world's largest maker of flash-memory cards, plunged almost 17 percent to $49.15 after price cuts eroded its third-quarter profit. SanDisk expects prices to decline 15 percent to 20 percent in the fourth quarter from the previous three months.

Disappointing results from industrial, financial and technology companies were mixed with earnings from health-care companies that exceeded expectations.

Johnson & Johnson advanced 6.3 percent to $68.62 in the week. The maker of health products from Band-aids to schizophrenia pills said third-quarter earnings rose, led by sales of prescription drugs. Profit excluding certain costs beat the average analysts' estimate, and J&J raised its 2006 forecast.

Merck & Co. rallied 5.7 percent to $45.64. The drugmaker raised its full-year profit forecast for the third time this year to a range of $2.18 to $2.25 a share from an earlier range of $2.10 to $2.24.

UnitedHealth Group Inc. gained 4 percent to $50.70. The largest U.S. provider of health insurance reported third-quarter net income jumped 38 percent after acquisitions raised the number of policyholders. The profit beat analysts' estimates by 3 cents, and UnitedHealth increased its forecast for next year.

Newsweek Says 55% Of U.S. Public Plans To Vote For Democrats (BLOOM)

By Neil Roland

Bloomberg, October 22, 2006

By a 55-to-37 percent margin, Americans who say they are likely to vote in the Nov. 7 elections plan to cast their ballots for Democratic candidates, according to a new Newsweek poll.

The Democrats have gained among both white Catholics and white evangelicals in the last two years, the poll released today showed. Among independents, 44 percent favor the Democrat in their district while 34 percent prefer the Republican candidate.

Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats to win control of the House and six to gain control of the Senate. While President George W. Bush has predicted that the Republicans will keep their congressional majorities, former House Majority Leader Richard Armey, a Texas Republican, said yesterday that Democrats may gain a majority of 10 seats in the House.

In the Newsweek poll, Bush's approval rating is at 35 percent, with 57 percent of Americans saying they disapprove of his performance. In an all-time low in the survey, 65 percent of Americans said the U.S. is losing ground in efforts to build security and democracy in Iraq.

A majority of respondents -- 56 percent, including 23 percent of Republicans -- said they believe Bush won't be able to achieve much for the rest of his second term.

The poll showed that 60 percent of white evangelicals plan to vote for a Republican candidate, and 31 percent for a Democrat. Exit polls after the 2004 elections found that 74 percent of white evangelicals voted for Republicans, while 25 percent voted for Democrats, Newsweek said.

In today's poll, Democrats received the support of 44 percent of white Catholics, while 42 percent said the planned to vote for Republicans. Catholics overwhelmingly supported Bush in the 2004 presidential election.

Asked to name the issue that is most important to their vote, 31 percent of respondents cited Iraq, 18 percent said the economy and 16 percent said health care.

Princeton Survey Research Associates International, which conducted the survey, interviewed 1,000 adults aged 18 and older on Oct. 19-20. The margin of error is plus or minus 4 percentage points.

A Possibly Fatal Flaw In GOP Formula For Success (LAT)

Ronald Brownstein Washington Outlook

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The great risk in President Bush's political strategy has always been that it leaves him very little margin for error.

From the outset of his presidency, Bush has accepted division as the price of mobilization.

With a few exceptions, such as education and immigration policy, he has targeted his central initiatives — tax cuts, judicial appointments, the unilateral projection of U.S. power abroad — primarily at the priorities of conservatives while conceding little to interests outside his coalition.

In Congress and across the country, that ideologically polarizing agenda has helped Bush unify and excite Republicans. But it has come at the cost of antagonizing Democrats and straining his relations with independent voters.

This strategy has rested on the calculation that if Bush generates enough turnout on election day from Republicans and conservative-leaning independents, he can survive unease among moderate independents and intense opposition from Democrats.

On balance, that equation worked for Bush in his first term. Bolstered by his post-9/11 glow, Bush inspired an enormous Republican turnout that spurred GOP congressional gains in 2002. In 2004, another Republican surge powered gains in Congress and Bush's reelection over Democrat John F. Kerry. For Karl Rove and other top GOP strategists, those victories were evidence that Bush was building a narrow but stable electoral majority.

But even amid success, the limitations of the strategy were evident. Although Bush inspired passionate commitment from his supporters, he did not generate anywhere near the breadth of support that other two-term presidents, such as Dwight D. Eisenhower or Ronald Reagan, achieved at their apogee.

Bush's margin of victory over Kerry, measured as a share of the popular vote, was the smallest ever for a reelected president. Even in the usual post-election honeymoon period, Bush's approval rating never exceeded 55% in Gallup surveys, below the high point for every other reelected president since World War II. Bush's support fell back beneath 50% even before his second inauguration.

All of this meant that even on Bush's best days, nearly half the country opposed him and his direction. That didn't leave him with much of a cushion for bad days, which have come in bunches during his second term.

A combination of missteps (the faltering federal response to Hurricane Katrina) and miscalculations (the Terri Schiavo case, the crash of the Social Security restructuring plan) topped by the relentless, grinding violence and disorder in Iraq, have kept Bush on the defensive almost constantly since early 2005.

Because Bush started with backing from only about half the country, these reversals have lowered him, and his party, to dangerous depths. His approval rating since mid-2005 has rarely reached 45%, and he is now limping into the midterm election with support in most surveys below 40%.

That discontent over Bush's performance and decisions, especially concerning Iraq, is the largest factor threatening the GOP hold on the House and Senate.

One measure of Bush's impact on the election comes from the Majority Watch project conducted by the polling firms RT Strategies and Constituent Dynamics. Since the summer, the project has conducted nearly 75,000 automated phone surveys in congressional districts around the country. And it has found a close correlation between attitudes about Bush and preferences in November.

Tom Riehle, a partner at RT Strategies, recently cumulated the results of the project's interviews. He found that 80% of voters who approve of Bush's performance say they intend to vote Republican for Congress next month. But 77% of those who disapprove intend to vote Democratic.

That result partly reflects the intense partisanship of our time. But even among independents, attitudes toward Bush are a clear dividing line. Fully 71% of independents who approve of him say they will vote Republican. But 73% of independents who disapprove are voting Democratic.

The obvious danger for Republicans is that far more voters in the surveys disapprove (53%) than approve of Bush's performance (39%). Among independents, those who disapprove outnumber supporters by 2 to 1.

Bush's decline is exposing Republican candidates to different risks in different places. In Democratic-leaning states, Republicans who have survived as moderates are facing more resistance from center-left voters reluctant to help Bush advance his agenda by providing the GOP another vote in Congress.

"He's a really good and decent man, but he empowers the Bush administration," Anne Crofts of Providence said at a recent local Democratic rally to explain why she would vote against moderate Sen. Lincoln Chafee (R-R.I.).

In states that are more conservative, Republicans confront two risks. The lesser threat is that Bush's assorted second-term disputes with conservative leaders and the congressional sex scandal may somewhat depress turnout by the GOP base. The bigger danger is a powerful desire for change even among many voters who philosophically tilt more toward Republicans than Democrats. Voters "are overlooking a lot of things about the Democrats that would normally bother them because they want change," said one senior GOP strategist.

Bush is once again stressing sharp-edged ideological differences with Democrats on taxes and national security; maybe that will rally enough conservatives to the polls to avoid a deluge on Nov. 7. But if a deluge comes, more of the Republicans looking to succeed Bush in 2008 may ask whether a political strategy that provokes so much opposition, even on its strongest days, can be sustained. They may also question whether the White House vision of a narrow but stable electoral majority is a contradiction in terms.

Voter Ire May Tip Scale In House (BOS)

The Boston Globe, October 22, 2006

Democrats seize on scandals, war

The following story was reported and written by Susan Milligan, Rick Klein, and Bryan Bender of the Globe staff.

DELHI, Ohio -- As Democratic House candidate John Cranley works the bingo halls and street festivals of Cincinnati, he hands out blue plastic cups that he hopes will help knock Representative Steve Chabot out of office -- and House Republicans out of the majority.

"Had enough?" the cups said.

To the distress of a Republican Party that has held control of the House for the past dozen years, many voters across the country seem to be nodding in angry agreement with Cranley's assertion, according to interviews with voters in four states and new polls showing a double-digit preference for Democratic control of the House.

But no single issue is motivating voters' disaffection with the GOP -- and some issues, such as the Iraq war, are hurting the Republicans differently in various parts of the country.

Those in the Northeast want a quick withdrawal from Iraq, while more conservative, traditionally pro military districts in Pennsylvania are hopeful that Democrats will manage the war more competently than Republicans.

Voters from New York to California are questioning their representatives' commitment to ethics, and those in post industrial pockets of the Midwest are nervous about their economic security.

Voters' anger over such a disparate collection of issues is threatening the political lives of even seasoned Republicans, and Democratic challengers with little or no experience are registering strong support in polls.

"This election is about change versus the status quo," said Cranley, a 32-year-old Cincinnati city councilor, at a debate in Delhi on Wednesday night. "It is a do-nothing Congress at best. It's a corrupt Congress at worst."

As Democrats have risen in polls over the past three weeks, a growing number of seats -- perhaps as many as 58 -- are now considered in play by the national parties and independent analysts. Democrats need to pick up 15 Republican-held seats to retake the majority.

An unusual bipartisan poll released last week showed that 51 percent of voters in 50 of the most competitive districts want the Democrats running the House, compared with 40 percent who want Republicans in charge. When voters were asked about their own districts, Democrats were favored 50 percent to 43 percent, according to the poll conducted by Democrat Stan Greenberg and Republican Glen Bolger .

John Zogby , an independent pollster, said his data shows the Democrats poised to pick up 25 to 30 seats, even though the party has not offered a detailed agenda; rather, a confluence of events has turned voters against Republicans.

"If the Democrats win, it will be a Forrest Gump victory, with things swirling around them over which they had very little control," Zogby said.

GOP candidates still have more than two weeks to turn things around, and a major event, such as a terrorist attack, or a massive infusion of cash from Republican donors, could help the GOP eke out critical victories.

And it remains to be seen whether voters will opt for untested Democrats like Cranley over Republicans like Chabot, a six-term incumbent who rang up 60 percent of the vote in 2004.

But the fact that Chabot's district is considered in play points to the extent of voter anger against incumbents.

"I look at Congress now, and I wonder if they have lost touch with your average person," said Terri Rolfes , an administrative assistant at a Cincinnati-area Christian publishing company who is considering switching her vote to Democratic. "Maybe it's time for a change."

In upstate New York and beyond, corruption puts GOP seats in play Gasport, N.Y., is friendly territory for a moderate, antiabortion Republican like Representative Thomas Reynolds, who has held the Buffalo-area seat for a decade. Some of the district's rural churches plant rows of tiny crosses in their yards to mark abortions, while affluent suburbanites applaud Reynolds's commitment to lower taxes.

But the news last month that Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, had written sexually explicit e-mails to teenage House pages, put the spotlight on GOP leaders like Reynolds, the chairman of the committee charged with getting other Republicans elected to Congress.

Reynolds was contending with local frustration over the war and the economy. But the revelation that Reynolds had known of Foley's overly friendly e-mails to one page when he encouraged the Florida representative to seek reelection earlier this year has turned more voters against him.

"I certainly won't be voting for him," said Elizabeth Shabala, a 40-year-old speech pathologist, as she visited a local pumpkin farm. "This isn't an issue of Republicans versus Democrats. It's about protection of children."

Democratic challengers have used the Foley scandal to portray Republicans as more concerned with their political futures than the safety of teenagers. Democratic contenders in Indiana, New York, Minnesota, and New Mexico have used the Foley scandal in ads, while numerous others have done so in debates.

Democrats had sought to make the "culture of corruption" a major campaign theme last year, after several GOP lawmakers were linked to lobbyist Jack Abramoff; former Representative Randy "Duke" Cunningham, Republican of California, was sent to prison for taking bribes; and former House majority leader Tom DeLay of Texas stepped down amid charges he misused campaign funds.

But the corruption theme didn't resonate until the Foley scandal, which undermined the "family values" the GOP has been trumpeting for years. While Republicans have sought to draw attention to Democratic corruption as well, the issue has hit Republicans harder.

At a minimum, formerly safe Republican seats held by Foley, who resigned after the scandal broke, Cunningham, DeLay, and Bob Ney of Ohio, who resigned after admitting to accepting bribes from Abramoff's clients, are now considered potential Democratic pickups.

In addition, senior Republicans such as Reynolds and Representative Deborah Pryce of Ohio, the GOP's conference chair, are under fire for failing to take action against Foley. And some analysts think the ethics cases have combined to fuel voters' desire to clean house.

"The whole is bigger than the sum of its parts," said Lee Miringoff , director of the independent Marist Institute for Public Opinion. Voters were "already grumpy about the performance of Congress," and the accumulation of scandals could tip the scales in close races, he said.

In conservative sections of Pennsylvania, voters reassess the war in Iraq Mizanur Rahman , perched behind the cash register of Halal Meat and Grocery in Upper Darby, Pa., nearly shouted when asked about his views on the Iraq war.

"We have made more enemies," he bellowed last Sunday, causing the butchers in the back of the store to look up from their carving table. "When our soldier kills their kid they are going to kill us. How many more enemies are we going to make?"

Most of Pennsylvania is not antiwar country, but many voters -- including Rahman -- have lost patience with the way the Iraq war is being run in Washington. Many who supported the invasion now say the war has been mishandled, and some are gravitating toward Democrats who are calling for new leadership -- but not an immediate pullout.

"More and more people -- I think a majority -- believe there must be a deliberate way out," said Joe Sestak , a former Navy admiral who is the Democratic nominee against 10-term incumbent Representative Curt Weldon . "They don't want to leave a mess, but they have come to the conclusion there is no military solution to this."

Sestak's message seems to be resonating. In a race that analysts earlier this year thought was safe for the GOP, Sestak has recently been running even with Weldon in most polls. Sestak's chances may have improved this week when the FBI raided the home of Weldon's daughter as part of an investigation into whether the representative assisted her public-relations firm.

Weldon denied any wrongdoing, and voters still seem more focused on the war than on last Monday's FBI raid.

Even in the so-called "T" of solidly Republican central and northern Pennsylvania, outside the urban orbits of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, concern about the war is helping Democrats.

The voter frustration has given a boost to Chris Carney, a college professor and intelligence officer in the Navy Reserve who hopes to be the first Democrat since 1960 to win the state's northeastern 10th district.

Carney is ahead of four-term Republican incumbent Representative Don Sherwood by double digits in some polls, and analysts attribute much of his gains to the unpopularity of the war in a district heavy with military families. At least 21 soldiers from the district have died in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Sherwood is also dogged by alleged improprieties: A woman with whom he was having an extramarital affair told authorities that he tried to strangle her. He acknowledged the affair but denied the abuse. A recent poll showed that the top issue for voters is Iraq, not Sherwood's personal conduct, said analyst Jonathan Williamson of Lycoming College in Williamsport.

"Among those [citing Iraq], most broke for Carney," Williamson said.

Carney has not called for a pullout; rather, he's pledged to stand up for the soldiers and help bring the war to an honorable end.

"I haven't called for a timeline -- I haven't pulled that trigger yet," Carney said in an interview last week in Clarks Summit, north of Scranton. "But I am starting to think seriously about it."

In the Northeast, no more patience for a war many feel shouldn't have started There is little such hesitation in the Northeast, where President Bush is deeply unpopular and some voters seem willing to toss out even highly respected moderate Republicans just because of their party affiliation.

Democrats ruefully note there is some precedent for a cleansing of the moderates: In 1994, when the Republicans took over the House, Southern voters ousted numerous long-serving moderate Democrats largely because of their affiliation with President Clinton.

"The war has pushed a lot of people over to thinking there ought to be a change in Washington," said Howard Reiter, the chairman of the political science department at the University of Connecticut, referring to the frustration with Republican moderates. "For the past 40 or 50 years, there's been a trend away from the Republican Party in New England and the greater Northeast. It's been a long time brewing."

As a result, moderate Republican House members across the region are seeking to emphasize their ties to their districts, while distancing themselves from Bush.

In Connecticut, where anti war fervor helped political neophyte Ned Lamont defeat incumbent Senator Joseph I. Lieberman in the August Democratic primary, three Republicans are locked in down-to-the-wire House races.

Perhaps the most vulnerable is Representative Christopher Shays, a centrist from Connecticut's New York suburbs who has made 14 trips to Iraq to assess the progress of a war he enthusiastically supported. But he recently called for a timeline for troop withdrawal -- opening him up to charges of election-year pandering.

Democrat Diane Farrell, who came close to defeating Shays two years ago and is leading in some polls this year, is blasting Shays for supporting the war -- and mocking him for being an ineffectual opposition voice.

"When Chris Shays has agreed with the president, have the results been good?" Farrell said during a recent debate. "When he's disagreed with the Republican leadership, has it made any difference?"

Similar dynamics are playing out in New Hampshire, where Democrats are hoping to break into the all-Republican congressional delegation in the only state that flipped from President Bush in 2000 to his election rival, Senator John F. Kerry, in 2004.

In one district, antiwar activist Carol Shea-Porter beat the Democratic establishment's favored candidate to win the right to face Representative Jeb Bradley. And in another district, Democrat Paul Hodes is casting Representative Charles Bass's backing of the war as emblematic of his support for the Bush administration's "failed ideas."

Both Shea-Porter and Hodes trail in most polls, but Democratic strategists believe they are in striking distance.

"The larger context really is that Congress isn't working for us," Hodes said in an interview. "The administration and guys like Bass are in a state of denial."

In Ohio, Indiana, and Kentucky, concerns about a loss of jobs The economy should be a selling point for Republicans, who have presided over growth in the gross domestic product, relatively low unemployment, and steady job creation. But in parts of the Midwest, voters who have lost jobs to overseas competitors don't want to hear about it.

DOJ_NMG_0084715

In the traditional GOP strongholds of Indiana, Kentucky, and Ohio, the party is in danger of losing critical congressional seats because voters are uneasy about their personal finances. In Ohio, which has lost 200,000 manufacturing jobs in the past five years, two-thirds of residents believe the state's economy is worsening, according to a poll by the University of Cincinnati.

"[Representative Steve] Chabot continues to take money from oil companies, and I can't afford the price of gas," said Lee Valerio, a single mother from the Cincinnati suburb of Anderson. "We've lost jobs in Cincinnati, and people are always moving out of the city. We need a fresh face."

While Americans commonly list jobs and the economy as major concerns, the Republican Congress's solid performance on job growth and economic expansion over the past two years has not helped them in most places. Even the recent drop in gas prices has been met with skepticism: 42 percent of voters in a September Gallup poll said they thought gas prices were being manipulated by the Bush administration to influence the elections.

Brad Ellsworth, a Democratic candidate in Indiana, slammed GOP incumbent John Hostettler in a television ad for failing to get "tough" on gas "price-gouging," and bemoaned the high cost for parents driving children to soccer practice.

In Indiana and Iowa, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has run radio ads on the failure of the GOP-run House to raise the minimum wage. In a parody of a game show, an announcer says, "Let's play who deserves a pay raise!" The ad compares a hotel clerk who earns $5.15 an hour to Republican representatives who blocked minimum-wage increases, but voted a pay increase for themselves.

The Bush administration and some members of Congress frequently tout the good performance of the overall economy, but that's not likely to make a difference in critical districts, analysts say.

"It doesn't even make sense to talk about the national economy right now," said Jared Bernstein, an economist with the Economic Policy Institute. "The way the economy is playing out is very much local."

And that, like the war and corruption, is hurting the GOP.

Thinning The Herd (NYT)

By David Brooks

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

"Tell us, why, again, Republicans need 55 senators?" Rush Limbaugh asked not long ago. "Why do we need 55 senators when we have so many malcontents and traitors in the bunch? And they all happen to be from the Northeast, and they all happen to be moderates, they all happen to be liberals."

In that spirit, the National Federation of Republican Assemblies set out to rid the party of this threat. It set up a "RINO Hunters Club" to "root out and hunt down" the squishy centrists who are Republicans in Name Only. The Club for Growth ran candidates to defeat them. Last week on his radio show, Sean Hannity blasted the RINO's again, saying they were costing good conservatives their jobs.

Well, this is one problem the Republican Party is solving. When the next Congress convenes, there will be many fewer RINO's in town. You look at the vulnerable Republicans and it's like a moderate Republican graveyard: Deborah Pryce, a bright and effective member from Ohio; Christopher Shays from Connecticut; Sweeney from New York; Gerlach from Pennsylvania; Reichert from Washington; DeWine from Ohio.

Why have 55 Republican senators? Why not 25? Why not 15 brave and true? Throw in a few dozen pure-minded Republican House members and you could hold the next Republican convention in a living room.

For the past several years, Republican elites have treated the moderates, upon whom their majority depended, as the deformed cousins of their movement. Congressmen from rock-ribbed Republican districts who've never had to confront a dissenting view applaud themselves for their manly courage while scorning the effete wispiness of Northeastern Republicans who go home and battle derision every weekend. The centrists themselves are so beaten down, they learned they can't even utter the word "moderate" in the halls of Congress. Instead, they unveiled what they called their "Suburban" agenda.

But the suburbs happen to be where this election is being fought — around Philadelphia, New York, Denver, Minneapolis and Columbus. The general rule is that Democrats win in the more densely populated suburbs close to the cities and the Republicans win the more sparsely populated ones farther out. The central fight in American politics now is over where the line is demarking the two zones, and the central Republican problem is that every time the party mobilizes its exurban base it further alienates the marginal voters in traditional suburbs where Congressional elections are won or lost.

The Republican moderates come from Lands' End and Eddie Bauer-rich tipping zones. The people in the office parks in these places may not be zillionaires, but they run the meeting planning firms that help HR executives facilitate sales force enrichment retreats.

They are looking for orderly places to raise their children. They are what you might call antiparty empiricists. They distrust partisans and can't imagine why anyone would be sick enough to base an identity on a political organization. They don't expect much from government but a few competently delivered services, and they don't like public officials who unnerve them.

The Republicans used to do well in these areas, but now it's as if they are purposely trying to antagonize the married moms at the pseudo-New Urbanist outdoor cafes. The deficits alarm them. Tom DeLay was a perfectly designed Northeastern alienation machine. As insular Democrats know little about what life is like in flyover country, so insular Republicans know little about how people think in the suburban Northeast, where blue New York Times delivery bags dot the driveways each morn.

The big issue is Iraq, but the core problem with suburban voters is not the decision to go to war; it's the White House's reaction to the mess afterward. As Robert Lang, the superlative suburban specialist at Virginia Tech, notes, when people mess up a project in an office park, there are consequences. But Donald Rumsfeld never gets fired. Jerry Bremer and Tommy Franks get medals.

This is not how engineers and empirically minded managers behave. The people in these offices manage information for a living, and when they see Republicans denying obvious trends, or shutting out relevant data, they say to themselves, "Those people are not like me."

So there goes your majority. In the years ahead, Republicans can either reintroduce themselves to the blue-state suburbs or they can ask themselves the dittohead question: Tell us, why, again, do we need to be a governing party anyway?

The Mere Midterms (NYT)

By Noah Feldman

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

When we go to the polls, we are doing two things at once. Pragmatically speaking, we are hoping to influence government policies and alter the behavior of the legislators and officials who design and implement them. Symbolically speaking, however, we're doing something more profound and less practical: expressing our collective verdict on the state of the nation. The people's voice is supposed to replace divine judgment as the ultimate yea or nay on the government in power: vox populi, vox dei.

Presidential elections still fulfill both of these functions. In the modern era, though, midterm elections have come to serve mainly as expressions of the public mood. Putting aside especially popular or unpopular local candidates, they offer a snapshot judgment on the president's performance — more like a midterm exam than a final that really counts. Voter turnout reflects these diminished stakes. Even though control of both the House and the Senate could change, and the late Bush years are politically charged times by any measure, we'll be lucky if more than 40 percent of the American electorate bothers to vote — as opposed to 60 percent in 2004.

Under the right circumstances, of course, a strong midterm result can directly influence policy making. The 1994 elections that brought Newt Gingrich to power in the House decisively shaped the remaining years of Bill Clinton's presidency, pushing him further to the right and bringing out his latent tendency to govern every day as if an election were being held the next. And even a lame-duck president can be affected by a clear midterm message if he wants to see his vice president elected and preserve his historical legacy.

This year, though, it is doubtful that the midterm elections will significantly alter the Bush administration's way of governing. For one thing, we're faced with the anomaly of the first vice president in recent times who has no intention of running for president himself. With the presidential election two years off, the Bush administration (read: Karl Rove) is very far from anointing a successor, if indeed it ever will. Of course, the Republican Party wants to win the White House in 2008, but the day he leaves office,

George W. Bush will no longer be the leader of that party. His own incentives are not necessarily aligned with those of the G.O.P. faithful.

Whether by coincidence or not, Bush is also a president who has been doggedly consistent in staying the course, come what may. Tax-cutting in the face of mounting deficits is one case in point, Iraq another. To his supporters, the continuity is a sign of his steadfast faith in his principles. To his critics, the intransigence reveals a president closed to new information, locked into dogmatic ideals and unable to accommodate reality. Both sides, though, agree that the president is no flip-flopper. That means he is particularly unlikely to change his policies as a result of a midterm message that the American people aren't satisfied with the job he's doing.

So what kind of a message will we the people send to Washington? Polls show that roughly 40 percent of Americans identify themselves as conservative and that their support for the president remains strong. On some issues, like immigration, the president has alienated parts of his right-wing base. (Of course, his views match not only those of globalist liberals but also of corporate America with its unceasing need for cheap labor.) But their frustration notwithstanding, true-red conservatives have nowhere else to go.

Another 20 percent of the electorate describe themselves as liberal, and it is safe to assume that few of them intend to vote Republican this year. That leaves the 40 percent of voters who consider themselves moderates. Those who voted for John Kerry are almost certainly going to vote Democratic again. (Do you know anybody who voted for Kerry in 2004 and wishes he hadn't?)

The people whose votes are in play this time are '04 Bush voters who are now disaffected by the president's performance. Any message in 2006 is going to have to come from them, and it will necessarily take the form of regret: I wish I'd voted for the other guy.

President Bush's low approval ratings seem to be owed to two main factors: the progressively worsening situation in Iraq and the perception, strengthened by the nonresponse to Hurricane Katrina, that the president is either incompetent himself or appoints incompetent people to important jobs. (The Foley sex scandal has been much in the news, but its impact may fade by Election Day.) It is notable, however, that neither of these serious problems — Iraq and the competence of the executive branch — can be readily affected through a midterm election. Even if the Democrats win big, they will not be able to effect substantial changes in either Bush's war policy or his ability to govern better.

When it comes to making foreign policy, Congress has few if any prerogatives. It may have the power of the purse, but no Congress, and especially not a Democratic one, can afford to deny a president's requests for military spending to support troops on the ground. Our armed forces in Iraq will almost certainly remain there through the next two years — and they have to be financed until they come home. In a less partisan time, the Senate Foreign Relations Committee could function as an active player in the day-to-day shaping of foreign policy. Yet a glance at how the Bush administration has sidelined the moderate Republican leadership of that committee — Senators Richard Lugar and Chuck Hagel — suggests that a Democratically controlled committee would be even further out in the cold.

If the Democrats have little prospect of influencing Iraq policy, it is also because they have chosen not to adopt any policy of their own, except for occasionally calling for a nominal withdrawal deadline. This careful positioning reflects both the recognition that there's little they can do to change the president's mind and the political judgment that, for the most part, the public has not demanded more from them. Democrats do not want to be the first to declare that the war in Iraq has been lost. Although Americans overwhelmingly believe we are not doing well in Iraq, the Democrats cannot take the risk that the public will blame the messenger, equating those who acknowledge defeat with those who are responsible for defeat.

Nor can a Democratic Congress do much to make the Bush administration more competent. The Senate can block the most egregious nominees, helping to ensure that we will have no more appointments like the hapless Michael Brown, the man at the heart of the FEMA disaster. It can also keep at least some ideologues and nonentities off the federal courts — including the Supreme Court, should another spot open. But many of the most incompetent political hacks in any administration are below the radar of confirmation processes, and besides, someone has to fill the jobs that empty out late in an administration when the first-round draft picks head back to the private sector. If the Democrats do take the House, the Senate or both, many Republican Congressional aides will want to leave their now-minority staff positions for the prestige and power of the executive branch — and even if they can, Hill Democrats will be loath to block their former staff colleagues' nominations, knowing that some day in a Democratic administration, they too could be looking to make a similar move.

What that leaves the Democrats is oversight — an idea that right now gets their hearts racing but whose limits will eventually become apparent. With Democrats at the helm, Congress can certainly act in particular realms. It can try to limit secret wiretaps, assuming it can find them, and it can call cabinet secretaries and generals on the carpet to explain just why we are doing so badly in Iraq. There are old scandals to reopen, and no doubt plenty of new ones just waiting to be uncovered. What Congressional Democrats cannot do, however, is change the basic direction of the country. The president has not presided as a flexible man, and many of the problems Congress will confront are at present intractable. Government in the sunshine is a good thing — but a brightly lit Washington will still, mostly, be George W. Bush's Washington.

Dept. Of Advice (WP)

The clock is running out for Republicans hoping to keep control of Congress. Coaches and jocks step up to the plate with advice on what to do when it's fourth and long in the bottom of the ninth -- with the other team set to retake your House.

I would tell the GOP it's never over till it's over. Now, if you're down two touchdowns with 30 seconds left, yeah, it's over. But as far as the election goes, it's not even halftime. You've got to believe that people will come to their senses and rally around the team. Remember, the other team has never been in many winning situations. They don't know how to win. You're looking for them to be the Arizona Cardinals [who lost a two-touchdown lead in the final minutes] of last Monday night. They don't know what they're doing when the game is in the fourth quarter. You do.

Pundits, predictions and polls -- they don't mean anything. The only thing that matters is the final score. Think about how hard you've worked to get to this point. All those hours traveling to rallies, putting up signs, blogging, debating and ruining relationships with friends and family, kissing babies and shaking hands. There's a reason you play the game, guys. It's because you love your country. You have to trust the process. And when Election Day is over, no matter what happens, you need to be able to look each other in the eye and know that you left everything you have on the trail.

I remember one time when I was coaching football at Georgia Tech. We were behind 28-0 at halftime, and I had promised ABC I'd talk to them. The only thing you can talk about in a situation like that is that you've got to do everything you can to make the other team earn every yard -- or every vote. You can't give in to the score. The score is what you have at the end of the game, but after all is said and done, what you have to know is you made them fight and earn every yard. I'd approach the election the same way. We went out and had a magnificent second half, scored 27 points. We didn't win, but we made the other team realize they were in a fight. That's what politicians have to do, too. They can't listen to people booing them, they can't listen to the skeptics.

-- Pepper Rodgers , former football coach
for Kansas, UCLA and Georgia Tech

In football, the focus should never be on the play that just happened but on the one about to take place. The past is gone and the future is all that matters. Same thing in campaigns. In these final weeks, voters are tuning in with a fine ear and candidates have the best opportunity to passionately articulate a plan for the future. So focus, show intensity and vividly describe how a voter's family, friends, loved ones and neighbors will be better off when your vision for America is implemented.

-- Steve Largent , former Republican congressman from Oklahoma and NFL Hall of Famer

As I would say to my players, it's not over till it's over! Never, ever give up! Fight with all your might. Pull every trick play you have out of your playbook and show them you're still the champions. Think about what it will be like if you should lose. That should be enough to ignite a fire in the weakest of the bunch. Remind the world what happened in Vietnam while Lyndon Johnson, a Democrat, was in office. Champions never quit. They fight to the bitter end through blood, sweat and tears! Life is tough. Life is football without a helmet.

Summerville (S.C.) High School, the winningest football coach in history

My advice to the Republicans is: Let it go. Let it go and wait for tomorrow. Sometimes you're down by 20 with three minutes left, you don't play hard anymore. You just finish up and wait for tomorrow. Tell them to concentrate on 2008, but not too hard.

Did I tell you I'm a Democrat?

-- Dikembe Mutombo , former Georgetown Hoya center, now with the NBA's Houston Rockets

Never give up. You've got to impress upon your opponent that one thing, that you haven't given up. And you have to regain the momentum in any way you can. If you have 5 or 10 minutes left in the fourth quarter and you're behind, you've gotta gain the momentum, make the other team make a mistake and capitalize on it. Right now, maybe the Democrats have the mental edge. So the Republicans have to recapture it. If you're at fourth and long, that's your last play, that sucks. But if you're in the fourth quarter and you still have 5 or 10 minutes to go, you have time to regain the momentum.

-- Ray Schoenke , former Redskins offensive lineman and candidate for the Democratic nomination in the 1998 Maryland gubernatorial race

I would tell Republicans that it's time to pull out a trick play or two to catch their opponent off guard and regain momentum. Time for a double-reverse pass or an onside kick, anything you can do to startle your opponent and put him on the defensive. And they have to stay positive. In a game two weeks ago, we were down 28-7 with one minute to go in the third quarter, but we stayed positive, even though we were getting our brains beat out. And we went on to win, 35-28. You never know how the outcome can change.

-- Dave Mencarini , head football coach,
Quince Orchard High School, Gaithersburg

When you fall behind, you can't start thinking that it's a lost cause; you must truly believe that you can win. I know as a coach that my players tend to believe what I believe of them. You have to have your party pulling for you, and that stems from the leaders believing that you can still accomplish your goals. Once people have lost hope, they won't campaign as hard as they should. You've gotta have that work ethic. You keep playing to the end. People can be persuaded up until the last minute.

-- Dan Harwood , boys' basketball coach, Magruder High School, Rockville

When you're facing down the clock and you're behind, you call a timeout and you talk to your team and you say things like, "You know what got you here. Are you going to let these guys take it away from you?" Basically, you tell them, "Hey, don't panic. You're in a race." You've got to be strategic, you've gotta start putting all your pluses on one side and minuses on the other, your opponent's pluses on one side, his minuses on the other. It's about finding the weakness and hitting them.

-- Red Auerbach, Basketball Hall of Fame coach, former president and coach of the Boston Celtics

In sports you basically beg your team to just be as aggressive as possible. Because if you are behind, what do you have to lose? I always say, leave it all on the floor. Bring any trick that you have. You might as well see if it works. It's amazing what can happen in sports when the team that's winning thinks it's going to win for sure and begins to relax. A lot of crazy things happen when the momentum changes. The bottom line is you play until the final buzzer, and in an election you're going to campaign until the votes are in. No other way to play a sport or live your life -- you go until you can't go anymore.

-- Mike Jones, head basketball coach at DeMatha Catholic High School in Hyattsville

When you're behind, the main thing you focus on is never giving up. Even when things look kind of grim, if you keep battling and working hard you never know what can happen. Have a lot of confidence in yourself and believe in what you're doing. When you're in a tough game or tough race, you see not only the quality player you have but the quality person you have. When it gets close to winning -- don't do something or not do something that you're going to regret later. Leave everything on the field. When you go to bed after the last game or the election, you'll be able to say "I did everything I could."

-- Randy S. Morris, manager of the 2006 Little League
World Series Champions, Northern Little League, Columbus, Ga.

People pride themselves on getting under your skin. Don't let them. Don't take no for an answer, that's what I would tell the Republican Party. It's the fourth quarter and you need to knock down a jump shot or get a rebound in traffic. Stay positive, no matter what. Eliminate the negativity. I knew I wasn't holding up my end of the bargain for a while last year and all of the negativity was just seeping in. You have to develop thick skin and stay positive. Eventually the outcome you want will work out.

Trust me.

Right now, if I knew I had no shot, I would shut down all advertising, grab what's left of the campaign money and get the hell out of town. I mean, if it's evident you're going nowhere. . . . Now, what have you got to do from a realistic standpoint? Refuse to believe what everybody else is saying. You've got to count on somebody on the other side screwing up before the election. You've got to pretend you're the emperor with no clothes or pretend you're Alfred E. Neuman. One or the other.

Does that make sense?

Democrats Strengthen Chances For Senate (WP)

By Charles Babington And Dan Balz
The Washington Post, October 22, 2006
Va., Mo. and Tenn. May Tip the Balance

DOJ_NMG_0084720

Democrats in the past two weeks have significantly improved their chances of taking control of the Senate, according to polls and independent analysts, with the battle now focused intensely on three states in the Midwest and upper South: Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia.

Democratic challengers are in strong positions against GOP incumbents in four states -- Pennsylvania, Montana, Ohio and Rhode Island -- a trend that leaves the party looking for just two more seats to reclaim the majority. The main targets are states where Republicans in recent years have dominated but this year find themselves in hotly competitive races.

Except for a brief period in 2001 and 2002, Republicans have held power in the Senate continuously since the 1994 elections and now hold 55 of 100 seats. Only last year, Senate Democratic Leader Harry M. Reid (Nev.) said it would take "a miracle" for his party to win control. But the same issues that are leading many pollsters and strategists to predict a Democratic takeover of the House -- including the unpopularity of President Bush and the Iraq war -- have made a turnover in the Senate more plausible.

Democrats are gleeful about the prospect of reversing years-long political trends against them in such places as Montana and Ohio, as well as Southern states such as Tennessee and Virginia. But recent history highlights how difficult it is for Democrats to compete in places where Republicans usually win at the presidential and congressional levels. Two years ago, as Bush was winning reelection, Democrats lost Senate seats in North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Louisiana and South Dakota.

Analysts say, however, that this year's political environment is much more toxic for the GOP.

"The Democrats are going to gain somewhere between four and seven seats," said Stuart Rothenberg, author of an independent newsletter that tracks campaigns nationwide. Of the battlegrounds of Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, he said, "They need two of the three, and they have a pretty good chance" of winning them.

In four other states, Republican incumbents -- Conrad Burns (Mont.), Lincoln D. Chafee (R.I.), Mike DeWine (Ohio) and Rick Santorum (Pa.) -- are all running behind in the latest public polls. Assuming that Democrats hold New Jersey, where Sen. Robert Menendez (D) hopes the state's traditional Democratic tilt will carry him past hard-charging Tom Kean Jr. (R), they would need to grab two more Republican-held seats to gain a 51 to 49 edge. (An evenly split Senate would remain under GOP control because Vice President Cheney would break the tie).

In Virginia, Sen. George Allen (R) was cruising toward reelection until he referred to a Democratic worker of Indian descent as "macaca" at a campaign event, clumsily handled revelations of his Jewish heritage and seemingly lost his once-easy touch with Old Dominion voters. Democratic nominee James Webb is not a natural campaigner, Capitol Hill Democratic operatives acknowledge, but he has surged within striking distance of Allen in polls.

With two weeks to go, supporters hope Allen makes no more gaffes and can coax state voters to return to their habit of backing Republicans in federal elections.

"I think Allen has moved into a small but statistically valid lead," said Rep. Thomas M. Davis III (R-Va.), a close student of campaigns. "Allen needs to get his [conservative] base voters out, and he needs to not take another hit." A Virginia ballot initiative to ban same-sex marriage may bring social conservatives to the polls, Davis said, but it will do little for moderate Republicans who also are crucial to Allen's success.

In the race for an open seat in Tennessee, Republicans believe Bob Corker, the former mayor of Chattanooga, has turned his campaign around after replacing his campaign manager and is now more focused and aggressive. Democrats concede that Corker has cut into the lead of Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. (D) but are counting on Ford's campaign skills to carry him through the final weeks.

Eight-term Rep. Jim Cooper (D-Tenn.), who lost a 1994 Senate bid and whose father was a Tennessee governor, said he has never seen anything to match the enthusiasm surrounding Ford, an African American from Memphis. A sold-out Oct. 19 prayer breakfast in Nashville that featured Ford "was the most exciting and successful political event I've ever been to in Tennessee," Cooper said.

Strategists see Missouri as perhaps the purest test of whether Republicans can overcome a strong Democratic headwind this year because there are few state-related factors or scandals affecting the contest. Neither Sen. James M. Talent (R) nor the challenger, state auditor Claire McCaskill (D), has been able to gain a clear advantage, and strategists on both sides anticipate a photo finish.

If Talent loses, "it will be because of the environment," one senior GOP strategist said. "If Corker loses [in Tennessee], you can point to some big strategic mistakes."

Until recently, almost no one on Capitol Hill was talking seriously of a possible Democratic Senate takeover, for several reasons. Open seats generally are easier for the opposition party to win, but this year, just one Republican incumbent, Majority Leader Bill Frist (Tenn.), is retiring. Geography is even more challenging. Democrats must win several races in Red America, where through most of Bush's presidency, Republicans have deepened their hold on elective offices, most notably in the South.

DOJ_NMG_0084721

This year, only two of the seven most vulnerable Republican Senate seats are in states carried by Sen. John F. Kerry in 2004: Rhode Island and Pennsylvania. The others -- Ohio, Montana, Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia -- were Bush states in 2000 and 2004.

"I don't think it was ever a map for taking back the majority," said one Democratic strategist, who declined to be identified in order to provide candid information about the campaigns. "But the very fact of it is, we get closer to winning the majority every single week."

Republicans depend in particular on the South for their Senate majority. They now hold 18 of the 22 Senate seats in the former Confederate states, a 14-seat advantage in that region alone. Republicans remain entrenched in the Deep South, but their advantages in upper South states are less strong, says Merle Black, a political science professor at Emory University and the co-author with his brother Earl Black of a series of books about Southern politics.

"What we see across the Deep South is a lot of Republican strength," he said. "Those upper South states are where Democrats can campaign effectively against Republicans. I wouldn't make them favorites, but if trends break in their favor, they could win both of those seats."

Santorum, seeking a third term, and Burns, trying for a fourth, have been in trouble for months. Chafee, who is such a maverick Republican that he did not support Bush for reelection in 2004, survived a difficult primary, but only with late help from the Republican National Committee and the National Republican Senatorial Committee. He now trails former state attorney general Sheldon Whitehouse (D) in a state that is overwhelmingly Democratic and strongly anti-Bush. His biggest hope lies in the unusually large number of undecided voters in a state where the Chafee name is well-regarded, said Jennifer Duffy, who tracks Senate races for the nonpartisan Cook Political Report.

DeWine always expected a tough reelection race because of the sour national mood and scandals in Ohio that have left Gov. Bob Taft (R) with an approval rating barely in double digits and Rep. Robert W. Ney (R) on his way to prison for his involvement in the scandal involving lobbyist Jack Abramoff. Ohio voters appear ready to take out their anger on the party that has controlled state politics since the early 1990s.

But DeWine's race has turned from a toss-up to one favoring his rival, Rep. Sherrod Brown, in a matter of weeks. Recent polls show Brown leading by seven to 14 percentage points. Republicans blame the Mark Foley scandal.

"The Foley thing had a more corrosive effect there than in other places," said one pessimistic GOP strategist. "Voters were softened to scandal."

Democrats: More Seats Coming Into Play (AP)

By David Espo

AP, October 22, 2006

Democrats hold solid leads for four of the six Republican seats they need to capture the Senate and about 10 of 15 required to win the House, according to officials in both parties. Numerous additional races remain highly competitive.

After two weeks of adverse publicity linked to the Mark Foley scandal, public and private polling suggested partial recovery for some endangered Republican incumbents, and senior party officials made a concerted effort to project confidence.

"By many measures, there are strong indications of a right-of-center base that is engaged and committed," party chairman Ken Mehlman said Friday in a memo written for public consumption.

The assertion was a response to independent polls that show disapproval of President Bush's policies, including on the Iraq war, and discontent with Congress have made Democrats more eager to vote on Nov. 7 than Republicans.

At the same time, Democrats said unexpected opportunities for gains keep coming their way — including House races in Minnesota, Idaho and Nevada — and they have the money needed to battle Republicans to the end.

"We have enough to play defense in the blue states and offense in the red states," said Sen. Chuck Schumer of New York, who heads the Democratic senatorial committee.

After months of stockpiling their millions, candidates and the parties are spending freely in the final days before Election Day.

The National Republican Congressional Committee has spent more than $3 million to hold the seat of Ohio Rep. Bob Ney. Ney, who recently pleaded guilty to corruption charges, has yet to resign, but is not seeking a new term.

The GOP has invested more than $8 million into the Philadelphia suburbs and a northeast Pennsylvania district, where Republican Reps. Michael Fitzpatrick, Curt Weldon, Jim Gerlach and Don Sherwood face strong challenges. Democrats have put in nearly $7 million.

In Connecticut, GOP Reps. Chris Shays, Nancy Johnson and Rob Simmons face difficult challenges, although Republicans hope that Sen. Joseph Lieberman's independent candidacy will help them.

By contrast, Republicans have few opportunities to take away House or Senate seats belonging to Democrats. Georgia, where the GOP is aiming at two House seats, is one such case.

In the battle for the Senate, public and private polling shows Democratic challengers leading incumbents in Pennsylvania, Montana and Rhode Island as well as in Ohio, where the entire GOP ticket is struggling.

Officials who discussed the private surveys did so on condition of anonymity, saying they were not authorized to speak publicly.

Eager to offset likely losses, the National Republican Senatorial Committee has aired television commercials in New Jersey, hoping that Tom Kean Jr. can defeat Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats countered quickly, with four times as much money.

Republicans apparently have not abandoned all hope in Michigan, either. President Bush is scheduled to campaign for challenger Mike Bouchard on Thursday. A party-financed television advertising campaign is possible, as well, aimed at toppling Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow.

Increasingly, though, officials in both parties said the battle for Senate control probably will come down to close races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia. All three are Republican-held seats where Democratic challengers have exceeded precampaign expectations.

Under most scenarios, Democrats would have to win two of the three to gain a majority.

In Tennessee, Republicans concede that Rep. Harold Ford has proved to be the most adept of the Democratic challengers this year. Democrats say Republican Bob Corker's campaign has been sharper and more effective since a staff shake-up this month.

Democrats in Missouri hope challenger Claire McCaskill will benefit from support for statewide initiatives on stem cell research and a higher minimum wage. She is running against Sen. Jim Talent.

The closeness of the Virginia race, where Jim Webb is taking on Sen. George Allen, is the biggest surprise of the campaign season. Like other Republicans, Allen has begun edging away from Bush's war policy. "The situation there is one that needs adjustments, that needs changes in tactics," he said Friday.

Many Republicans turned pessimistic about their party's chances of holding the House when the Foley scandal broke. The Florida congressman abruptly resigned on Sept. 29 after he was confronted with sexually explicit Internet messages he had written teenage male pages.

The House ethics committee is investigating, and Republicans are working to shift the campaign spotlight elsewhere.

"National security, border security, and the economy: these are the issues that matter most to the American people as we confront challenges domestically and abroad," House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio, advised fellow Republicans.

Despite Mehlman's efforts at reassurance, some candidates remain concerned. "The Republicans are a bit disillusioned," said Rep. Chris Chocola, struggling in his bid for a third term in Indiana.

The House Republicans in greatest danger of defeat include Reps. Charles Taylor of North Carolina and John Hostettler of Indiana, and Sherwood and Weldon of Pennsylvania, according to private polls. Of those incumbents, only Hostettler is not campaigning against a backdrop of scandal, either personal or political.

In addition, Democrats lead for open seats currently in Republican hands in Arizona, Colorado, Florida, Ohio and Texas.

The situation in Foley's former district is unpredictable. Foley's name is staying on the ballot and votes for him will be counted for replacement candidate Joe Negron.

Two members of the Republican leadership, Reps. Deborah Pryce of Ohio and Tom Reynolds of New York, have fought back from earlier deficits and made their races competitive, according to strategists.

Many other races remain competitive, judging from public polls and party spending.

Republicans in that category include Reps. Fitzpatrick, Gerlach and Melissa Hart in Pennsylvania; Clay Shaw in Florida; Mike Sodrel and Chocola in Indiana; Geoff Davis in Kentucky; Heather Wilson in New Mexico; Marilyn Musgrave in Colorado, Dave Reichert in Washington; Thelma Drake in Virginia; Steve Chabot in Ohio; and Gil Gutnecht in Minnesota.

Democrats also are mounting strong challenges for Republican-held open seats in Idaho, Illinois, Iowa, Minnesota and Wisconsin.

Relatively few Democratic-held seats appear in jeopardy.

Republicans have scaled back their initial target list, and continued to advertise against Reps. Jim Marshall and John Barrow in Georgia; Melissa Bean in Illinois; Leonard Boswell in Iowa; and in an open-seat race in Vermont.

Three States Could Swing Senate Control (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084723

In Tennessee and two other closely contested races, candidates court disaffected GOP voters.

In his paint-splattered sweatshirt and battered baseball cap, Chris Foust stopped by on his lunch break last week to listen to Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr., the Democratic Senate nominee, at a downtown rally.

Foust, a soft-spoken regular churchgoer who worries about illegal immigration and opposes gay marriage, usually votes Republican and backed President Bush in 2004. But he's grown disillusioned with Bush, especially over the Iraq war. And after Ford finished his energetic speech at the noon rally, Foust decided to support him in next month's election.

"He seems like he's an honest guy," said Foust, who works for a commercial painting company. "He seems like he has a genuine concern for people."

Disenchanted, usually Republican-leaning voters like Foust may decide not only the tight Tennessee contest between Ford and Republican Bob Corker, but the battle for control of the Senate as well.

Two weeks before election day, odds are increasing that the Senate could turn on the results of close contests in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, three states along the border between the solidly Republican Deep South and Democratic terrain in the Northeast and industrial Midwest.

Each of these states presents a distinct political puzzle. But Democrats face the common challenge of attracting right-of-center voters like Foust who helped Bush carry all three states two years ago but have soured on the nation's direction since.

"No one is going to say these aren't tough states," said Democratic pollster Peter Brodnitz, who is advising Ford in Tennessee and Democratic Senate nominee Jim Webb in Virginia. "But voters are very hungry for change."

Still, finding enough disenchanted voters remains difficult for Democrats in the three states, largely because of enduring Republican strength in socially conservative small-town and rural communities. If Democrats fall short in their bid to recapture the Senate, these three states may be their Heartbreak Hill.

Trends across the Senate battlefield are moving the three states into their potentially pivotal role. Recent polls show Democrats consistently leading incumbent Republican senators in Pennsylvania, Ohio and Montana, and maintaining a more marginal edge in Rhode Island. In New Jersey, where Republicans have their best opportunity to capture a Democratic-held seat, most recent surveys show Sen. Robert Menendez reestablishing a narrow lead over his Republican challenger.

But even if all those states break for the Democrats, the party still would capture the Senate only if it won two of the three Republican seats in Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia. In a measure of the Democratic challenge, Republicans now hold all six of the three states' Senate seats.

This year, in Virginia, public polls generally show Republican Sen. George Allen narrowly leading Webb, who was Navy secretary under President Reagan; in Missouri, Republican Sen. Jim Talent and Democratic state Auditor Claire McCaskill trading the lead; and here, Ford, who represents a district in Memphis, edging Corker, the mayor of Chattanooga, for the seat of retiring Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist.

Of the three contests, Tennessee may combine the most fascinating ingredients. Ford is running against not only the recent history of Republican ascendancy across the South but the weight of history with a capital H: He is seeking to become the first African American senator from the South since Reconstruction.

Ford, who has served since age 26 in the House seat once held by his father, Harold E. Ford Sr., is also challenging liberal orthodoxy on more issues than probably any other major Democratic contender this year.

He embraces several familiar Democratic priorities, including raising the minimum wage and allowing Medicare to negotiate directly with pharmaceutical companies for lower drug prices. But he supports constitutional amendments to ban same-sex marriage and flag burning and to require a balanced budget, and says he would have voted against the bipartisan Senate immigration bill because he opposes any form of legalization for illegal immigrants.

And though he is bitingly critical of Bush's management of the Iraq war, Ford opposes any effort to legislate a timetable for withdrawing American troops. Instead, he urges the U.S. to push Iraqi leaders to divide the country into semi-autonomous Shiite, Sunni and Kurd regions.

More striking is Ford's unabashed emphasis on his religious faith. In his speeches, he quotes Scripture as frequently as other candidates quote government reports.

Last week he delivered remarks that sounded more like a sermon than a political speech before 700 people who overflowed a downtown Knoxville hotel ballroom for an interdenominational prayer breakfast, one in a series of such events he's hosting. He has even filmed a television ad in which he testifies to his religious conviction from inside a church.

Just 36 and imperially slim, Ford is a charismatic presence who attracts large, integrated crowds that cluster around him for photographs after his speeches.

He maintains punishing hours on the campaign trail, but it is still tempting to view Corker as the tortoise to Ford's hare.

Corker, slight and 54, doesn't turn heads when he enters a room or attract such large audiences. But he projects an approachable competence and sincerity. "He seems a little more like a hometown kind of guy," said Aubrey Powers, a social worker, after attending a Corker appearance in Maryville, Tenn.

After shaking up his campaign staff this month, Corker is intensifying his effort to present himself as a bipartisan problem-solver.

But Corker also needs to consolidate the Republican base after defeating two more-conservative opponents in a bitter GOP primary this summer, and must stamp Ford as too liberal for the state.

The social issues that typically help Republicans in that effort have not cut as sharply for Corker. Though he now supports a ban on abortion, he did not earlier in his career; whereas the National Right to Life Committee has endorsed him, the Tennessee affiliate has not.

And though the National Rifle Assn., a potent political force here, has endorsed Corker and plans to tout him to its members, the group will not criticize Ford, who received a B grade from the organization, said Andrew Arulanandam, the NRA's public affairs director. That could amount to a major bullet-dodge for Ford.

In his ads and stump speeches, Corker stresses his Tennessee roots and his business experience. Meanwhile, his campaign and the National Republican Senatorial Committee have barraged Ford with personal attacks, portraying him as a slick career politician, condemning the "Ford Political Machine" and spotlighting his connections to Washington, where he spent most of his youth while his father served in Congress.

The attacks have reached a point where even Corker, in a rare move, on Friday publicly urged the Republican National Committee to withdraw a new ad that features a blond white woman — presumably an actress — cooing into the camera that she met Ford at a party sponsored by Playboy magazine.

Race is the great wild card in the contest. In Washington, many analysts believe Ford will draw fewer votes than polls suggest because of voters' unspoken reluctance to back an African American. In Tennessee, that assumption isn't as widely shared.

"I don't think his race is going to be a factor," Frank Griffith, a lifelong Republican, said after a Corker rally in the small southeast Tennessee town of Madisonville. "I've lived here my whole life and I see the same people supporting the Democratic candidate with bumper stickers just like any other candidate."

Griffith, a retired teacher, said Ford's greatest problem would be convincing conservatives in his rural community that he was not too liberal.

The same might be said for Jim Webb in Virginia and Claire McCaskill in Missouri. In the end, the challenges facing Ford revolve less around the issues unique to him because of his race than those he shares with the Democratic nominees in each of the three states that could determine which party controls the Senate next year.

Guardedly, Democrats Are Daring To Believe (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Robin Toner

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — There is something unusual bubbling in Democratic political waters these days: optimism.

With each new delivery of bad news for Republicans — another Republican congressman under investigation, another Republican district conceded, another poll showing support for the Republican-controlled Congress collapsing — a party that has become so used to losing is considering, disbelievingly and with the requisite worry, the possibility that it could actually win in November.

“I’ve moved from optimistic to giddy,” said Gordon R. Fischer, a former chairman of the Iowa Democratic Party. “I really have.”

Representative Barney Frank, Democrat of Massachusetts, who is in line to become chairman of the Financial Services Committee in a Democratic House, offered wry evidence of the changing perception of the race. His office, Mr. Frank said, has been contacted by a portrait-painting firm offering to talk about possibilities for the traditional committee chairman’s painting, one of those perks of power long absent from the lives of House Democrats.

“I’ve acquired a lot of new friends this year,” Mr. Frank said. “And I haven’t gotten any nicer.”

For Democrats these days, life is one measure glee, one measure dread and one measure hubris. If they are as confident as they have been in a decade about regaining at least one house of Congress — and they are — it is a confidence tempered by the searing memories of being outmaneuvered, for three elections straight, by superior Republican organizing and financial strength, and by continued wariness about the political skills of President Bush’s senior adviser, Karl Rove.

Mr. Rove has made it clear that he considers Democratic optimism unjustified, predicting that his party's cash advantage and get-out-the-vote expertise will dash Democratic dreams yet again. And Democrats say they welcome every passing dawn with relief, fearful that the next one will bring a development that could fundamentally alter the nature of the race, like the re-emergence of Osama bin Laden on election eve, which is what happened in 2004.

"I know a lot of people are in somersault land," Representative Rahm Emanuel, Democrat of Illinois and chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said reproachfully of fellow Democrats. "I just don't have the liberty and freedom to do that."

Still, Democratic ebullience could be found in all corners of Washington over the past few days. It was palpable at social and work gatherings, where Democrats traded gossip about how big a Democratic majority in the House could be; in Capitol Hill conference rooms, where Democrats were preparing transition plans (under orders to keep them quiet); and in offices of Democratic strategists and pollsters, who were drawing up growing lists of Republicans who might be vulnerable.

"I feel better than I ever have," said Representative Louise M. Slaughter, a Democrat from upstate New York. "I think we have the best chance to take over simply because of the pileup of disasters."

Stanley B. Greenberg, who was the White House pollster for President Bill Clinton in 1994 when Republicans shocked Democrats by capturing the House, commissioned a poll recently and e-mailed it around town with a single-word headline: "Meltdown." In an interview, Mr. Greenberg said, "I don't see how we can lose the House; I don't think it's even close."

Ellen R. Malcolm, president of Emily's List, a Democratic women's network, and a longtime Democratic fund-raiser, said Democratic trepidations were beginning to melt away with each passing news cycle. "People are getting more encouraged by the day," Ms. Malcolm said. "Every poll that comes in seems to be better than the one before."

Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California, who is in line to become speaker if her party wins the House, has put out the word that no one should be talking with too much certainty or detail about the days after Nov. 7. But even Ms. Pelosi has slipped on occasion. In a recent interview with The Associated Press, when asked which suite of offices she would use as speaker, she said with a laugh, "I'll have any suite I want."

The change in mood, and evidence of Democratic strength in the polls and in fund-raising, is feeding some crucial deliberations by Democratic leaders as the discussion in some quarters goes from whether Democrats can win to how large a margin the party can gain.

Democratic candidates in districts that had been considered long shots are now pleading with Mr. Emanuel's committee to send money their way. And some leading Democrats, among them Mr. Greenberg, are urging Mr. Emanuel to seize the moment by expanding the field in which Democrats are competing, saying the party has a chance to cement a big lead in the House in November.

This argument has worried some Democratic strategists, who warn that overconfidence could press party leaders into making decisions that may siphon resources from closely fought races and risk the Democrats' advantage. "On the House side, it makes sense to be focusing on 25 seats to win 14, not 50," said Steve Rosenthal, a political and labor consultant with close ties to the party, who described many Democrats as "overenthused."

"If we had unlimited resources it would be different," Mr. Rosenthal said. "But we have to be careful."

Mr. Emanuel said he was polling to see where the party might move next. But he said that barring some last-minute infusion of money, he was considering a relatively limited increase in the number of seats where Democrats would spend. In the past week, Democrats have expanded their field to just over 40 races from about 35, running advertisements against Republicans they consider newly vulnerable in Florida, Minnesota, Nevada, upstate New York and Washington State.

Some Democrats have expressed apprehension that this exuberance may be irrational, or at least premature, and are counseling restraint. Part of that is tactical: Democrats are trying not to help the Republican Party as it works to turn out its conservative base by presenting apocalyptic visions of a Congress led by liberals like Mr. Frank, Ms. Pelosi and Representative Charles B. Rangel of New York.

Part of the Democrats' queasiness stems from painful familiarity with Mr. Rove's record of success, and from their own recognition that they hold only slim leads in many races and could yet fall victim to an assertive and sophisticated Republican turnout operation.

"I'm a little concerned that we are spending all our time talking about what our agenda will be in January rather than how we are going to get our votes out in early November," said Chris Redfern, chairman of the Ohio Democratic Party.

Some of that concern is about the long-term psychic damage the party's rank-and-file may suffer if Democrats collapse at the finish line again. "We've all had these disappointments that contain our enthusiasm as we look to the last few weeks of this race," said Tom Daschle, the Senate Democratic leader defeated in 2004.

Steve Elmendorf, a Democratic strategist who advised the presidential campaign of Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, said: “We all sat around in 2004 and looked at exit polls that said John Kerry was going to be president. And that was wrong. We’ve been up this hill before.”

To win the House, Democrats must capture 15 seats. Of the 40 or so they see in play, at most 5 are held by Democrats, strategists for both sides say.

The prospects for a Democratic takeover in the Senate, where the party needs six seats, are tougher. Republicans say four of their incumbents are in serious danger of losing — in Montana, Ohio, Pennsylvania and Rhode Island — and are trying to build a firewall by pouring most of their resources into Senate races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia, where polls show the contests even.

Senator Charles E. Schumer of New York, chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee, said his committee, which has consistently out-raised its Republican counterpart this year, had more than enough money to compete with the Republicans in those states. Mr. Schumer said he was holding back some resources in case Republicans made an unexpected move in the final days of the campaign.

“They keep trying to pull rabbits out of the hat, but none of them come out,” he said. “But we are holding some money in abeyance for some kind of October surprise.”

While there may be a price to overconfidence, in a sense of complacency at some campaign headquarters, there are advantages at the grass-roots level, where it can fuel the excitement that Democrats hope will result in significant gains on Nov. 7. Republicans face the flip side of this problem, with the prospect that their voters, discouraged by the party’s travails, will stay home.

All this has put Democrats in an unfamiliar place, but one they seem to be enjoying. “I’m a congenital pessimist,” said Howard Wolfson, a consultant advising Democrats in several competitive contests in upstate New York. “But I’m as bullish on our chances as I have been at any time over the last 12 years.”

Fighting For The Spoils (WP)

By Steve Hendrix

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Lawmaker and Rainmaker Rahm Emanuel Wants a Nov. 7 Victory For the Democrats So Bad He Can Almost Taste It. If Only He Had Time to Eat.

CHICAGO

This must be how Machiavelli ate his corned beef sandwiches.

Sitting in a South Side deli, Rahm Emanuel doesn't so much eat his lunch as overwhelm it with two hands and a hard stare. It's a combat glower familiar to the political opponents, reluctant donors and more than a few allies who have encountered the White House fixer-turned-Democratic-congressman in his still-young career. By most accounts, they usually didn't fare much better than the sandwich.

"There's no clean way to do this," Emanuel says, not quite clearly, through a garble of onion roll.

They heap the plates high at Manny's, an old-guard cafeteria popular with cops and pols. But within minutes, the football-size loaf of sliced meat and mustard is gone. Emanuel wipes his hands and picks up the BlackBerry that has been buzzing every 40 seconds or so on the Formica tabletop.

"God, I always eat it too fast," he mutters as he checks an e-mail. What follows is either a soft belch or a pfitz of surprise at some new poll results from Ohio.

Charging toward the biggest election day of his career, Emanuel, the 47-year-old chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, doesn't have much time for niceties.

Or, sometimes, even food. He's lost 14 pounds as the whirl of wheedling donors and lashing candidates to meet their fundraising targets has reached hurricane status in recent weeks. (It had been at least a year since he'd indulged his taste for Manny's corned beef.) He's always been slight, but his collar now gaps a bit at the neck; his cheeks, always lean, are now almost skeletal under the graying runner's buzz cut and the basset-hound eyes. He rubs his jaw (and you notice that he's missing a finger; he lost one to a boyhood infection). He admits he's not sleeping well.

"He's driving himself to exhaustion," says Paul Begala, a friend and political compatriot since they both served on Bill Clinton's first presidential campaign and afterward in the White House. "He's like Lyndon Johnson, who finished almost every campaign in a hospital bed. As someone from Texas, I don't make that comparison lightly, but Rahm just may be our skinny, nine-fingered, Jewish, Chicago version of LBJ."

Whether that's a fair comparison may be clear soon. If, as historians say, Johnson began his conquest of Capitol Hill with the political chits he collected as a young and triumphant chairman of the Senate campaign committee, what does next month promise for Rahm Emanuel? As the member of Congress responsible for recruiting candidates for House races, raising money and vetting strategy for dozens of districts, he's received raves from campaign connoisseurs in Washington for running a taut committee. Notably, he's nearly closed the perennial cash-on-hand gap between his team -- with $36 million in the bank at the end of September -- and its GOP counterpart. He's fielded credible candidates in districts no one had expected to be in play a year ago. And he's generally been flogging the party like a never-satisfied CEO.

"He has been an amazing success any way you look at it," says congressional scholar Thomas Mann of the Brookings Institution. "I think it's the best operation of any chairman of either party in several years."

If Democrats do take the House -- they need to gain 15 seats to do so -- Emanuel, in only his second term in Congress, stands to claim considerable credit for ending a 12-year electoral drought. That's the kind of triumph Johnson rode to the top of the Senate.

But if they don't . . .

"If they don't win, it will be seen as a colossal failure," says Mann. "Rahm will be devastated."Expectations Are High

In fact, Emanuel may have already fumbled the game of expectations -- they are wickedly high. With President Bush's approval ratings lodged at car-salesman levels, scandals going off like cluster bombs within the Republican caucus, and a general throw-the-bums-out restiveness in the land, even a near-miss by House Democrats will be seen as the greatest electoral choke since Dewey Didn't Defeat Truman after all. Commentators from George F. Will to James Carville have already laid down rhetorical markers: An opposition party unable to capture the House in this environment should find a purpose other than electoral politics. Selling Herbalife, maybe.

And Emanuel knows that some Democrats would find time during their grief for a small smile at his expense. Such is the "Rahmbo" style that his sizzling passage through the campaign has left scorch marks on some colleagues. Among the singed: Democratic National Committee Chairman Howard Dean, with whom Emanuel has tangled over spending priorities; several liberal would-be candidates who say they were steamrollered by Emanuel in favor of more centrist challengers; and some members of the Congressional Black Caucus who went to House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi this year with complaints about Emanuel's abrasive style and his increasing demands for them to raise money for the DCCC.

"Well, I never said Rahm was a diplomat who spends a lot of time schmoozing," says Pelosi, who picked Emanuel last year to run the campaign. She tapped him over more senior lawmakers, she says, because she knew he'd be "coldblooded enough" to push the party relentlessly. And to those who came to have their feathers unruffled, she says she made it clear that Emanuel has her full support. "I said to them: 'We're here to win this election. What is this conversation about?' I don't think we can be better served than by having Rahm at the DCCC."

"He's abrupt with me all the time," she adds with a laugh. "I call him the Field Marshal."A Man for Changing Times

But to some observers of Chicago politics, Emanuel is less field marshal than Marshall Field (recalling the upscale department store that catered to the city's affluent classes). Emanuel was born in Chicago in 1959, the son of a doctor, and grew up in the decidedly non-working-class northern suburb of Wilmette. He's a graduate of the tony New Trier High School and a onetime ballet prodigy who was offered a scholarship with the Joffrey. A triathlete with a degree from Sarah Lawrence College, a master's in communications from Northwestern and a love of taking his children to modern dance concerts, Emanuel doesn't easily fit the stogie-gnawing stereotype of the old Chicago pol.

Nor did he serve the usual ward apprenticeships in the vaunted Democratic machine. Rather, after working as a fundraiser in various campaigns, Emanuel came fully of age politically with Clinton in Washington. He had never sought elected office before running for the House of Representatives in 2002. In particular, Emanuel knew he would be an odd successor for the working-class Polish and Catholic precincts of District 5, which stretches from the lakefront to the Cook County line. "The previous congressmen from my district were named Rostenkowski, Annunzio and Blagojevich," he says. "Then along comes Rahm Israel Emanuel? C'mon, how does that fit?"

But this is a changing Chicago. In front of Manny's, a police Segway is chained to a street sign as the officer eats his pastrami inside. The warehouse across the street is being converted into a Best Buy. And politics, too, has gotten a makeover.

"Rahm is part of the young breed that people call the new Chicago machine," says Don Rose, a longtime liberal activist who worked for Mayors Jane Byrne and Harold Washington. "They're not 'dem' and 'dose' politicians. They know the difference between red wine and white wine. They're not driven by ideology, and they play to win."

They all play to win, those Emanuel boys. Rahm is the middle son of three. His big brother, Ezekiel, is a Harvard oncologist and bioethicist. Younger brother Ari is a high-flying agent in Los Angeles. He made news recently as the only major agent to publicly call for an industrywide shunning of Mel Gibson following the actor's drunken, anti-Semitic tirade. Their baby sister, Shoshana, is a student.

Yes, the folks are mighty proud, Rahm says. How many mothers have two children who have partly inspired TV characters (Josh Lyman on "The West Wing" for Rahm, Ari Gold on "Entourage" for Ari)?

"People ask me what my mother put in the soup," says Ari, who talks with Rahm two or three times a day. "I wish I knew. I have three boys of my own."

Their father is a Jerusalem-born pediatrician who came to the United States after working for the pre-independence Israeli underground. In Chicago, he met Emanuel's mother, an X-ray technician and daughter of a local union organizer who ended up in more than one paddy wagon as a protester in the 1960s. "Politics and the civil rights movement were very much a part of our family life," says Ezekiel. "We went on Martin Luther King's march on Cicero with my mom."

When Rahm was 17, he cut his finger on a meat slicer at Arby's, where he worked a summer job. It became infected, the infection spread to the bone, and a cut grew into a potentially life-threatening condition. Doctors eventually amputated the finger, and Emanuel spent eight weeks in the hospital. He says the experience made him more focused for college and beyond.

"He blames me for ending up at Sarah Lawrence," says Ezekiel, who thought a small Eastern college would suit his brother better than a big school. "But he loved it. He loved being around all those women."

The young Rahm wasn't particularly political. That passion emerged during college when he starting working with the advocacy group Common Cause. Later, he landed on a few campaigns, including Paul Simon's successful first Senate race in 1984. Almost immediately Emanuel proved a peerless fundraiser. Richard M. Daley hired him to dial up dollars for his successful mayoral run in 1989. Two years later, Emanuel got a job in the soon-to-be-legendary "War Room" of Clinton's upstart presidential campaign in Little Rock.

"With the exception of the candidate and his wife, Rahm may have been the only indispensable person in that campaign," says Begala, who credits Emanuel with keeping the money flowing during the Gennifer Flowers unpleasantness. "He was a force of nature."

He stayed with Clinton through most of two terms. Early on, though, his hard-charging style riled as many allies -- in both the White House and the Capitol -- as opponents. In 1993, he was fired as political director, reportedly at the urging of first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton. But he stayed on as a senior adviser to redeem himself, with both Clintons, by successfully spearheading some of their diciest legislative ambitions, including NAFTA and the assault weapons ban.

Those initiatives passed, and along the way Emanuel's wonkier self bloomed like a thousand white papers. He talks fluidly about 401(k) regulations and dependent health coverage and universal college tuition. With fellow Clinton alum Bruce Reed, he recently wrote a book, "The Plan," an election-year wish list of New Democrat policy proposals.

"He's a great strategist, but I actually think he cares more about the policy side of it," says Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, who is close to Emanuel and is campaigning with him for several DCCC candidates in the final weeks. "He likes to talk tough, but deep under that crusty exterior is someone who believes that government can make a difference in people's lives."

But Emanuel's devotion to, say, tax reform may never overtake his rep for grenade-launcher etiquette. His spat with Howard Dean, for example, went publicly profane.

"Rahm and I have certainly had our disagreements," Dean says by e-mail. "But the bottom line is we both want to win."

Even within the White House, few were safe from his instinct for showstopping vulgarity. He once marched up to the newly elected Tony Blair in the Oval Office, where he and Clinton were preparing to go out for their first joint appearance. "This is important," Emanuel said to the British prime minister. "Don't [foul] it up."

"Blair looked pretty shocked before he started laughing," says Begala, who was there. "They are a little more formal in Britain than they are in Chicago."Back in the Game

Toward the end of Clinton's second term, Emanuel and his wife, Amy Rule, a Wharton MBA, and the first of their three children moved back to Chicago with the express purpose of making some serious money. In 1999, without any previous experience, Emanuel joined the investment bank of Democratic donor Bruce Wasserstein. Within two years, thanks in part to the bank's being sold, Emanuel had made about $18 million, enough to get back into the game without worrying about his family's finances.

"Rahm was always going to go back into politics," says Ezekiel. "That was the whole point of going into investment banking, to earn a nest egg."

It was Da Mayor himself who first suggested that Emanuel run for the open North Side congressional seat in 2002.

"I told him he was crazy," Emanuel says. "But then I did a poll, and it actually looked like I had a shot."

With the Daley cogs turning on his behalf, Emanuel edged out a Polish American state legislator in the primary and went on to win the general election. It's a safe seat now -- he's not even running ads this year -- but he speaks with pride of the street-level fight he waged the first time.

"I walked a hundred precincts during that campaign," he says. "I stood in front of every grocery in my district seven times."

Emanuel keeps in regular contact with his City Hall patron. And some say he has brought LaSalle Street sensibilities to his House job, particularly those who have been on the wrong side of his DCCC machine. He hasn't hesitated to muscle aside liberal candidates in favor of ones he thought could go toe-to-toe with Republicans on security and social issues. He recruited several

Iraq war veterans and found sheriffs to run in both Washington state and Indiana. He persuaded Heath Shuler, a former Redskins quarterback and an antiabortion Democrat, to run in North Carolina. (Shuler has said Emanuel's five-calls-a-day pushiness was worse than any college recruiter's.)

In one move that Rose calls a "classic Chicago power play," Emanuel pushed Tammy Duckworth, a political newcomer who lost both legs as an Army helicopter pilot in Iraq, to run in the congressional district of retiring Illinois Republican Henry Hyde. That didn't sit well with supporters of Christine Cegelis, a technology consultant who had scored a surprise 44 percent against Hyde in 2002. Her supporters say the DCCC effectively starved the antiwar Cegelis of money and support in favor of Duckworth, who calls the war "a mistake" but calls for more aggressive training of Iraqi forces before pulling out U.S. troops.

"There was a lot of frustration on the ground, trying to figure why the national Democratic Party was trying to squash a strong local movement like this," says Kevin Spidel, a founder of Progressive Democrats of America who managed the Cegelis campaign. "It generated a lot of volunteers for us. We were outspent 4 to 1 and came close to beating Rahm Emanuel and his Washington machine."Out of the Wilderness

Asked if he ever has regrets about his hardball habits, Emanuel stares into his glass of tea for a long moment.

"Look, you're never as tough as they say you are," he says finally.

But the self-reflection lasts only as long as it takes for him to remember the tactics of the other side.

"They call Tammy Duckworth a cut-and-runner when she left two legs in Iraq?" he shouts, jabbing a finger in the air, drawing stares from around the deli. "How dare they! I'm going to give them the medicine that they've been giving out. That's what shocks them."

If Duckworth wins, along with enough of Emanuel's other candidates to deliver the House into Democratic hands, it's easy to predict that all the hard feelings within the party will be quickly swept away by the shouts of hallelujah. And Rahm Emanuel, with a month to go before his 48th birthday and less than five years of seniority on the Hill, will be basking in acclaim for helping to lead his long-suffering party from the backbencher wilderness to the Promised Land of majority.

Just what is the proper reward for an electoral Moses? Plum committee assignments? (He already has a coveted seat on the Ways and Means Committee.) A leadership post? Leapfrogging to a chairmanship?

"How about the great honor of serving as the chairman of the DCCC?" says Pelosi. "Honestly, we've never even had a conversation about that."

Emanuel refuses to muse, publicly at least, on how a good Nov. 7 could boost his career. Or whether that career is likely to be on Capitol Hill, in Springfield or up at City Hall. For now, he's consumed only with the race.

"I don't even want to talk about that," he says, tapping his BlackBerry on Manny's Formica. "Call me on November 8th. We'll talk about it then."

GOP Seeks To Get Back On Message (WT)

By Amy Fagan

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

Republican House candidates still feel some heat from the revelation that Rep. Mark Foley sent inappropriate and sometimes lurid Internet messages to teenage boys, but party leaders insist they are starting to get their message out again to voters.

"The Foley matter has become absolutely quiet in the vast majority of House races, as voters have been able to separate the actions of one member from his party," said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC). "In most races, voters say it will have no impact on their decision."

The Foley scandal and the ensuing criticism of how Republicans responded or failed to prevent it dominated campaign coverage. The unfolding story buried the party's message and damaged some incumbents' re-election chances Nov. 7, when Democrats seek to eke out control of the House or Senate.

"This is just one more in a chain of scandals that are convincing people that the Republicans' power should not be continued," Democratic pollster Mark Mellman said.

"The impact that this had sort of sucked the oxygen out of our ability to talk about the message. That's not where you want to be a month to three weeks out," one Republican operative said, referring to the press blitz after the story broke Sept. 28.

Mr. Foley, Florida Republican, resigned from Congress the following day, after sexually explicit computer messages he sent to current and former congressional pages, all teenage males, became public.

The Republican operative, who asked not to be identified, said the negative fallout faded in recent days. Last week, even as the House ethics panel continued investigating the matter, Republican leaders touted tax, energy and anti-terrorism policies.

House Majority Leader John A. Boehner, Ohio Republican, said in an Oct. 16 memo that the party is "back on offense" after it was sidetracked addressing Mr. Foley's "despicable conduct."

However, the damage may have been done.

House Republicans already were in a tough battle to retain their majority, with voters expressing frustration over the Iraq war, the Bush administration's response to Hurricane Katrina and other party members who left Congress this year under ethical clouds.

"What the Foley scandal did, wrapped up all in one, was it took the Republicans off message, hurt the leadership, dominated the news and certainly tipped the balance in favor of Democrats," independent pollster John Zogby said.

An NBC/Wall Street Journal poll last week found that 75 percent of those surveyed disapprove of the job Congress is doing, a 10 percent increase from mid-September. It also found that 47 percent are less favorable of Republican control after the events of recent weeks.

The scandal had a real effect in some races, including those of Rep. Thomas M. Reynolds of New York, who is chairman of the NRCC, and Rep. Deborah Pryce of Ohio.

Mr. Reynolds faced sagging polls and ran an ad apologizing for the scandal. He said he first learned of complaints about Mr. Foley last year from Rep. Rodney Alexander, Louisiana Republican and the sponsor of a page who received e-mails from Mr. Foley.

But Mr. Reynolds has been criticized for not doing more than telling House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican, about the complaints.

Survey USA showed Mr. Reynolds trailing by five points in the days after the scandal broke, but showed him up by three points in a poll taken Oct. 16-18.

Mrs. Pryce, chairwoman of the House Republican Conference and a friend of Mr. Foley's, lagged well behind her Democratic opponent in a poll taken Oct. 8-10. However, Pryce campaign spokesman George Rasley said it was "a temporary blip in the polls" and "we're back to where we were before," with a neck-and-neck race.

Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Stacey Paxton said the fact that a leader such as Mr. Reynolds is "fighting for his political life" proves that the Foley scandal is having an affect nationwide. Republican pollster Jon McHenry, though, said Democrats failed to nationalize the Foley issue by explaining how they would provide better leadership.

"Once again, Democrats seem to have not taken advantage of some clear momentum," Mr. McHenry said.

How Foley Skirted Rules To Pursue Relationships (WP)

By Amy Goldstein And Elizabeth Williamson

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Former Pages Describe Lawmaker's Advances

They met on the House floor. He was a 16-year-old political junkie, dressed in the drab navy blazer and gray slacks of a congressional page, rushing phone messages to the members he served. Rep. Mark Foley was tanned and charismatic, a successful politician in his mid-40s willing to joke with him between votes.

They talked perhaps a dozen times. Then at his page graduation ceremony that June, in 2002, he was excited when Foley appeared, uninvited, and dictated his personal e-mail address for the boy to jot in his memory book. "I started contacting him right away," the young man recalled. "I knew a congressman that I . . . talked to online. That was pretty cool."

The messages were innocent at first. But after the young man moved home, he recalled, Foley started asking about "my roommates, if I ever saw them naked." Within months, the congressman was dangling a job offer, "because I was a hot boy," he said. Two years later, when he contacted Foley for advice on D.C. hotels, the congressman wrote back: "You could always stay at my place. I'm always here, I'm always lonely, and I'm always up for oral sex."

The experience of the young man, now 22, who agreed to recount his interactions with Foley on the condition of anonymity, was characteristic of the way the six-term House member pursued the online relationships that, once revealed, forced him to resign from Congress late last month. No one interviewed for this article could cite any instance in which Foley had sex with a former page. Foley's lawyer, David Roth, declined to comment for this story.

Interviews with nearly three dozen former pages suggest that the Florida Republican befriended a wide circle of teenagers during their stints as House pages. Then, shortly before they left or soon afterward, he singled out certain boys to write to -- including four newly confirmed by The Washington Post, in addition to former page Jordan Edmund and one other whose illicit online conversations with Foley ended the congressman's career. Some of the correspondence was brief and casual. But over months or years, if a boy seemed willing to go along, some conversations grew more sexual.

The FBI and Florida officials are conducting criminal investigations into Foley's dealings with former pages.

Foley was able to operate unimpeded for years -- forming the friendships with pages that would be the seeds of online relationships later on -- in spite of rigorous supervision of the teenagers in the congressional page program and a "zero-tolerance" policy for pages and adults who broke its rules.

Based on the interviews with pages, who spanned most of Foley's dozen years in the House -- and interviews with parents and former program employees -- the congressman's behavior went unchecked because he operated within accepted norms of the program's culture.

Although many pages regarded Foley as the House's friendliest member, his interactions with boys before they graduated often did not stray far beyond those of several other members of Congress each year who were known by the pages to take a caring interest in this corps of teenagers, most living away from home for the first time.

Foley also operated in an atmosphere in which male pages were able more easily than females to develop mentoring relationships with the male members of Congress, who account for nearly 9 in 10 members of the House.

Most of all, his interest in the boys coincided with the ambitions of many of the teenagers, who craved contact with members in hopes of fostering political careers of their own.

"I didn't want to piss off a member of an institution that I really revered," said a former Republican page from 2002, who said that, shortly after he finished the program, he exchanged a handful of messages with Foley over two months and that they gradually became sexual. He played along, then slowed his responses until Foley took the hint and stopped. He never considered reporting Foley to authorities. "I figured maybe someday I will want to be involved in Congress," he said. "I didn't want to make an enemy."

Besides, he said, "it was embarrassing."Overly Friendly

One evening early in the spring of 2000, a half-dozen pages -- three girls and three boys -- went to supper at Hawk 'n' Dove, a Capitol Hill pub. One boy had mentioned to Foley that they would be there, but no one expected that a congressman would show up.

Between House votes that night, Foley walked in. "It was the craziest thing. He ate wings off everybody's plate," recalled Rebecca Hoffman, a Democratic page who was there. He shot billiards with them, another page recalled.

"We were just absolutely shocked," said Hoffman, now 23. "We went back and told all our friends, 'You won't believe what happened.' "

Though Foley's willingness to socialize with pages stood out, their world granted them rare proximity to political power.

The page program is as old as the republic. Today, pages are all high school juniors and must be at least 16, and they typically work on Capitol Hill and take classes for an entire school year. They are the only people other than House members allowed entree to certain corridors, rooms and chambers in the Capitol, including the floor of the House.

Pages are taught to speak to a member only when spoken to. But those with plum assignments, in the Republican and Democratic cloakrooms or on the floor itself, find opportunities to talk with a few members who are particularly receptive.

"There's something that really feels good about getting to hang out with people who are powerful and well known," said Michael Buck, who was a Republican-sponsored page from Maryland's Eastern Shore in 1999-2000 and now is a teacher in the Mississippi Delta.

"You have your select group of people you become certain friends with," said Ray Lahoud, a law student who was a page in 1999-2000, referring to members of Congress. "They were sort of your mentors. They replaced your parents. . . . Mark Foley was one of those people who was always . . . talking to us. He knew us all by name."

Jacob Kosoff, a cloakroom page in 1997-98, remembers looking out a Capitol doorway one warm spring day and noticing Foley arriving on his bicycle below. He sprinted down a marble staircase, zipped through a metal detector and arrived on the House floor in time to catch the congressman. "Oh wow, you cycle to votes. That's cool," Kosoff recalls telling him.

Foley liked the attention. "He could not only tell you every time he was in a picture in the New York Times, but where he was in the photo," said one man who worked with him in Congress. "He thrived on the adoration of the people in the room. And here was a group of people who gave it unhesitatingly."

"I remember him riding by in his Bimmer and talking about all the cars he got and going down to Florida to take out his yacht," said Kristopher Hart, a page in 1999-2000 who went on to George Washington University and now runs a day spa near the campus. "He was like a little bit of a showman, but he was a great guy."

Shortly before the end of his page year, Hart said, he somehow obtained the online name Foley used for instant messages, MAF54. "We talked on IM just a couple of times. . . . It would be pretty cool to write and say, 'Are you in Congress or are you in Florida?' " They wrote sporadically through Hart's freshman year of college. "He never crossed the line."

At times, Foley seemed to speak suggestively to boys before they left the program. A female former page remembers becoming uneasy one day in 2000 as she watched him talk "a little too much" on the House floor to a boy she knew. Right afterward, she asked what Foley had said. The boy, she recalled, told her Foley had admired the page's "very big hands" and boasted about his "glorious" home in Florida. The boy added: "Eighteen. Eighteen's that magic number." The girl was appalled at what seemed to her to be a come-on that the boy did not fully understand.

After their graduation a few months later, she said, another male page told her that he and Foley were exchanging e-mails and that the congressman had asked him to mail a picture of himself to Foley's Washington house.

The Republican page from 2002, who exchanged instant messages with Foley for two months, said the first one arrived just before the start of his senior year of high school. He found the message when he logged on to his family's computer after dinner one night. At first, he assumed it was a prank by another page pretending to be the congressman. "It was a friendly conversation that got strange," said the young man, now 21. In one, Foley asked whether his roommates had worn "no boxers or briefs to bed."

The young man said he did not immediately realize that the messages might be a solicitation. Catholic, conservative and from a small town, the former page said he had never known anyone who was gay. By early fall, Foley offered to write a college recommendation. By then, the young man said, "I just wanted the association with him not to be there."

Foley never asked to meet him, he said. "I think in my case, it was him just fantasizing," he said.

The self-described political junkie who received Foley's message about oral sex said his parents were standing next to him at graduation in 2002 when the congressman offered his address. Foley's online overtures "put the ball always in the page's court," he said. "I would have had to make the move."

Although he was only 17 at the time, he said, "if we actually would have met in person, I think he would have tried something. There's no doubt in my mind."Selective Vigilance

The dormitory where the pages live, for the past few years a renovated convent three blocks southeast of the Capitol, has bulletproof glass in the entryway, a metal detector and two armed Capitol Police officers around the clock. Pages must sign out with at least one other page every time they leave the building.

The stringent rules are the legacy of a sex scandal in 1983, when two male members of Congress were censured for having sexual relations with pages, a girl and a boy, in 1980 and 1973.

The weekend new pages arrive, they gather Sunday afternoon on the House floor to learn their duties and the rules. "This is a different world of important adults, important people making important decisions," Donnald K. Anderson, a former House clerk and an emeritus member of the Page Board, said he always tells the teenagers that day. "If something or somebody is bothering you, don't suffer in silence."

There is to be no smoking, no drinking or drugs, no sex. Students who are one minute late on their lights-out curfew get demerits that lead to being grounded.

Most students follow the rules. Pages who violate any of the major rules are ordered to leave.

In 2001-02, nearly a dozen pages were sent home, including four who had written a song with homophobic lyrics that mocked a gay staff member of the page dormitory.

"You were on the next plane home," said Matthew J. Frattali, who worked as a tutor in the page school for two years until he, too, was ordered to leave for having falsely recorded that a group of students was in study hall when he actually had let them go out to celebrate a birthday.

However, Frattali and former pages said the rules were looser when members of Congress were involved.

And the program's staff, even if they had known of a problem involving Foley or any other member, could not have simply invoked their zero-tolerance policy.

"One is sort of a page transgression," Frattali said. "One is a member transgression. You can't put a member on a plane and send him home."

Since the 1983 page scandal, the program has put an emphasis on discouraging interaction between female pages and male lawmakers and staff, without similar sensitivities about male lawmakers and male pages.

One female page remembers that she was chastised several years ago -- and a Republican House leadership aide was threatened with firing -- after she met with the aide after work one day in his office, with the door open, to talk about the Bible.

It struck her as unfair. She was one of many girls who watched enviously as Foley surrounded himself with male pages on the House floor.

On June 10, 2000, the last night in Washington for the page class that year, Foley parked his BMW at the edge of the park across from the old page dorm, since torn down.

A few pages noticed him, Michael Buck remembers, and ran to see him. "He was outside in his convertible, hanging out and telling us goodbye."

Democrats Play Up Candidates' Service (NYT)

By Monica Davey

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084733

GLEN ELLYN, Ill. — As she campaigns for Congress in the suburbs of Chicago, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat and an Iraq veteran, speaks with chilling conviction about the war.

Iraq was a big mistake, Ms. Duckworth says as she walks among voters on two artificial legs. Millions of dollars have been wasted there. Soldiers were being served costly steak and lobster on Sunday nights even as they were not given body armor they needed.

Though Ms. Duckworth is a political novice, her service and sacrifice (she lost her legs when a grenade hit her helicopter) have allowed her to speak her mind in a district once seen as downright hostile toward Democrats, having sent a Republican to Congress for 32 years.

Around the nation, a handful of military veterans like Ms. Duckworth have emerged as competitive Democratic candidates for Congress. For a party that has struggled against a perception that Republicans are stronger on matters of terrorism and national security, the veterans have been a powerful antidote: a group that inherently carries credibility with voters on issues like Iraq.

With only about a quarter of the members of Congress having served in the military, the fewest in recent decades, many voters say such experience matters.

"She was there," said Barb Bauler, who recently met Ms. Duckworth as the candidate served fruit salad at a retirees' club. "That is the bravest thing of all."

Tears creeping up in her eyes, Ms. Bauler pulled out a photograph of her daughter Kathleen to show Ms. Duckworth, telling her that Kathleen, a doctor in the Army, was to be deployed soon.

"Tell her to wear her gear," said Ms. Duckworth, who then reached over for a hug.

Some 60 former service members are challengers for the House or the Senate as Democrats, including a half-dozen who served in Iraq. The Democrats are not shy about military résumés. Among their promotions is a "Fighting Dems" Web site bearing the subtitle, "Back from the front lines, headed to Congress."

Polls show Ms. Duckworth and her Republican opponent, Peter J. Roskam, locked in a competitive contest. About half a dozen other races with veterans running as Democrats in places like Kentucky, Pennsylvania and Virginia are also seen as competitive, meaning the veterans could help tip the balance of power in Congress if they do well.

Many of the other veterans running as Democrats, though, are unlikely to be headed to Congress this season, analysts say, and a few complain that the party remembers them for promotions, but forgets them when it comes to money.

The Republicans have 41 challengers with military experience making bids for the House or the Senate, two of them Iraq veterans, but the party has not publicly focused as much on that group's service.

"A candidate's biography is hardly the sole indicator as to how people choose to vote," said Tracey Schmitt, a Republican National Committee spokeswoman. "Americans are going to take a long, hard look at where each individual stands on the issues that matter to them, whether it's national security or the economy."

Here, the war credentials of Ms. Duckworth have become particularly potent in part because of the visible wounds she received in Iraq two years ago. Her prosthetic legs leave her limping noticeably, and she sometimes cheerily props one of them up on a chair or pushes back her sleeve to display a web of scars on her right arm, which doctors feared might also be lost.

Encouraged to run by Democratic Party leaders, she faces Mr. Roskam, a longtime state legislator, for the Sixth District seat in the western suburbs now held by Representative Henry J. Hyde, who is retiring.

The battle has been relatively well financed, fierce and, some voters complain, overwhelming in its rush of commercials, mailings and countermailings. Each candidate suggests that the other will be in lock step with party leaders, unwilling or unable to offer independent opinions.

Mr. Roskam, a lawyer, criticizes Ms. Duckworth as a "recruited candidate" who is getting her help and financial support from everywhere other than here.

"I'm not the Rosie O'Donnell candidate, the Barbra Streisand candidate, the Al Franken candidate who is also all tied up with the Chicago Democratic machine," Mr. Roskam, who has longstanding roots in these parts, said in an interview after speaking at his former grade school.

In turn, Ms. Duckworth portrays Mr. Roskam as an unwavering supporter of President Bush and Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, both of whom have appeared recently in Chicago, in part to help raise more than a half-million dollars for Mr. Roskam.

The district, much of which includes parts of DuPage County — where Mr. Bush's father won by 124,000 votes in 1988 but where Mr. Bush's victory margin was far narrower in 2000 (48,400 votes) and narrower still in 2004 (38,800 votes) — has shifted some. Republicans are still popular, but the Latino population is also growing, which Democrats say could help make the region more hospitable for them.

Ms. Duckworth talks about Iraq at nearly every stop. As she entered the room for one recent appearance, a screen lit up with a video of Bob Kerrey, the former senator, retelling Ms. Duckworth's harrowing story.

But Mr. Roskam, whose campaign has the unusual task of facing an opponent whose story has drawn notice from People magazine and scores of international publications, said most voters here were more focused on taxes and immigration than on Iraq.

On those points, Mr. Roskam said he would make Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent and would support strictly securing the nation's borders without ensuring amnesty for illegal immigrants.

As for the war, Mr. Roskam said he agreed with Ms. Duckworth in certain ways. Difficult questions, he said, should be posed about why the nation "did not go in with overwhelming force." But he also said he would be "very judicious" in deciding when to withdraw American troops.

"There will be a point when Iraq gets as stable as it can get," he said. Ms. Duckworth, meanwhile, said Iraq was among the top issues, along with the budget and energy independence, for most voters.

Before them, she pounds away at the ways she says the war has been mishandled, saying that the job in Afghanistan should have been finished first; that contractors are getting rich as soldiers die; and that soldiers should begin coming home as Iraqis successfully take charge of security.

The war, Ms. Duckworth said, is why she finds herself running for office.

"I was there in the hospital looking at more and more bad decisions, more and more bad policy," she said.

Ms. Duckworth has raised more than $2 million (as has Mr. Roskam) and has also benefited from spending by the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Some other veterans, particularly those in races considered long shots, have received less or no support; a few say they feel abandoned by the party.

"They want us when we're of value to them, and then they want us to sit down and shut up when we're not," said Bill Winter, a veteran. Mr. Winter said Democratic Party leaders in Colorado urged him to run for that state's Sixth District, then seemed to disappear, writing off his race against Tom Tancredo, a Republican incumbent, as not winnable.

Bill Burton, a spokesman for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, said the party remained proud of all its veterans. "We would love to fund all of our candidates out around the country," Mr. Burton said, "but there's a harsh political reality — the finite nature of our funds."

Immigrants Flocking To GOP Districts (AP)

By Stephen Ohlemacher

AP, October 22, 2006

It's a slice of Americana: children playing soccer on a sunny Saturday morning, their parents cheering them on. But at these soccer fields, the dominant language is Spanish, the food truck sells authentic Mexican and few of the adults are eligible to vote.

Along the sidelines, America Gruner lugs a plastic tub filled with blank voter registration forms. Gruner has worked for months to register Latinos, inspired by an immigration debate that has become shrill to many Hispanics. Most politicians in this Republican stronghold in north Georgia offer little sympathy.

"They haven't, at least openly, supported us when we needed it," said Gruner, a legal immigrant who has registered about 100 voters so far.

Republican congressional districts are becoming magnets for immigrants — legal and illegal — but GOP lawmakers are not exactly embracing their new constituents.

Of the 50 House districts nationwide with the fastest-growing immigrant communities, 45 are represented by Republicans. All but three of those lawmakers voted for a bill that would make illegal immigrants felons.

Overall, GOP districts added about 3 million immigrants from 2000 to 2005, nearly twice the number that settled in districts represented by Democrats, according to an Associated Press analysis of census data.

The numbers help explain why illegal immigration is such a big issue in rural Georgia, eastern Pennsylvania and in suburbs throughout the United States.

They also help explain why House Republicans passed five bills on border security in the weeks before Congress recessed for the Nov. 7 elections. Only one measure, calling for a border fence, has become law.

Max Burns, a Republican congressional candidate in eastern Georgia, typifies the hard line.

"No citizenship, no federal benefits, no guaranteed access to this country because they broke the law to come here," Burns says.

His tight race against Democratic Rep. John Barrow illustrates the GOP strategy in many congressional campaigns.

Barrow has voted for nearly every Republican immigration bill approved by the House in the past year. He voted to make illegal immigrants felons and to erect the border fence. He said he "opposes amnesty in any form."

Yet Burns' campaign ran a television ad attacking Barrow after the congressman was quoted in a newspaper as saying the U.S. should not let in any more immigrants until it assimilates the illegal ones already here. "He's for assimilating illegal immigrants," the ad intones. "That's amnesty!"

Barrow's campaign responded with a television ad boasting that "John Barrow voted to make it a crime to be in the United States illegally."

Barrow narrowly defeated Burns in 2004. The district was redrawn for the upcoming election to include several areas that have attracted new immigrants, including Vidalia, famous for its onions.

Shackled with an unpopular president and the war in Iraq, many Republican candidates are determined to focus on local issues as they fight to maintain control of Congress. Illegal immigration, it turns out, can be a potent local issue in communities unaccustomed to a lot of newcomers.

"It's a law-and-order issue to the people in my district," said Rep. Jim Gerlach, a Republican from southeast Pennsylvania.

Gerlach's district added 16,000 immigrants from 2000 to 2005, a 49 percent increase. He has aired a television ad calling President Bush "wrong" for proposing a guest worker program "that may lead to amnesty for illegal immigrants."

Gerlach is in a tight rematch with Democrat Lois Murphy, who barely lost the election two years ago. Murphy is appalled that Republicans are trying to make illegal immigration a campaign issue, saying the problem mushroomed on their watch.

"It's their failure and they shouldn't get any points for it," Murphy said.

There are nearly 36 million immigrants living in the U.S., according to the Census Bureau. An estimated 11 million to 12 million are in the country illegally.

For generations, most immigrants settled in big cities, attracted by fellow countrymen and by social service networks that catered to them. But immigrants increasingly are chasing jobs to fast-growing suburban and rural communities in Middle America — areas that have elected a lot of Republicans to Congress.

North Georgia has attracted thousands of Latino immigrants — legal and illegal — to work in carpet mills in Dalton, in poultry plants in Gainesville and on farms that dot the landscape in between.

The region exemplifies the struggle — and promise — of Latinos yearning for political power. Hispanics make up about 12.5 percent of the district represented by GOP Rep. Nathan Deal, but less than 2 percent of registered voters.

The district added 28,000 immigrants from 2000 to 2005, a 57 percent increase. But more than three-fourths of the immigrants are noncitizens, giving Barrow little incentive to reach out to them.

"It's difficult to know who's legal and who's illegal, but you know for sure that we haven't let that many legal immigrants in," said Deal, a seven-term incumbent from Gainesville.

Deal has proposed legislation that would deny citizenship to the U.S.-born children of illegal immigrants. It is unclear whether the bill would be constitutional and it is unlikely to pass this year. But it has attracted 87 co-sponsors in the House.

Deal's opponent in November, Democrat John Bradbury, said Republicans offer slogans rather than solutions to illegal immigration. "We're dealing with people who are perfectly willing to accept catch phrases instead of thought," said Bradbury, a political newcomer who faces long odds on Election Day.

Gruner, the volunteer voter recruiter, moved from Mexico to Dalton five years ago to work as an interpreter in the schools. She is in the country legally, but empathizes with those who are not.

"We feel like this is a political game and the politicians are playing with us," Gruner said. "They don't see the faces. They just see a political outcome."

It takes Gruner two hands to carry the tub filled with voter registration forms as she strolls through the crowd at the soccer game.

She approaches two men sitting under a small tree next to the soccer fields. They wave her away, saying they are not U.S. citizens. The men are brothers, Raul and Juan Perez. Both were born in Mexico; only Juan is in the U.S. legally.

Raul Perez, 53, said he has entered the U.S. many times and now works as a stone mason on homes. He fetches an envelope stuffed with photographs of his work, pictures of ornate fireplaces and stone-sided houses. One features an elaborate stone wall alongside a backyard swimming pool, a waterfall cascading into the pool.

"You show them what an illegal can do," he says through an interpreter, offering the photo to a visitor.

Neither man has much use for politicians. They do not think Republicans or Democrats represent their interests. But they are hopeful.

"We have children who are citizens and they are getting ready to vote in a few years," says Juan Perez, 43. "We will be a majority someday."

About 40 miles to the south, in Rome, Michael Morton has joined a group that videotapes workers entering factories, asking them if they are in the country legally.

"Most of them will say no," said the retired marketing executive, who believes that illegal immigrants strain social services and take jobs from Americans.

Morton said he joined the Minuteman Civil Defense Corps because he felt his community was being overrun. The Arizona-based group patrols the Mexico border looking for illegal immigrants. Morton was planning a three-week trip to the border this fall.

"We have a great deal of respect for the work ethic they bring, but they are breaking the law to do it," Morton said. "They are a segregated culture and their culture seems to be in opposition to our American culture."

Webb Struggles Against Stiff Style (WT)

By Seth Mclaughlin

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

Since the first day of his U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. has described himself as a nonpolitician.

And the self-description rings true in his performance on the hustings.

The decorated Vietnam War veteran's stiff and stern style of retail politics has been on display since his announcement in February that he would try to unseat Sen. George Allen, one of the state's most polished politicians.

"The idea that you have to go out and touch people and shake hands and warm up to total strangers, that was a bit of a shock to him at first, but he has warmed up to it," Mr. Webb's longtime friend Nelson Jones told The Washington Times. "People who know Jim know he is a shy guy."

On the campaign trail, the former Navy secretary is a far cry from former Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who is arguably the state's most personable public figure.

With his toothy smile, Mr. Warner runs to the crowd and shakes hands, often sweats through shirts and hardly ever passes up a chance to kiss a baby.

Mr. Webb gives firm handshakes, but at times needs a reminder to smile in photographs. He has a catchy belly laugh, but it rarely is heard in public. He thrives on foreign-policy issues, but sometimes loses people accustomed to candidates rattling off sound bites.

"With politics, [Mr. Webb] is more of a policy guy, an intellectual, rather than a politician," state Sen. Robert Creigh Deeds, Bath Democrat, told The Times.

At a Memorial Day parade in Falls Church, Mr. Webb, 60, appeared uncomfortable walking before a crowd of supporters chanting "Jim Webb for Senate."

Following the lead of former Delegate J. Chapman Petersen, a Democrat, Mr. Webb gradually found a stride more fitting of a politician. He sporadically shook hands and said, "Hello, I'm Jim Webb."

"Sometimes you think if he was more of a glad-hander that might help him in some situations, but that is just not his personality," Mr. Petersen said.

Though Mr. Webb touts Andrew Jackson's philosophy of "measuring the health of a society at its base, not at its top," he sometimes struggles to direct his message toward the working-class voters he targets.

For example, while former President Bill Clinton describes what he calls Republican fear-mongering as a "mangy old dog" that won't hunt, Mr. Webb dubs it "classic Rovian strategy." The latter is a reference to White House adviser Karl Rove.

And at a recent banquet in Norfolk benefiting the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, some in the audience thought Mr. Webb's speech was geared more toward Capital Beltway insiders than those in southeastern Virginia.

At the Oct. 9 debate, Mr. Allen efficiently answered questions about such issues as the war in Iraq, while Mr. Webb rarely smiled, made little eye contact with the camera and often scanned his notes.

However, while Mr. Webb answered reporters' questions after the debate, Mr. Allen hurriedly left the room with his wife, Susan, who barely kept up with his pace.

Democrats say Mr. Webb's public persona is a double-edged sword: It hurts his ability to connect with people who see him as being too distant, while it helps him with those who see him as the antithesis of Mr. Allen's "good old boy" image.

That image and Mr. Allen's missteps have made the race a tossup.

"Whether [Mr. Webb's public persona] translates into a win, we will see," Mr. Petersen said.

In Md. Race, Groups Court 'Values Voters' (WP)

By Ann E. Marimow

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Abortion Becomes a Defining Issue

Religious leaders and abortion foes are pumping more than $140,000 into the final two weeks of the Maryland U.S. Senate contest to motivate "values voters" by elevating such issues as abortion and same-sex marriage in a campaign that has largely been fought over the Iraq war, the future of Social Security and the candidates' disparate styles.

The issue of abortion, though, offers one of the starkest contrasts in the race: Republican Michael S. Steele, a former Catholic seminarian, strongly opposes the practice. Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore congressman, was the keynote speaker at NARAL Pro-Choice Maryland's annual gala last night in Rockville.

Although the two major candidates rarely bring up the subject unprompted on the campaign trail, independent groups plan to highlight the issue in radio and television ads, direct mail and fundraising appeals leading up to Nov. 7.

National Right to Life's political action committee plans to run radio commercials on Steele's behalf in Western Maryland and the Eastern Shore in the week before the election and has spent more than $72,000 supporting the lieutenant governor's candidacy with ads and mail, according to the Federal Election Commission.

A coalition of religious leaders last week released a series of ads aimed at energizing churchgoing African American voters in Prince George's County and Baltimore to "vote for candidates who defend life." The 30-second spots do not mention Steele by name, but Bishop Harry R. Jackson Jr., the organizer, said voters will get the message when they review the candidates' records in guides distributed in 150 churches.

"We're promoting values voting, and in this case it means Steele is our big choice," said Jackson, the senior pastor of Hope Christian Church in Lanham.

NARAL's national affiliate, meanwhile, has appealed to thousands of abortion rights supporters throughout Maryland to contribute to Cardin's campaign. The message delivered through e-mail last week was titled "Don't let Bush 'Steele' Your Choice in Maryland." And women's rights leaders, including National Organization for Women President Kim Gandy, gathered yesterday in Bethesda to take issue with Steele's recent assertion that his opinion on the 1973 Supreme Court decision to legalize abortion is "moot."

"Maybe he slept through ninth-grade civics class," Gandy said. "The last time I looked at the Constitution, the Senate has to consent to every federal court nominee."

Independent candidate Kevin Zeese -- who has the backing of the Green, Populist and Libertarian parties -- supports abortion rights but called the issue a "diversion from the major issues of our militaristic foreign policy and an economy that favors the wealthiest while the middle class struggles."

In the governor's race, the issue has not arisen because both candidates generally support abortion rights. Although Republican Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. favors some limitations, he has done nothing to press them in his tenure.

Of the candidates, political pollsters and professors say Steele has the most to gain -- and lose -- from the attention as he tries to secure his GOP base, attract black Democrats and appeal to independents with a message of moderation.

Steele's challenge, they said, is to attract so-called values voters without turning off a broader audience in a state where the majority consistently tell pollsters that they believe abortion should be legal.

"The winning political tactic is to be all things to all people, but that tends to get shredded in the competitive environment," said political science professor Herb Smith of McDaniel College in Westminster, Md.

Smith said the effort to sway conservative Democrats could be successful if the communications are targeted through church congregation lists as the national GOP did in 2004 in states such as Ohio. But if the message is dispersed through mass media, he said, it could erode support for Steele among a larger segment of voters.

In a Washington Post poll in June, 63 percent of Maryland voters surveyed said abortion should be legal, compared with 56 percent nationally. In 1992, voters overwhelmingly supported an abortion measure on the statewide ballot that ensures access to legal early-term abortions in Maryland even if Roe v. Wade is overturned.

"If you're Michael Steele, the last thing you want is the campaign to be determined based on a set of social issues," said pollster Keith Haller of Potomac Inc., who is not working for either candidate.

The $70,000 ad campaign by the Maryland Values Coalition is part of a multi-front effort that includes handing out 60,000 voters' guides from the Association of Maryland Families mostly to evangelical and Catholic churches, registering voters and educating religious leaders.

In private meetings with pastors, Jackson said Steele is "clear that he's for life, a good Roman Catholic." In the final weeks of the campaign, he said, "these real differences need to be pointed out."

Steele raised the ire of abortion rights advocates last week after MSNBC reported his comments on the Roe v. Wade decision: "It's in the Supreme Court. What piece of legislation in the Senate is dealing with abortion?"

Cardin, joined by NARAL Pro-Choice America President Nancy Keenan, strenuously disagreed, pointing to 75 votes in the past decade on abortion-related questions. "It is a fundamental issue, and there are significant matters before Congress," Cardin said, from judicial nominations to family planning.

Steele later said that when it comes to such social issues as abortion, "I'm not saying that they're not relevant. I just don't want them to be the center and the primary focus when we have people starving in our neighborhoods, when we have kids who are not being educated in our classrooms."

Staff writer Ernesto LondoÃ±o contributed to this report.

Steele's Aura Of Independence Needs Substance (WP)

By Marc Fisher

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Michael Steele looks like the most innovative and refreshing candidate in this fall's campaign. All puppies aside, his TV ads have been the talk of the town, not only for their striking style and the lieutenant governor's good humor, but because Steele is bold enough to take some shots at his party's orthodoxy.

Steele clearly relishes breaking the mold. Even if his early steps away from the Republican line on the war in Iraq were tentative and clumsily anonymous, Steele has managed to portray himself as someone who understands the average Marylander's frustration with both parties and with all the tired tropes of American politics.

So when Steele is asked whether Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld should resign, his response is neither to parrot the party line nor to obfuscate with standard-issue blather about how Cabinet members serve at the pleasure of the president. No, Steele declares the question to be "irrelevant. It's more political Washington stuff. Demagoguing. If I call for his resignation, what does that do? 'Oooh, Michael Steele says I should resign?' "

But while Steele's casual, backyard rhetoric is alluringly accessible, his reply is also a voter-friendly way of saying he's not going to answer the question. Similarly, when Steele is asked whether the Supreme Court's Roe v. Wade ruling on abortion was properly decided, he says, "I'm a Senate candidate. My opinion on that is moot." Another deflection, despite the effort to appear disdainful of the usual political rhetoric.

Like many voters who look at Democratic candidate Ben Cardin and his large contributions from big oil, pharmaceutical and insurance companies, I roll my eyes over his easy acceptance of politics-as-usual. But although Steele's TV ads present him as a different kind of politician, he also has taken plenty of moola from big industry.

The problem with Steele's enticing campaign is that, as lieutenant governor, the mantle of independence that he claimed turned out to be only a decorative cloak. For years, he touted his religious objections to the death penalty as a symbol of his ability to stand up for his principles even when they put him on the wrong side of Republican policy. But Steele couldn't deliver the goods: When he finally came up with his long-promised recommendation to Gov. Bob Ehrlich on Maryland's use of capital punishment, all Steele could muster was a confidential memo suggesting more study of the issue. If that's his idea of an independent stand, then those TV ads indeed are all bluster.

Still, the promise portrayed by Steele's campaign has more than a few Prince George's County residents thinking about jumping over to cast one Republican vote. I've spoken to dozens of black voters who are attracted by the prospect of a black senator, by Steele's pledge to break with his party and by his background as a native Washingtonian.

In Maryland politics, where Baltimore still reigns supreme, the possibility of having a senator who knows and cares about D.C. suburbs is almost enough for many voters to overcome their dismay with the Bush administration and Republicans.

Cardin, who has represented Baltimore his entire adult life, seems to have little interest in Washington area issues. When I asked him what the next move should be now that Virginia's legislature has failed to join Maryland, the District and the federal government in providing a dedicated source of funding for Metro, Cardin replied that he was "not familiar with that issue." The man who wants to represent all of Maryland was clueless about a $1.5 billion federal funding source that is the No. 1 priority for the transit system serving the state's largest bloc of voters.

But while Steele would give D.C. suburbs a voice in the Senate for the first time since Montgomery and Prince George's counties ballooned into major population centers, his campaign has become its own worst enemy. Surrounding himself with a staff that sports a deep antagonism toward Democrats and the federal government -- that is, toward significant chunks of the voter base he needs to win over -- Steele has run a stealth campaign, keeping the candidate's whereabouts a closely held secret and venturing out primarily on friendly, conservative talk radio.

And now, when you'd think Steele would be trying to prove his independence with a strong emphasis on policy and ideas, what does he do to drum up publicity? Import Don King, the clownish boxing showman who served time for manslaughter. "I must have an indictments list longer than his awards list," King joked while touring the state with Steele. Har, har.

Michael Steele had a choice in this campaign: Add substance to the aura of independence generated by his TV ads, or hide behind that aura, spending his energy instead on pumping up the imagery. Sadly, he stuck with the sizzle, leaving voters still hungry for meat.

Lamont Gives $2M To Flagging Campaign (AP)

By Andrew Miga

AP, October 22, 2006

Democratic candidate Ned Lamont, trailing Sen. Joe Lieberman by a double-digit margin, dropped another $2 million into his Senate bid in Connecticut on Saturday.

The wealthy cable television executive has tapped his personal fortune for $12.7 million to fund his campaign.

Lamont has about two weeks to catch Lieberman, a three-term incumbent who has pulled to a 17-point lead, according to a recent poll. Lieberman lost the Democratic primary to Lamont and then launched an independent campaign.

The third and final televised debate of the race was scheduled for Monday. Unlike their second debate, which featured all five candidates, only Lieberman, Lamont and Republican Alan Schlesinger will share the stage. That could make it easier for Lamont to engage Lieberman directly.

"People have a real opportunity to see three candidates stand up, enunciate real differences about where this country should go," Lamont said Friday while campaigning in Hartford. "That's the best way to get our message out, through debates."

Lieberman spokeswoman Tammy Sun said, "We expect Ned Lamont may stoop to new lows in misrepresenting Joe Lieberman's record in a desperate last-minute ploy."

Schlesinger, considered a long shot, was at 6 percent in the latest Quinnipiac University survey. He and Lieberman are vying for Republican support, so any Schlesinger gains could come at Lieberman's expense.

Lieberman drew much of the criticism that came from his rivals in the first two debates. He has widened his lead from 10 points last month, according to the latest Quinnipiac poll. The senator gained an edge with independent voters, the state's largest voting bloc, and with men, the survey showed.

"It's a steep uphill battle for Lamont to erase this substantial gap," said Quinnipiac poll director Doug Schwartz. "He's got to do something different, because what he's been doing up to this point hasn't been working. In fact, his numbers have been getting lower."

Lamont is flooding the airwaves with a new ad campaign in the coming days to try to close the gap. Lieberman, who enjoys a fundraising advantage, has accused Lamont of trying to buy the election with a $1 million barrage of TV commercials assailing him.

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., the Democratic 2004 presidential nominee, hopes to give Lamont a boost when he campaigns with Lamont on Wednesday. Lieberman will stump with former Nebraska Sen. Bob Kerrey, a Democrat, on the same day.

Democrat, Republican Decry GOP TV Ad (AP)

Both major-party candidates for a congressional seat are decrying an ad sponsored by a national Republican committee that accuses the Democrat of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line.

The ad, which began airing Friday, shows Michael Arcuri leering at the silhouette of a dancing woman who says, "Hi, sexy. You've reached the live, one-on-one fantasy line."

Arcuri's campaign said an associate mistakenly dialed an 800-number sex line two years ago from Arcuri's New York City hotel room, and released records supporting the claim. The number shares the same last seven digits with the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed the minute after the first call was made.

Arcuri, the district attorney in Oneida County, said the ad was "clearly libelous" and threatened to file a lawsuit. His GOP opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, described it as "way over the line."

At least seven television stations in Syracuse, Utica and Binghamton refused to run the ad, Arcuri said.

The ad's sponsor, the National Republican Congressional Committee, stood by the 30-second message. Spokesman Ed Patru insisted it was "totally true" and said Meier was not consulted.

DOJ_NMG_0084740

The two candidates, who say they are friends, are running to fill the seat left open by the retirement of Republican Rep. Sherwood Boehlert. Political analysts have said the race is among the nation's most competitive.

Arcuri said he had "never seen such an unfair commercial. I have a 12-year-old daughter. She's going to have to go to school and hear other kids talk about this."

Robert Thompson, professor of television and popular culture at Syracuse University, called the ad "an egregiously stupid accusation."

Earlier in the week, both candidates said they were disappointed by the attack ads produced and funded by their national party committees. They said campaign-finance laws prevent them from screening the commercials.

One voter, Rosemarie Paladino of Utica, said she found such negative advertising so distasteful that she was tempted to avoid voting.

"But then I said, 'Wait a minute. I've got to exercise my right.'"

Peace Now? A Stark Choice Between The Perception Of A Noble Effort And Of A Mistake (NYT)

By Peter Applebome

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

NORWALK, CONN.

In the 11th, count 'em, 11th, debate between Representative Christopher R. Shays, the incumbent Republican, and his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, Ms. Farrell began, as she usually does, with a brilliantly concise formulation of why people should oust Mr. Shays after 19 years in Congress.

"Where Chris Shays agrees with President Bush and the Republican majority has it been good for our country? Think Iraq and fiscal policies. Where Congressman Shays disagrees with President Bush and the Republican majority has it made a difference? Think the environment and energy. And can we afford another two years without checks and balances in Washington?"

Republicans are supposed to be the ones framing issues with bumper-sticker clarity, and Democrats are supposed to be the ones depicted as lost in meandering self-reflection.

But there are few more vivid glimpses of the ways that Republicans are trying to drive the wrong way against traffic than the eloquent, spirited, even admirable race in Connecticut's affluent New York suburbs. It is one of three Connecticut races in which incumbent Republican Representatives are fighting to survive.

Mr. Shays has an artfully articulated maverick image and is one of the more respected members of the House. Candidates like him lose about as often as Roger Federer loses first-round matches. But in a race starkly defined by the war, both camps say the election, a repeat of the one two years ago that Mr. Shays won with 52 percent of the vote, is close to dead even.

Ms. Farrell says that the war is a mistake that should be ended as quickly as possible. Mr. Shays says it is a noble effort, terribly botched, that must be salvaged and can be if we make a commitment to do it. If that's not a choice, nothing is.

"I've talked to people who have voted for Chris Shays all their lives and they are thinking of voting for Diane Farrell to send a message," said John M. Orman, professor of politics at Fairfield University. "People still want to be loyal to him, but even Republicans are deciding if they want to vote against a friend and send a message."

If the war is issue one, two and three, Mr. Shays is issue four. He hasn't always helped himself in the slog from debate to debate.

He said what happened at Abu Ghraib wasn't torture, then backtracked. Asked to defend taking campaign funds from House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, who is under fire for his handling of the Congressional-page controversy, he noted that Senator Edward M. Kennedy was campaigning for Ms. Farrell. "I know the speaker didn't go over a bridge and leave a young person in the water and then have a press conference the next day," he told The Hartford Courant. "Dennis Hastert didn't kill anybody."

He said last week that the United States should have invaded Iraq sooner than it did, but not over weapons of mass destruction.

He has tried to defend both the war and what some have seen as his new urgency about coming up with a way to end it. That is a balancing act so tenuous that David Broder of The Washington Post wrote that the war had reduced him "to a complete head case — consumed by the convoluted efforts to square the circle of his own conflicting interests."

STILL, if Mr. Shays wears his anguish like a beacon, his supporters say he has come by it honestly. A conscientious objector during Vietnam, he has made 14 trips to Iraq, putting himself in harm's way outside the confines of the secure Green Zone. He has been consistently second-guessing the conduct of the war, if not the case for it, since 2004.

And rather than Rove-ian sound bites ("cut-and-run Democrats"), he seems willing in debate after debate, forum after forum, to make his case for the war and how it can be redeemed in four steps: a series of timelines for replacing United States forces with Iraqi forces, based on an accurate assessment of combat readiness; an agreement among Shiite, Sunni and Kurdish leaders on power sharing; a conference of Iraq's neighbors on Iraqi security; and a plebiscite on the plan for American disengagement that would require a two-thirds majority for approval.

Many voters in his district have long since lost patience with the war and want a candidate whose first commitment is to ending it. The grim headlines and continuing carnage won't help a hawk, no matter how reflective, in an antiwar district. But if the voters want an honest debate on the war, 11 in fact, they've got it here.

"I'm not afraid to lose," said Mr. Shays. "Losing does not cause me angst. Will it be fun to call Diane Farrell on election night to say congratulations? No, that will not be fun. But I've lost before. I know what it's like. What I agonize over is sending men and women to war, and some of them are coming back in body bags. That to me is something to agonize about."

Unbowed Jefferson Keeps Up The Fight (WP)

By Allan Lengel

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

NEW ORLEANS -- At a barbershop in the Third Ward, in an area still woozy from Hurricane Katrina's knockout punch, the chatter was about what to do with Rep. William J. Jefferson (D-La.).

"He's got my vote. I like Jefferson," shop owner Charles Harris said as he finished up a haircut. "They haven't indicted him, number one. Whenever they come up with some concrete evidence, that might change things."

"I ain't voting for him 'cause of the $100,000 in the freezer," retorted one of Harris's customers, a former Jefferson supporter who declined to give his name. "You find $100,000 in your freezer, I ain't voting for you."

Jefferson has represented this part of New Orleans in the House for the better part of two decades, becoming the first black lawmaker elected to the United States Congress from Louisiana since Reconstruction. He has held seats on the Budget and Ways and Means committees. But in the Third Ward and elsewhere, some voters are no longer deciding on Jefferson based on his rÃ©sumÃ© or his legislative record, but on the $100,000 the FBI allegedly videotaped him accepting from an FBI informant.

FBI agents later found $90,000 in marked bills in Jefferson's freezer, wrapped in foil. The other $10,000 was missing but accounted for.

As Jefferson campaigns for a ninth term, the Harvard Law School graduate has shed little light on the federal investigation of bribery allegations, other than to insist on his innocence. In a TV ad, he talks about "the presumption of innocence afforded every person" and says, "For over 18 months, the federal government has investigated me and has yet to bring a single charge against me."

That message appears to be resonating among voters like Harris, and so, despite the constant threat of a federal indictment that sources familiar with the probe say is a foregone conclusion, the 59-year-old congressman is confidently campaigning.

Jefferson is showing up at public events, ready to work the crowd and touting a record of passing key legislation and getting funds to help post-Katrina New Orleans. Recently he went on the offensive, publicly accusing two of his 12 opponents of being "ethically challenged."

"He's a formidable candidate," says Danny Ford, executive director of the Louisiana Democratic Party, which endorsed another candidate. "He's not been indicted or convicted. He's got a lot of support."

Twelve challengers -- eight Democrats, three Republicans and one Libertarian -- are running against Jefferson in the Nov. 7 election. Unless the winner gets more than 50 percent of the vote, there will be a runoff in December. Political observers said they expect Jefferson to be in a runoff and possibly win, unless he's indicted.

Some in Jefferson's district say the absence of an indictment, after such a lengthy investigation, settles the matter for them.

"I think to the common person, this has gone on so long, if the feds had something they would have indicted by now," says Michael M. Davis, a member of the Jefferson Parish Democratic Executive Committee, which has endorsed Jefferson.

But other voters have little doubt about the ultimate outcome.

"There will be a special election when he's convicted," predicted Jim Monaghan Jr., who owns Molly's at the Market, a popular watering hole on Decatur Street. "How can he not be with 90,000 frozen dollars?"

State Rep. Karen Carter, Jefferson's most formidable challenger, adds: "It's not about innocence or guilt. The Justice Department will take care of that. There's a cloud of suspicion that hinders the incumbent's ability to be effective."

Carter has the endorsement of the state Democratic Party, which for the first time in decades turned its back on an incumbent. And his own party earlier this year kicked him off the powerful Ways and Means Committee.

Jefferson "is not the underdog, but he's certainly playing that card to supporters," said Brian Brox, a political science professor at Tulane University in New Orleans.

At a recent afternoon's campaign stop at the William Guste high-rise apartments in the Third Ward, a tieless Jefferson took off his suit coat, rolled up his sleeves and began shaking hands and exchanging hugs with a sea of smiling, receptive voters. Many of them were African American and middle-aged. Some wore "Don't Mess With Jeff" buttons.

Among those in attendance was Joshua Travis, 64, who said: "You're innocent until proven guilty. Ain't that the American way?"

Another attendee, a 58-year-old man who declined to give his name, said the FBI probe makes no difference.

"All of them are stealing. He just got caught. Since he's been in office, he's one of the few black officials who has been able to get in office and do something for the people," the man said.

After giving a spirited stump speech, Jefferson got personal.

"People ask me, 'Jefferson, how you keep on going with all that's going on . . . and people saying things about you?' I tell them how to do it. You know how to do it. I just turn it over to God.

"When you see me going around the campaign, when you see me with my head up at work, that's how it gets done. . . . Keep working and keep praying and keep praying."

In Two New Mexico Towns, Voices Of Concern About The Party In Power (NYT)

By Lizette Alvarez

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

PLACITAS, N.M., Oct. 19 — Jerry Eller, a Republican engineer who built his own house in this small town with big mountain views, voted twice for President Bush.

But his disenchantment with the Republican Party cuts so deeply that if the 2004 presidential election were being held this year, Mr. Bush would not get his vote. “If Kerry was running this time,” said Mr. Eller, 53, referring to Senator John Kerry, the Democratic nominee in 2004, “I would vote for him.”

A Vietnam veteran with three sons of military age, Mr. Eller frets over the war in Iraq and a possible draft, an idea he calls far from improbable. But there are other disturbing issues, too, he said: the erosion of civil liberties, runaway spending, and the religious right’s squeeze on the party.

Next month, Mr. Eller said, he plans to vote for the Democratic candidate in the tight House race here. “You get one party in power and they become corrupt,” he said.

In interviews with nearly two dozen people in Bernalillo, a small, mostly Hispanic town on Route 66, and its neighbor, Placitas, which is more affluent and increasingly more Republican, voters expressed their concerns about the state of the nation. Asked what issues will sway their votes in the House race here, almost everyone interviewed said, “The war and ...” (fill in the blank).

For some Republicans here, this one-two punch — the war and the federal deficit, the war and corruption, the war and the House page scandal — is enough to catapult some to the other side. Or at least to get them thinking of voting for the other party, something few of them imagined two years ago, they said.

In Placitas, a tranquil town of modern adobe houses, Republicans mostly describe themselves as moderate, the kind who disapprove of partisan politics. Some are New Mexico natives. Others come from elsewhere: Texas (to escape the humidity), Michigan (to flee the cold) and California (to stretch their money).

They live in a swing state. New Mexico went to Al Gore in 2000 and to Mr. Bush in 2004, both times by a sliver. In the First Congressional District here, which includes neighboring Albuquerque, voters opted for Mr. Kerry in 2004, although Sandoval County, Placitas’ home, went for Mr. Bush. Yet voters in this district have sent a Republican to the House for nearly four decades. The state has a Democratic governor but a senator from each party.

Representative Heather A. Wilson, who was first elected in this district in 1998, has won each election with a boost from Democrats. Now, though, she is in a dead heat with Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, according to recent polls.

The rancorous campaign has generated debate, and considerable anger, among most voters, who expressed distaste for today’s political culture, namely the partisan bickering and negative campaigning. But it has also prompted reflection. And while some Republicans here are steadfastly loyal, others said disenchantment had crept in.

A Republican newcomer to the area, Stan Nivault, 52, a married contractor and father of four from Austin, Tex., said he had never voted for a Democrat. But this year, Mr. Nivault, who calls himself a staunch Catholic, said he actually might, mostly because of the revelation that former Representative Mark Foley, Republican of Florida, had sent explicit electronic messages to underage male Congressional pages.

“It’s a bad thing,” Mr. Nivault said. “I’m upset that the guy was there to begin with and that Republicans did not handle it correctly. Democrats have made a big issue of it, but they have a right to.”

"Normally I vote straight Republican, but this year I may not vote that way because I'm a little upset," Mr. Nivault said. "Every time you open the paper or listen to television, it gets worse and worse."

As Bert Miller, a retired chemical engineer, hauled groceries to his car, he said that he would still vote Republican even though he had soured on the party.

Mr. Miller, 67, a fiscal conservative who moved here with his wife in 1998, said he was concerned about the war. But he is no less concerned about Republican spending gone amok.

"Republicans have been a disappointment," Mr. Miller said. "This president hasn't vetoed anything except one bill, on a social issue, stem cell research."

Mr. Miller said he yearned for old-fashioned Republican principles: tighter budgets and smaller government. "Things have gotten crazy," he said. "Let's get to work on the deficit and not same-sex marriage."

Russ Fisher-Ives, 51, a self-described liberal Republican, pulled up a chair at a restaurant on Route 66 in Bernalillo and said he was also disillusioned with the party. Mr. Fisher-Ives, who owns four acres nearby and moved here 31 years ago, said he did not know how he would vote. But the war in Iraq, once a more distant concern, has hit him hard, as has his distress over public education.

"This is another Vietnam; it's far bigger than Vietnam," said Mr. Fisher-Ives, an educator whose father once served as the Republican minority leader in the Connecticut Senate and as state treasurer.

Despite his Republican lineage, Mr. Fisher-Ives has contemplated switching parties, but then reconsidered. "I feel like they still have to answer to me as a registered Republican," he said. "I am not them. I am us."

For other Republicans, patriotism and safety remain a rallying cry; they would never think of straying, they said.

Croft Edwards, 37, has lived in New Mexico most of his life. An Army reservist and family man, Mr. Edwards said that he was "disappointed" in the system, but that he strongly believed Republicans were better suited to handle Iraq.

"Like George Bush or not, he likes to take action," Mr. Edwards said.

A Texas native, Beverly Maxie, 58, who fervently opposes abortion, agreed. As long as the war is being fought in Iraq — not here — Republicans are doing their job, Ms. Maxie said. "I am confident that Republicans will stay in power," she added.

For most Democrats, even those not always so keen on their party, the war and its repercussions are paramount. And there are other concerns: political scandals, health care, the environment, the economy.

Molly Perez, 52, who is raising her grandchild, earns $10 an hour as a cashier at a supermarket and pays $800 a month in rent. She is barely making ends meet, Ms. Perez said, and high gasoline prices set her back considerably. She said she sometimes prayed that her beat-up Chevy Cavalier would remain road-worthy.

"My life has gotten harder since the last election," Ms. Perez said.

She said she was so disheartened with the process, though, that she did not know whether she would vote in the House race. If she does, it will be unenthusiastically for Ms. Madrid.

Ophelia Rinaldi, 73, a retired social worker, said she took the war in Iraq in stride until recently. Now, she said, "it's pie in the sky," adding that it was "drawing away all our resources." Ms. Rinaldi said she worried about health care and prescription drugs.

Leslie Elgood, 51, a Democrat who works for New Mexico Community Capital, a community development fund in Bernalillo, said she usually tried to vote outside the box. But this year (she voted early), Ms. Elgood supported her party down the line to send a message. Her anger, she said, began with the war and has swelled with each new scandal.

"The Democrats don't have a sense of my voice," she said, "but I want to give them power now. Maybe they feel more chastened."

Pa. Congress Candidates Spar Over War (LAT/AP)

By Patrick Walters, Associated Press Writer

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

MALVERN, Pa. — Republican Congressman Jim Gerlach accused Democratic challenger Lois Murphy in a debate Saturday of being inconsistent in her support for U.S. troops in Iraq, while Murphy countered that the war has made the nation less safe.

The two-term congressman and Murphy are in battling to gain an edge in a race for a seat from the Philadelphia suburbs that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of Congress.

The race, one of the most competitive House races in the country, is a rematch of 2004, when Gerlach narrowly defeated Murphy. Recent polls have shown the two in a virtual tie.

Gerlach, a moderate Republican, charged in the AARP-sponsored debate that Murphy was not prepared to give U.S. troops the funding they need to help a new government succeed in Iraq.

"She apparently doesn't want to withdraw them and she's not sure she wants to fund them, either," he said at the Desmond Hotel, attended by about 200 people and moderated by KYW-TV news anchor Larry Mendte.

Murphy, a lawyer, denied the assertion that she would not fully support the troops. She condemned the war and called for more accountability.

"The war in Iraq has made us less safe, not safer," Murphy said. "He is satisfied with the progress we are making in Iraq and I am not."

The two also discussed the economy and health care. On the economy, Gerlach said tax cuts in 2001 and 2003 have helped turn it around. "This is a very strong economy that hopefully Congress won't screw up," he said.

Murphy argued that the cuts were not helping the middle class. More than 50 percent of the money went to the top 10 percent of income-earners, Murphy said.

"If he thinks that's a middle-class tax cut, I think he needs to go back to math class," she said.

On health care, Gerlach called for giving small-business owners more opportunity to purchase health coverage through a national cooperative and said he supports medical-liability reform to help cut medical costs. Murphy said she supported allowing Medicare to negotiate for lower drug prices.

GOP Candidate Seeking Bush's Home District Is Hurting (SA)

By Guillermo X. Garcia

San Antonio Express News, October 22, 2006

WACO — On paper, young and oil-wealthy Van Taylor, a Harvard University graduate who enlisted in the Marines and saw combat in Iraq, seems like the perfect Republican candidate for Congress.

A staunch conservative, he is independently wealthy, thanks to his family's involvement in Humble Oil Co. Taylor, 34, is worth more than $27 million, mostly from the Exxon-Mobil Corp. and pharmaceutical industry stock he owns.

When the campaign for Texas' 17th Congressional District began, Republicans hoped a decorated combat veteran would be able to do what redistricting failed to do in 2004: end the embarrassment of having a Democrat representing President Bush — his Crawford ranch is in the district — by knocking off entrenched incumbent Chet Edwards, the hometown congressman since 1991.

"It is an embarrassment," said M.A. Taylor, McClennan County GOP chairman, who's not related to the candidate. "This area overwhelmingly supports the president and is overwhelmingly Republican, and yet we have a congressman from the opposition who supposedly represents our interests.

"It is nothing short of personally humiliating."

But hopes of ending that embarrassment may be waning.

Last week, the National Republican Campaign Committee cancelled $1.5 million in television ads it had planned to run starting this week.

Republican officials "pulled the plug, and that's devastating for the Taylor campaign," said Edwards' spokeswoman Jessica Shaefer. "And the fact that their decision came just days after they ran a poll indicates that they clearly saw what our poll shows, a 21-point lead among likely voters."

A growing number of signs nationally suggest a Democratic wave may be in the offing Nov. 7. And while that wave may not have a dramatic effect in Texas, where the GOP has re-drawn districts to its advantage, it's likely to be strong enough to keep Edwards in Congress.

So while the president remains popular in his home state, one of the most dramatic demonstrations of his declining influence may unfold in the congressional district where he votes.

All along, Taylor's challenge of an entrenched "blue-dog Democrat" was viewed as a test of Bush's coattails. National Republican officials said it was a "high-level test," calling it the nation's most Republican congressional district not represented by the GOP.

Taylor says the president and first lady Laura Bush have personally promised they'll vote for him. That appears to be the extent of White House involvement in the race.

Supports the war

Ironically, an Edwards victory would not look like wins by Democrats elsewhere.

Nationally, Democrats are critical of Bush's prosecution of the Iraq war while Republicans lambaste what they call Democrats' "cut-and-run" strategy.

But here, in the literal heart of Texas, the dynamic runs counter to that: Edwards won't run against the president's record. Both candidates support the war and oppose pulling troops out of Iraq.

The 17th is a military-rich district, home to tens of thousands of retired soldiers and a Veterans Affairs hospital that last year treated some 17,000 veterans. In his 16 years in Congress, Edwards has a strong record of backing issues involving veterans.

"This is a red-state district, a God-and-country sort of place, and military issues play big here," said Ashely Cruise Turner, a history professor at McClennan Community College.

While Democrats nationally roast Bush, Edwards carefully walks a centrist line, refusing to attack his policies.

"If I believe the president's proposals are right for the district and for the country, then I work with him," he said.

It is a plan that his constituents apparently approve.

In 2004, Bush won almost seven of every 10 votes in the district. Edwards won every precinct in the county, including Crawford. Edwards notes that 50,000 voters in the Waco area who voted for the president crossed political lines to vote for him.

Taylor, meanwhile, launched a series of blistering attack ads portraying illegal immigration from Mexico as a major problem and faulting Edwards for votes he has cast on social issues that Taylor said make him too liberal for the district.

Like most political newcomers, Taylor's problem is getting his name before the voters.

Still, his military record is featured prominently in his campaign.

He saw combat during two tours as a captain with the 4th Marines, 3rd Recon Battalion, and he comes from a line of soldiers who saw action in the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, both world wars, Korea and Vietnam.

In an apparent effort to counter, Edwards received endorsements from a host of retired military brass: one four-star general and three three-star generals, including two who commanded at Fort Hood.

"I voted for Bush twice, I voted for his daddy, and while I probably vote Republican more than Democrat, I am voting for Chet," said retired Lt. Gen. Randy House from his ranch outside College Station. "It is important that people realize what Congressman Edwards has done for the military and their families at a time when his opponent is touting his military service," said House, former commanding general of the Big Red One, the legendary 1st Infantry Division.

In the crosshairs

Despite being in GOP crosshairs for years, Edwards has represented the 17th Congressional District for eight two-year terms.

He was one of six Democrats targeted for extinction via redistricting by the Republican-controlled Texas Legislature in 2003, and the only one to survive in a competitive district. At the top of the hit list, along with Martin Frost of Dallas and Lloyd Doggett of Austin, the conservative Edwards had his district redrawn. In the process, he lost a power base — Fort Hood.

In 2004, he withstood the redrawing of his district and a strong challenge from former state Rep. Arlene Wohlgemuth.

Taylor moved last summer to rural McClennan County, the largest of the 12 counties in the district, which stretches from the Dallas-Fort Worth suburbs south to Waco and east to College Station. It is a solidly conservative, mostly rural stretch of North-Central Texas that now is nearly 65 percent Republican.

That had national GOP leaders salivating at the chance to take Edwards out, at least until last week.

Taylor's campaign would not confirm the cancelled ad buys in the Dallas area.

But Democrats say the president's lack of involvement, coupled with the small party contribution to Taylor's campaign, is a sign the GOP does not believe Edwards is beatable.

Republican officials shrug that off.

"A decorated military veteran like Van Taylor means the war will play a larger role than any other race in the country. In that district, there is no better candidate," said Jonathan Collegio, an RNCC Washington spokesman.

McClennan GOP chairman Taylor assessed candidate Taylor's chance of victory as "even money."

Taylor, however, was left on his own. So far he has pumped $575,000 of his own money, including a $250,000 loan, into the campaign, according to Federal Election Commission records.

"The Republicans in D.C. made a fundamental miscalculation," said Matt Engle, a Democratic strategist who was Frost's longtime chief of staff.

The GOP, he said, "thought using Taylor's military record and his lack of (political) baggage would be a good wedge to hit Edwards with. But without national Republican money and Bush not getting involved, Taylor is in the ditch."

A Jeopardy Question For The Nov. 7 Crowd (NYT)

By Mark Leibovich

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

Washington

POLITICAL reporters love asking hypothetical questions, almost as much as politicians hate answering them.

But it has become a settled expectation of political life that any candidate who supported the Iraq war resolution in 2002 must now answer the dreaded, “If you knew then what you know now” question.

DOJ_NMG_0084746

That is, of course, some variant on the "If you knew then that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, would you still have authorized President Bush to use force in Iraq?"

The question has inspired some great rhetorical gymnastics. It has also sparked impressive finesse jobs across the political spectrum.

In one sparkling turn last week, Senator Rick Santorum, Republican of Pennsylvania, said that he would rather be fighting terrorists in Iraq than in the United States. Only he put it this way: "As the hobbits are going up Mount Doom, the Eye of Mordor is being drawn somewhere else. It's being drawn to Iraq."

As is clear to fans of J. R. R. Tolkien, Mr. Santorum was comparing the rationale for combat in Iraq to the plan to distract the evil Lord Sauron in "The Lord of the Rings." Sauron was seeking the magical ring that would secure his power over Middle Earth. (Mr. Santorum merely wants to secure his Senate seat.)

At the very least, give Mr. Santorum points for appealing to an untapped constituency of potential supporters, "Lord of the Rings" lovers, a few of whom might even be old enough to vote.

Otherwise, the variety of responses to the "If you knew then what you know now?" question can be distilled into a few predictable categories. Herein, a primer:

The 'No, but' Response

This is by far the most common refrain among Democrats who supported the use-of-force resolution but who now wish they hadn't. The optimal answer should include a quick "no," followed by a swift indictment of the Bush administration's incompetence, dishonesty, stubbornness or some such unpleasant thing. And it never hurts to tack on an homage to the troops.

Representative Harold E. Ford Jr., a Democrat of Tennessee who is running for Senate, achieved this in three tidy sentences. "Had I known then what I know now, I would have voted no," Mr. Ford told The Memphis Commercial Appeal last week. "The president and his team have pursued a flawed strategy. Thankfully, America has the best and the bravest war fighters in the world."

Second-Guessing Is for Weenies

Early supporters of the war — particularly Republicans — often dispatch with the question in favor of a general lament about typical Washington nay-saying, second-guessing and defeatism (as practiced by "Defeatocrats"). The implication is that criticizing the administration's Iraq policy is tantamount to whining, not to mention emblematic of all that is wrong with the hideous swamp they've all chosen to live and work in (or want to live and work in).

While systematically criticizing the administration's Iraq policy, the Senate candidate Claire McCaskill, Democrat of Missouri, has nonetheless voiced an aversion to "Monday morning quarterbacking." Senator George Allen, Republican of Virginia and a prodigious practitioner of the football analogy, is also fond of the phrase.

"You can all second-guess and Monday morning quarterback," Mr. Allen said in a debate in July against his Democratic opponent, Jim Webb.

"We made decisions," Mr. Allen added on "Meet the Press" on NBC. "You can't say, 'Gosh,' five years later."

But of course, Mr. Webb is saying a lot of "Gosh."

"And this is what my opponent's campaign's about," Mr. Allen said, "is the second-guessing."

Sorry, Folks

Increasingly popular among Democrats, the tool has been wielded deftly by the Democratic ticket of 2004, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts and former Senator John Edwards, of North Carolina. The runners-up have thrown themselves into a virtual mea-culpa-palooza in recent months.

"It is essential to acknowledge that the war itself was a mistake, to say the simple words that contain more truth than pride," Mr. Kerry said in a speech to liberal activists in June. "It was wrong and I was wrong to vote for that Iraqi war resolution."

Mr. Edwards, the earnest former running mate, has been impressively prolific in his use of the "M-word."

"It was a mistake to vote for the war in 2002," Mr. Edwards wrote for the Washington Post op-ed page last November. "I take responsibility for that mistake." He concluded that "America's leaders — all of us — need to accept the responsibility we each carry for how we got to this place."

Incidentally there are wild rumors flying around that these guys might be running for president again.

C'mon, Everybody's Doing It

Also known as the "Hey, We All Saw the Same Intelligence" defense, candidates who supported the war (usually Republicans) are fond of cataloging all the others (usually Democrats) who supported it, too, based on the same intelligence. Extra credit for Republicans who drop Bill Clinton's name.

"Look, Chris Dodd, Joe Lieberman and I voted to go to war," Representative Christopher Shays, Republican of Connecticut, told The Hartford Courant. "I consulted with a lot of people, including Bill Clinton."

It never hurts to throw in a few foreign countries, too. "Every intelligence agency in the world, including the Russians, including the French, including the Israelis, had reached the same conclusion," Senator John McCain, Republican of Arizona, said on "Face the Nation" on CBS.

Hypothetical Meets Hypothetical

Instead of admitting he would have voted differently, the candidate maintains that there would not have even been a vote in light of "what we know now."

In other words, the hypothetical question has been rendered moot by hypothetical non-events.

When asked on "Meet the Press" if he regretted his vote, Senator Mike DeWine, Republican of Ohio, said, "It would never have been presented by the president," the "it" referring to the use-of-force resolution.

In a corollary strategy, the candidate does not answer the question directly, but instead channels the view of a singular "They," or whatever it is "The American People" supposedly believe.

"Based upon the information that we have now," said the Pennsylvania Democrat Bob Casey, Mr. Santorum's opponent, "I think a lot of Americans would have serious doubts."

The 'Only Authorization' Vote

Democrats who supported the Iraq resolution in 2002 are often quick to point out that they didn't actually vote for the war. Rather, they only voted to give the president the option to go to war, and they never expected him to rush to war as he did.

"In retrospect, it's clear to me they had no intention of doing anything other than going to war in Iraq," said Senator Joseph R. Biden Jr., Democrat of Delaware, told The Manchester Union Leader.

And, of course, Mr. Biden and others who supported the Iraq resolution had also assumed that President Bush had a plan for "winning the peace."

"We know now that they had no plan for winning the peace," said Harry Reid, the Democrats' leader in the Senate, in a news conference. "But we didn't know it at the time."

Remember, Saddam Was Evil

Perhaps the most popular rationale among candidates who supported the Iraq resolution is that the current predicament is still better than having Saddam Hussein in charge. It also carries the implicit message that anyone who opposes the war believes the world is not better off without Mr. Hussein in charge.

"His regime was an organic threat to world peace," Senator Jim Talent, Republican of Missouri, told The Associated Press. "He had twice invaded his neighbors and violated the commitments he made after Desert Storm. He harbored and trained terrorists and was a tyrant who wanted weapons of mass destruction and was obstructing the war on terror."

Mr. Talent did not specify whether the world is any better off without Lord Sauron.

Times Endorses Spitzer And Other Democrats For Election (NYT)

By Nicholas Confessore

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

The editorial board of The New York Times today endorsed Democrat Eliot Spitzer, the current attorney general, for governor.

The board also endorsed Andrew M. Cuomo in his bid to become the next attorney general of New York, nearly two months after endorsing one of his opponents during the Democratic primary, which Mr. Cuomo later won.

In its endorsement of Mr. Spitzer over his Republican opponent, former state assemblyman John Faso, the board said Mr. Spitzer "has been fearless and dogged in his pursuit of justice. We are eager to see what happens when he applies those attributes to Albany's immobile Legislature, which has a long, sad history in wearing would-be reformers down, waiting them out."

The board's endorsement of Mr. Cuomo was lukewarm, reflecting many of the same reservations it cited in declining to endorse Mr. Cuomo during the primary campaign, when the endorsement went to Mark Green, the former New York City public advocate.

The general election campaign, the editorial says, "has come down to a riveting if uninspiring brawl between two flawed candidates" — Mr. Cuomo and Jeanine F. Pirro, the Republican and a former district attorney of Westchester County — who each "seem an uncomfortable fit for the state's top law enforcement job."

Ms. Pirro's campaign has been dogged by her husband's conviction for tax fraud and more recent revelations that she is under federal investigation over whether she tried to illegally wiretap her husband's conversations. But the editorial says that Mr. Cuomo's record as housing secretary under President Bill Clinton "is not very reassuring, either."

The editorial says Mr. Cuomo spent "too much time on public relations" while secretary to bolster his political ambitions. But Mr. Cuomo's managerial experience, and the understanding of state government he accrued while working for his father, former Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, were reason enough to endorse him over Mr. Pirro, the editorial says.

The editorial board today also endorsed a string of congressional candidates, all of them Democrats challenging Republican incumbents.

In New York's 19th Congressional District, the board endorsed the Democratic candidate John Hall over the incumbent, Republican Sue W. Kelly. It also endorsed Linda Stender over Representative Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's Seventh Congressional District, Chris Murphy over Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut's Fifth Congressional District, and Joseph Courtney over Representative Rob Simmons in the state's Second Congressional District.

In New York's Third Congressional District, the editorial board endorsed David Mejias, a Democratic member of the Nassau County Legislature, against Republican incumbent Peter T. King, who this summer said the decision of The New York Times to publish articles about a secret terrorist-surveillance program was "treasonous."

"We do not support Mr. King, but not because he wants us in jail," the editorial states. "Our decision has to do with temperament, effectiveness and differences on issues ranging from taxes and Iraq to abortion and immigration."

Schwarzenegger Ramps Up Pressure Over Orange County Mailing (LAT)

By Scott Martelle And Susannah Rosenblatt

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

He says GOP candidate Nguyen should quit House race if he knew of his office's threatening letter to immigrants.

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger stepped up the pressure Saturday on an Orange County Republican congressional candidate, telling reporters that Tan Nguyen should withdraw if he knew about his campaign's mailing of letters intended to threaten immigrant voters.

Schwarzenegger denounced the mailings traced to Nguyen's campaign to unseat Democratic incumbent Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District and said that "anyone that knew … has to resign immediately."

Speaking during a campaign appearance in Santa Ana, the governor said the mailings "were illegal; it's a hate crime…. There should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior."

Democratic gubernatorial challenger Phil Angelides had earlier denounced Nguyen's campaign, which sent mailers to 14,000 registered voters. Written in Spanish, they warned that immigrants who cast a ballot could face jail time or deportation.

Nguyen, himself a Vietnamese immigrant, said Thursday that he had fired his campaign office manager because of the letter but that he had no prior knowledge of it. However, the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party has said that he was told by the mailing company that sent the letter that Nguyen was personally involved.

The Nguyen controversy — and key Republicans' quick action to distance the party from the mailings — pointed to a sharp contrast between the two major parties' approaches to the elections, just over two weeks away. As the Democrats seek to promote themselves as a unified slate, the Republicans are largely running as individuals.

Schwarzenegger made two Orange County campaign stops Saturday unaccompanied by other Republican candidates for statewide office, while the Democratic statewide candidates crisscrossed Southern California and stressed the need for unity.

Angelides began his day at a UC Berkeley football game tailgate party, then traveled to three Los Angeles-area labor rallies, which also drew such statewide Democratic candidates as John Garamendi, running for lieutenant governor; Cruz Bustamante, running for insurance commissioner; John Chiang, running for controller; and Debra Bowen, running for secretary of state; and local candidates.

"No matter where you go in this state, you see Democrats campaigning together," Angelides told about 200 supporters during an afternoon barbecue at a Gardena union hall. "These Republicans this year — in the year of George Bush's Republican Congress — they're all treating each other like they got the bird flu."

Despite Saturday's show of solidarity, the Democrats have their own fissures. Ray Cordova, chairman of the South Bay County Labor Council, told the Gardena crowd that he was "sick and tired" of seeing Senate President Don Perata and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez "ride around the state" with Schwarzenegger rallying votes for Propositions 1A through 1E, which would spend $37 billion on state construction projects.

Schwarzenegger and the legislative leaders worked together to get the measures on the ballot and have since campaigned for them together.

But the theme of the day was unity, and the need to propel California voters to the polls by building on what recent surveys have shown could be a nationwide Democratic surge on election day. Angelides for the last two days has cited polls that he says have shown his campaign rallying from 17 to 7 points behind — though the polls were, in fact, sponsored by different polling organizations and do not necessarily demonstrate a trend.

"We are rocking and rolling," Angelides said in Gardena. "Those guys are slipping and sliding."

Schwarzenegger's campaign day was more low key. In Santa Ana, he admired cowboy apparel and browsed ranchera albums on 4th Street, chatting with store owners and pausing for photos, handshakes and autographs before a private meeting with the Hispanic 100 civic group, which has endorsed him.

Speaking to reporters, Schwarzenegger reiterated his support for immigration reform, advocating a guest worker program and, under specific conditions, driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

"Right now we have this policy where everyone looks the other way and everyone does things illegally," he said. "This is not the right way to go."

He moved on to Cook's Corner, a biker roadhouse in Trabuco Canyon, arriving on his maroon Indian Chief motorcycle. Nearly a thousand Harley-Davidsons and other choppers gleamed in the sun as part of the "California Dream Ride" to raise money for an organization that supports military families.

"I could have gone anywhere else in the world; I would not have remotely achieved the things that I have achieved, and it is all because of California," Schwarzenegger told the crowd.

No More Immigrant-Bashing In The O.C. (LAT)

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Republicans rightfully denounced a candidate who sent an intimidating letter to Latino voters, saving face in a district they were bound to lose anyway.

THE DESPICABLE INCIDENT was, sad to say, not new to Orange County: Republicans trying to scare immigrants away from the polls. But the GOP's reaction this time — calling on its candidate to withdraw — was miles away from previous behavior. Nativist immigrant bashing may be alive in the O.C., but it's not well.

To be sure, the party's reaction to its candidate for the 47th Congressional District was a no-brainer. Tan Nguyen — himself an immigrant who seems to have forgotten the virulent racism that greeted many Vietnamese refugees when they arrived in Orange County — never had much of a chance against incumbent Democrat Loretta Sanchez. That alone is an extraordinary change for a seat that used to be solidly Republican. Nguyen had received little GOP backing from the start, so there was no loss in cutting him loose and plenty to gain in good PR.

If the county GOP wanted to come completely clean, it would apologize for its unconscionable actions in a 1988 state Assembly election, when it hired uniformed poll guards to carry signs in Latino neighborhoods stating "Noncitizens Can't Vote." That was thuggish and intimidating, but at least it was accurate.

The Spanish-language letter that Nguyen's campaign sent last week to 14,000 registered Latino voters in Anaheim, Garden Grove and Santa Ana was incorrect, as well as threatening and not a little un-American. It claimed immigrants cannot vote (which would bar Nguyen himself from the polls) and ominously invoked the threat of jail time, deportation and Big Brother computer systems that would track down any would-be voters. It then announced that unlike in Mexico (the country Nguyen's campaign apparently assumes all Latinos are from), there is "no incentive" in the United States to vote. Guess democracy isn't a good enough reason.

It's possible that if this race were as near and dear to Republican strategy as the 1988 campaign, the GOP would make lighter of the deed. But there's a better chance modern-day Republicans would distance themselves from the odious stunt. The GOP has learned, through a series of political gaffes and electoral defeats, that Latinos are a potent constituency in this country who have not seen the Republican Party as their ally.

Call it enlightened self-interest on the GOP's part; it's still good to see Latino-targeted Jim Crow election chicanery getting the thrashing it deserves behind the Orange Curtain.

Ehrlich Woos Anti-O'Malley Democrats (WT)

By Jon Ward

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

BALTIMORE -- Maryland Gov. Robert L. Ehrlich Jr. yesterday rallied in Baltimore County with Democratic lawmakers and officials who endorse the Republican's re-election bid, as Democratic leaders urged voters in the city to defeat the governor even if they "don't care for" the party's candidate to replace him.

"I have represented majority-Democratic districts for all of my entire career," Mr. Ehrlich said, standing on a truck bed in a Dundalk parking lot before about 100 supporters.

"Many, many Democrats are stepping up ... not leaving their party, just voting for the person they believe will lead the state," the governor and former congressman from Baltimore County said.

An hour earlier, in the city's Remington area, black Democratic leaders attacked Mr. Ehrlich while denigrating his Democratic challenger, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley.

"Having spent four years in Annapolis with Governor Ehrlich, the boy's gotta go," state Sen. Lisa A. Gladden, Baltimore Democrat, told the crowd of about 100 at a meeting called to organize volunteers to go door to door with information on voters' rights.

Mrs. Gladden said she supports Mr. O'Malley's bid for governor only because it would help his fellow Democrats regain power.

"I have never voted for Martin O'Malley, never in my life, because I don't care for him," she said. "But you know what, I'm wearing his shirt, got his sign on the lawn, and quite frankly, I hope to God and I pray every day that O'Malley becomes our next governor."

Democrats control the Maryland legislature, and Mr. Ehrlich, who faces voters again two weeks from Tuesday, won election four years ago as the first Republican governor in more than 30 years.

Cheryl D. Glenn and Shawn Tarrant -- Democrats who won primary races for state delegate and are likely to be elected Nov. 7 -- also urged the crowd to vote for Mr. O'Malley, despite objections or reservations about his record in Baltimore.

"I know politics better than you do. Support O'Malley," Mrs. Glenn, a candidate in District 45, told the audience packed into a storefront room.

Mr. Tarrant, a community activist and regional manager for a pharmaceutical company, instructed the crowd not to "focus on the man," meaning Mr. O'Malley.

"Focus on the seat," said Mr. Tarrant, who likely will represent District 40. "We need the right Democrat in the seat. He can make the right selections."

Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, Baltimore Democrat, organized the voter-education drive because, he said, many voters are confused and discouraged by officials' concerns about organization and security for the election.

Mr. Ehrlich echoed those concerns yesterday during a radio interview, predicting "a lot of challenges" and "a lot of lawyers" after the election.

The governor again will have to win over Democratic and independent voters in Maryland, where Democrats outnumber Republicans 2 to 1 and where blacks made up about 40 percent of Democratic voters in the primary.

The Ehrlich campaign released a list of 26 Democratic supporters, most of them former officeholders and some of whom previously had endorsed his re-election. Most of the Democrats for Mr. Ehrlich endorsed him four years ago.

"I am a Democrat, and I support the whole Democratic team except for one individual ... that guy they call mayor," Baltimore City Council member Nicholas D'Adamo Jr. said. "Are the streets in better shape? Is the murder rate better? Is education any better?"

The crowd that heard Mr. Ehrlich in Dundalk was made up mostly of older, white voters. The crowd at the anti-Ehrlich rally in the city was mostly black voters.

Mr. Ehrlich, who said polls show he is doing well among black voters, cited his support for Coppin State University, a predominantly black college in Baltimore.

Calvin Burnett, the former president of Coppin whom Mr. Ehrlich appointed as education secretary in 2004, stood with the governor at the rally.

O'Malley spokesman Rick Abbruzzese predicted that Mr. Ehrlich will not attract enough Democrats.

"Democrats believe that government can work to improve the quality of life for all people, which does not mean siding with special corporate interests over working families, as Governor Ehrlich has done time and again," he said.

Mr. O'Malley leads Mr. Ehrlich in almost every poll in the race by an average of about seven points.

Kinky Friedman A 'Lone Ranger' On Trail (AP-)

By Pauline Arrillaga

AP, October 22, 2006

Richard Kinky Friedman is standing, sans cowboy boots, in his suite at the Hilton as a third day of election stumping ends, remote control in hand and Fox News on the tube. His campaign manager, heavy-lidded as the clock nears midnight, is doing his sleep-deprived best to reassure Texas' most unlikely gubernatorial candidate that he might just win.

"We could still lose," Dean Barkley tells The Kinkster. "But we're not gonna."

Friedman frets on. "It's possible that I'm a little pop star, everybody just wants a picture."

Eyes roll, and Barkley retorts: "I'll get you a little security blanket."

DOJ_NMG_0084751

Friedman's attention returns to Fox. A segment about the race is on, and Friedman's delivering one of his oft-recycled cracks about the definition of politics — "Poly means more than one, and ticks are bloodsucking parasites." (The line was originated by "some guy in Corpus," explains Friedman, king of the one-liners. "It's not that great.")

Now Gov. Rick Perry, the man whose job Friedman fancies, appears on screen delivering a crack of his own. "He's not running for class clown. He's running for the governor of a very important state."

Barkley chuckles, but the barefoot clown gripping the remote isn't smiling — for once in his rather hysterical life.

Day 1. San Antonio. A question: Who is Kinky Friedman?

"He's a trip," says Ron, the driver of a Dollar Rent A Car shuttle. "Some people say he's a racist, but he's just being himself. That's what I think. I like his style — a `Lone Ranger' type. They do their own thing. I like that."

An hour later, Friedman — the songwriter, satirist, mystery novelist and now independent political candidate — is with Jesse Ventura and a gaggle of reporters at the University of Texas at San Antonio, starting a college campus swing with the former pro wrestler and governor of Minnesota.

Ventura, taking a break from surfing in Baja, Mexico, and sporting a very surfer-like braided goatee, is offering some unsolicited advice about curtailing the sharp sense of humor that Friedman built a career on and molded him into The Kinkster.

"You have to learn that political correctness unfortunately rules in the public sector," Ventura tells him.

Friedman, in his signature black hat and boots, signature cigar in hand, is firmly resisting.

"Political correctness is a real devil," he says. "It insinuates into our lives more than we think."

With that, Friedman rams the cigar in his mouth and gives "The Body," as Ventura used to be called, a friendly pat on the back.

Quintessential Kinky. Being himself. Doing his own thing. Sort of like ... a Lone Ranger. Just like Ron said. Ron, a black man with two diamond studs in one ear, big sunglasses and a bigger smile, who supported Perry in 2002. Ron, who has never in his life met Friedman, who when asked if he might vote for him smiled even bigger and said, "Nah."

Ron, who nevertheless gets The Kinkster — who's not all that easy to get.

What Kinky Friedman is: Hilarious. Crude. Biting. Unapologetic. Blunt.

What he also is: Intellectual. Sensitive. Giving. Philosophical. Loyal.

What he really is when you add it all up: Unconventional at every turn.

So why would someone like this want a job as conventional as governor? One response is now a popular Friedman bumper sticker: "Why the hell not?" The real answer's more complex, kind of like the man himself.

Friedman's books — from essay collections such as "'Scuse Me While I Whip This Out: Reflections on Country Singers, Presidents, and Other Troublemakers" to his mystery novels in which real-life rebels Willie Nelson and Hank Williams are characters — reveal someone who reveres the outlaw. That is, anyone with the cojones to thumb his or her nose at the system.

Perhaps, in part, that's because Friedman grew up on the outside — a Jew raised by socially conscious, freethinking parents in Christian-conservative, 1950s-traditional Texas.

He played chess, studied the classics at the University of Texas (where a friend bestowed upon him the nickname that stuck, reflecting Friedman's obsession with taming his untamable, kinky hair), and spent summers at the rural camp his parents started for children.

His mother, Minnie, was a public school speech therapist, once named "Outstanding Texas Citizen" by an exchange-clubs organization. His father, Tom, flew an Air Force bomber during World War II and later was a psychology professor.

Father Friedman liked to say, "Leave the world a better place than you found it," and his three children took that to heart. Daughter Marcie went to work for the American Red Cross, and son Roger eventually took over the kids' camp.

Kinky, the eldest, simply put his own twist on the mantra.

After a short stint with the Peace Corps in Borneo, he returned to the States with some songs in his pocket and an idea in his head.

The result was career No. 1 as leader of the band, "Kinky Friedman and the Texas Jewboys." He penned songs that at times drew more boos than cheers, satirical ditties about the issues of the day: racism, feminism, even the 1966 massacre at UT when student Charles Whitman climbed an observation tower and fatally shot 16 people.

One of Friedman's better-known songs, "They Ain't Makin' Jews Like Jesus Anymore," includes the n-word and a slew of other racially offensive terms but is a tune about one guy confronting another over his racist remarks.

"We had something to offend everybody," Friedman says. "That was the idea — to puncture this pompous, morality kind of a thing."

DOJ_NMG_0084752

"We've always made fun, but underneath all of that it's about intellectualizing things and making people think," says original "Texas Jewboy" Jeff "Little Jewford" Shelby. Shelby, who met Friedman as a kid at the summer camp, is now chief of staff of the gubernatorial campaign (and also Friedman's announcer at each campaign stop.)

"We like pushing the envelope," Shelby says, "but it's not just for the sake of pushing it."

When the musical career floundered, Friedman managed to make a name for himself in career No. 2 — as a mystery writer and, later, a columnist at Texas Monthly magazine. The latter, in particular, gave him a new platform for skewering or championing whatever, or whomever, he wanted.

Cigar-smokers: championed. Hunters: skewered. Bob Dylan: championed. Dell, Starbucks, the strip-mall sameness of America: skewered.

The governor's thing, as the Friedman gang calls it, is not only a stab at career No. 3, it is yet another stage from which The Kinkster can take on the untouchable. The two-party system. The — his words now — "rusty cage of bureaucracy and corruption" that is democracy in the 21st century. The "wussification" of politics, and of Texas.

"I love Texas," says Friedman. "I don't like what's happened to her. I don't like being last in all the good things and first in all the bad. The very least we can do is bring truth to the people. We're already bringing hope. The truth? Well, that's a little harder."

Day 2. On the road from San Antonio to Houston. A thought: How does political incorrectness play in politics?

"Please welcome the man who's breathing life into Texas independence, the next governor of the great state of Texas ... Kinky Friedmaaaaaaaaaaan!"

The man with the cigar takes the podium at Trinity University in San Antonio, firing off warm-up lines like a Texafied Jerry Seinfeld.

"I was showing my old friend around Austin recently. He said, `Boy, that's a beautiful statue of Rick Perry.' And I said, `That IS Rick Perry.'"

Applause. Laughs.

The jokes are expected; they vary little from stop to stop. What's not is how seriously some Texans are taking the guy who delivers them.

Taylor Collier is 18, a freshman with shaggy hair and ear buds around his neck, clad in a T-shirt that reads, "TELL THE TRUTH." He's outside the auditorium at Trinity, reciting a story about the time Perry showed up at an event Collier attended a while back.

"I couldn't even get up to him. I couldn't even talk to him. You know? But Kinky walks in here and I walk up to him just like, `How you doing? Nice to meet you.' You know? To me, Kinky strikes me as more of a Texan."

Needless to say, Collier's first vote in his first gubernatorial election is going to The Kinkster.

So is that of 49-year-old Elva Romero, who works at a convenience store at Texas State University in San Marcos.

"I'm for him," she says, "because I'm outspoken myself. Whatever comes to my mind is gonna come out, and that's it. If it's gonna hurt other people, well sorry. He's unique. He's different, and I think he can make a change ..."

A Republican calling a Houston radio show apparently thinks so, too. Host Dan Patrick is musing over the Friedman phenomenon. Friedman is fourth among the four major gubernatorial candidates in money and support, and he's polling at about 14 percent. But that's almost equal with the Republican Perry's Democratic challenger, Chris Bell.

"The public was really waiting for someone like him," Patrick surmises.

"I agree," says the caller, who's especially fond of Friedman's pitch for more National Guard troops on the Texas border.

When Friedman launched his campaign last year in front of the Alamo, calling for the "unconditional surrender" of Perry with a country swing band by his side, he was far more Jon Stewart than John Kennedy. Then he hired on Barkley, who directed Ventura's successful campaign and later replaced the late Paul Wellstone in the U.S. Senate.

Friedman's 60-40 ratio of style-to-substance is now 40-60, says Barkley. The joke-laden speeches are sprinkled with Friedman's stance on legalizing casino gambling to help pay for education, decriminalizing marijuana to free up prison space, developing a taxpayer ID card for illegal immigrants to work.

"We've packaged things a little differently," says Barkley. "But him telling what he really believes? No, that hasn't changed."

No matter the consequences.

The Texas NAACP asked Friedman to apologize after he remarked that "crackheads and thugs have decided they want to stay in Houston" in a speech lambasting rising crime that police in the city attribute to Hurricane Katrina evacuees. Friedman refused, responding: "I am not a racist, I am a realist."

The group excluded Friedman from speaking at its convention this month, while inviting Perry, Bell and independent Carole Keeton Strayhorn.

Then a television interview resurfaced in which Friedman was asked what to do about sexual predators, and he said, "Throw them in prison and throw away the key and make them listen to a Negro talking to himself."

His political opponents jumped on the anti-Friedman bandwagon, also calling for an apology — exactly the kind of politics-as-usual stuff that gets Friedman, and his longtime friends, fired up.

"I definitely know he's not a racist, because I know Kinky," says Ada Beverly, the 77-year-old daughter of Friedman's childhood caretaker, a black woman named Lottie Cotton, whom Friedman adored. "Kinky is just a wonderful, folk-loving person. He's not gonna whup it around and pretend he's one thing if he's another.

"But once you get Kinky into your heart," Beverly says, "you have a most lovable person."

Day 3. Texas A&M University, Perry's alma mater. A revelation: There really is another side to Kinky Friedman.

It's the last stop of a long day, and 61-year-old Friedman is exhausted. He's munching on peanut butter crackers, having gone without nourishment for 10 hours. But the line for autographs stretches on, and Friedman won't leave until the last picture is snapped and T-shirt is signed (or cell phone, or empty Marlboro pack).

"He doesn't want to disappoint anybody," Sandy Wolfmueller later explains. She's known Friedman for 30 years, owns a bookstore where he does signing events. She recalls a time when the two of them had some falling out. Then her son died of a degenerative brain disease. "Don't ask me how he found out," she says, "but Kinky was one of the first to call."

Another fan: "He's got the biggest heart. All he does is save people and animals." That's Nancy Parker-Simons, who was tapped by Friedman to run an animal rescue ranch adjacent to his parents' summer camp outside of Kerrville. Friedman's own five dogs are watched over while he's on the road by a Katrina evacuee Friedman's putting up at his house.

Parker-Simons admits emitting a snicker or two when Friedman first broached the subject of running for governor.

Now she realizes, "He really is serious about it." Besides, "Texans would love it. We like to brag and all of that. And, boy, we would have a blast with him!"

It's at the Hilton, at the end of Day 3, with Fox News on the tube and the unsmiling clown staring at the set, that the punch line finally becomes clear: The funnyman's run for governor ain't no joke. Neither is Richard Kinky Friedman.

Edwards Takes Heat Over Quotations About Hillary (WP)

By Zachary A. Goldfarb

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Comments attributed last week to the wife of former North Carolina senator John Edwards (D) provided a faint foreshadowing of the intraparty battle that could arise when Democrats choose their presidential nominee in two years.

Elizabeth Edwards said last Thursday that her life has been a happier one than that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), according to the magazine Ladies' Home Journal. Both Clinton and John Edwards, the Democrats' 2004 vice presidential nominee, are prospective 2008 candidates for the presidency.

Clinton "and I are from the same generation," Elizabeth Edwards said at a luncheon sponsored by the magazine. "We both went to law school and married other lawyers, but after that we made other choices. I think my choices have made me happier. I think I'm more joyful than she is." Ladies' Home Journal provided a transcript of the luncheon comments to the Associated Press.

On Friday, Edwards released a statement accusing the magazine of misquoting and misrepresenting her. "This is particularly true with respect to my comments about Sen. Clinton, who holds a serious and demanding public office while I am largely home, joyfully I must admit, with two lovely children," Edwards said in the statement.

Ladies' Home Journal said the quotes were accurate.

Edwards called the former first lady on Friday to apologize, a Clinton aide told the AP.

"They had a good conversation," Howard Wolfson said. "The senator thanked her for the call and wished her well on her book tour."

Edwards is promoting a memoir, "Saving Graces," that examines her experience with breast cancer.

Obama Is Not A Miracle Elixir (NYT)

By Frank Rich

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

THE Democrats are so brilliant at yanking defeat from the jaws of victory that it still seems unimaginable that they might win on Nov. 7. But even the most congenital skeptic has to face that possibility now. Things have gotten so bad for the Republicans that were President Bush to unveil Osama bin Laden's corpse in the Rose Garden, some reporter would instantly check to see if his last meal had been on Jack Abramoff's tab.

DOJ_NMG_0084754

With an approval rating of 16 percent — 16! — in the new NBC News/Wall Street Journal poll, Congress has matched the Democrats of 1994 or, for that matter, Michael Jackson during his own version of Foleygate. As for Mr. Bush, he is once more hiding behind children in an elementary school, as he did last week when the monthly death toll for Americans in Iraq approached a nearly two-year high. And where else could he go? Some top Republican Congressional candidates in the red state he was visiting, North Carolina, would not appear with him. When the president did find a grateful campaign mate at his next stop, Pennsylvania, it was the married congressman who paid $5.5 million to settle a lawsuit by a mistress who accused him of throttling her.

Maybe the Democrats can blow 2006 as they did 2004, but not without herculean effort. As George Will memorably wrote, if they can't at least win back the House under these conditions, "they should go into another line of work."

The tough question is not whether the Democrats can win, but what will happen if they do win. The party's message in this campaign has offered no vision beyond bashing Mr. Bush and pledging to revisit the scandals and the disastrous legislation that went down on his watch. Last spring Nancy Pelosi did promote a "New Direction for America" full of golden oldies — raising the minimum wage, enacting lobbying reform, cutting Medicare drug costs, etc. She promised that Democrats would "own August" by staging 250 campaign events to publicize it. But this rollout caused so few ripples that its participants might as well have been in the witness protection program. Meanwhile, it was up to John Murtha, a congressman with no presidential ambitions, to goad his peers to start focusing on a specific Iraq exit strategy.

Enter Barack Obama. To understand the hysteria about a Democratic senator who has not yet served two years and is mainly known for a single speech at the 2004 convention, you have to appreciate just how desperate the Democrats are for a panacea for all their ills. In the many glossy cover articles about Obamamania, the only real suspense is whether a Jack or Bobby Kennedy analogy will be made in the second paragraph or the fifth. Men's Vogue (cover by Annie Leibovitz) went so far as to say that the Illinois senator "alone has the potential to one day be mentioned in the same breath" as Richard Wright, Ralph Ellison, Abraham Lincoln and Martin Luther King. Why not throw in Mark Twain and Sammy Davis Jr.?

This is a lot to put on the shoulders of anyone, even someone as impressive as Mr. Obama. Though he remains a modest and self-effacing guy from all appearances, he is encouraging the speculation about seeking higher office — and not as a coy Colin Powell-style maneuver to sell his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." Mr. Obama hasn't been turning up in Iowa for the corn dogs. He consistently concedes he's entertaining the prospect of a presidential run.

There's no reason to rush that decision now, but it's a no-brainer. Of course he should run, assuming his family is on the same page. He's 45, not 30, and his slender résumé in public office (which also includes seven years as a state senator) should be no more of an impediment to him than it was to the White House's current occupant. As his Illinois colleague Dick Durbin told The Chicago Tribune last week, "I said to him, 'Do you really think sticking around the Senate for four more years and casting a thousand more votes will make you more qualified for president?' " Instead, such added experience is more likely to transform an unusually eloquent writer, speaker and public servant into another windbag like Joe Biden.

The more important issue is not whether Mr. Obama will seek the presidency, but what kind of candidate he would be. If the Democratic Party is to be more than a throw-out-Bush party, it can't settle for yet again repackaging its well-worn ideas, however worthy, with a new slogan containing the word "New." It needs a major infusion of steadfast leadership. That's the one lesson it should learn from George Bush. Call him arrogant or misguided or foolish, this president has been a leader. He had a controversial agenda — enacting big tax cuts, privatizing Social Security, waging "pre-emptive" war, packing the courts with judges who support his elisions of constitutional rights — and he didn't fudge it. He didn't care if half the country despised him along the way.

The interminable Iraq fiasco has branded the Democrats as the party of fecklessness. The failure of its leaders to challenge the administration's blatant propaganda to gin up the war is a failure of historic proportions (as it was for much of the press and liberal punditry). When Tom Daschle, then the Senate leader, presided over the rushed passing of the war resolution before the 2002 midterms, he explained that the "bottom line" was for Democrats "to move on"; they couldn't wait to campaign on the economy. The party's subsequent loss of the Senate did not prevent it two years later from nominating a candidate who voted for the war's funding before he voted against it.

What makes the liberal establishment's crush on Mr. Obama disconcerting is that it too often sees him as a love child of a pollster's focus group: a one-man Benetton ad who can be all things to all people. He's black and he's white. He's both of immigrant stock (Kenya) and the American heartland (Kansas, yet). He speaks openly about his faith without disowning evolution. He has both gravitas and unpretentious humor. He was the editor of The Harvard Law Review and also won a Grammy (for the audiobook of his touching memoir, "Dreams From My Father"). He exudes perfection but has owned up to youthful indiscretions with drugs. He is post-boomer and post-civil-rights-movement. He is Bill Clinton without the baggage, a fail-safe 21st-century bridge from "A Place Called Hope" to "The Audacity of Hope."

Mr. Obama has offended no one (a silly tiff with John McCain excepted). Search right-wing blogs and you'll find none of the invective showered on other liberal Democrats in general and black liberal leaders in particular. What little criticism Mr. Obama has received is from those in his own camp who find him cautious to a fault, especially on issues that might cause controversy. The sum of all his terrific parts, this theory goes, may be less than the whole: another Democrat who won't tell you what day it is before calling a consultant, another human weather vane who waits to see which way the wind is blowing before taking a stand.

That has been the Democrats' fatal malady, but it's way too early and there's too little evidence to say Mr. Obama has been infected by it. If he is conciliatory by nature and eager to entertain adversaries' views in good faith, that's not necessarily a fault, particularly in these poisonous times. The question is whether Mr. Obama will stick up for core principles when tested and get others to follow him.

That's why it's important to remember that on one true test for his party, Iraq, he was consistent from the start. On the long trail to a hotly competitive senatorial primary in Illinois, he repeatedly questioned the rationale for the war before it began, finally to protest it at a large rally in Chicago on the eve of the invasion. He judged Saddam to pose no immediate threat to America and argued for containment over a war he would soon label "dumb" and "political-driven." He hasn't changed. In his new book, he gives a specific date (the end of this year) for beginning "a phased withdrawal of U.S. troops" and doesn't seem to care who calls it "cut and run."

Contrast this with Hillary Clinton, the presumptive Democratic presidential candidate, who last week said that failed American policy in Iraq should be revisited if there's no improvement in "maybe 60 to 90 days." This might qualify as leadership, even at this late date, if only John Warner, the Republican chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, hadn't proposed exactly the same time frame for a re-evaluation of the war almost a week before she did.

The Democrats may well win on Election Day this year. But one of their best hopes for long-term viability in the post-Bush era is that Barack Obama steps up and changes the party before the party of terminal timidity and equivocation changes him.

Growing Absentee Voting Is Reshaping Campaigns (NYT)

By John M. Broder

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 21 — For millions of Americans, Election Day is already over.

Thirty states now allow no-excuse absentee voting, and most of them also allow voters to cast early ballots in person at county clerks' offices or satellite polling places.

In Montana, absentee ballots were mailed Sept. 22. As many as 40 percent of Florida's voters will cast their ballots before Election Day, Nov. 7. Oregon's elections are conducted entirely by mail, and Washington is moving that way. California sent out 3.8 million absentee ballots the week of Oct. 8.

Candidates are maneuvering to adapt to a changed political calendar, accelerating their advertising, their mailings and their get-out-the-vote calls. They are figuring out exactly who votes early and are trying to get to them before they cast their ballots. They are raising more money and spending it faster.

"Love it or hate it, it's the wave of the future," said Art Torres, chairman of the California Democratic Party. "Election Day started here on Oct. 10 and lasts 29 days. It's tremendously burdensome on our fund-raising and the people we have out in the field."

Phil Angelides, the Democrat trying to unseat Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger of California, spent $250,000 to mail 725,000 brochures last week, timed to drop into mailboxes the same day the absentee ballots arrived.

Mike McGavick, the Republican candidate for the Senate seat from Washington, pushed up his television advertising schedule to run spots that an aide called his "closing argument" three weeks before Election Day. More than half of the state's voters will cast ballots by mail before Nov. 7.

In the Denver suburbs, Rick O'Donnell, a Republican candidate for Congress, said he had been emphasizing his hard line on illegal immigration in recent speeches and advertisements to motivate loyal Republicans who he believed were more likely to vote early. Mr. O'Donnell is now pivoting to a message on taxes to try to appeal to independents and undecided voters who are waiting until Election Day.

"It is a different message when it is a different group of people," Mr. O'Donnell said.

"Every day we get a list of additional people who just in the last 24 hours have applied for ballots," he said. "The amazing thing is they are voting tonight at home on the kitchen counter. They come up to me and say, 'I voted for you.' "

Experts estimate that more than 20 percent of voters nationwide will cast their ballots before Election Day by mail or at early-voting locations, a proportion of the electorate that is rising with each election. Some states and counties open the ballots before Election Day and keep the results secret; others count them with regular ballots.

Analysts and party officials who study early voting trends say that a decade ago those who took advantage of absentee ballots tended to be relatively well off and highly educated, with Republicans outnumbering Democrats by almost two to one. But as the ease of early voting has spread, the ratio is slipping and some analysts say that nearly as many Democrats as Republicans now vote early.

Those who favor the practice say it is convenient for voters and increases turnout. Most elections officials welcome the trend because it reduces the strain on polling places and poll workers on Election Day.

But some experts say there is no proof that early voting increases turnout and may well have the opposite effect because some voters request absentee ballots and then neglect to send them in. They are also concerned that absentee ballots are more open to fraud than votes cast at established polling places.

Candidates and political parties are ambivalent. They can get partisans to vote early and then use them as volunteers to help turn out other voters. They can be sure their voters will not be discouraged or turned away at crowded polling places on Election Day.

But for candidates, the trend toward early voting vastly complicates campaigning, as Mr. Torres said. With voting spread over 29 or even 45 days, candidates have to budget their time and money carefully to make sure they are reaching all potential voters before they cast their ballots. They cannot rely solely on a late blitz of advertising, mail and phone calls to motivate voters. They cannot pray for a piece of late-breaking news to alter the outcome.

Nationwide in 2004, an estimated 25 million votes were cast early, roughly 20 percent of the 122 million total. In 2000, about 14 percent of the electorate voted early. There are no reliable national figures for 1996 and earlier, said Paul Gronke, director of the Early Voting Information Center at Reed College in Oregon.

Absentee voting offers an opportunity for political parties to refine and use increasingly sophisticated methods of identifying supporters known as microtargeting. Starting with lists of voters requesting absentee ballots and then researching how they voted in past elections, parties can identify loyalists.

The parties also use magazine subscription lists, catalog mailings and even cable television choices to further identify potential supporters. Both parties use the techniques, but Republicans started earlier and claim an advantage over Democrats in identifying and turning out their voters.

Critics of early voting, however, say that extending the balloting period can discourage voters and distort results. Curtis Gans, director of the Committee for the Study of the American Electorate, said his research showed that no-excuse absentee voting hurt turnout, although 2004 was an exception.

Mr. Gans said that many voters, concerned about fraud and chaos at polling places after the contested 2000 election, took advantage of the new, more liberal rules for absentee and early voting. But he also said there were more cases of fraud in absentee balloting than in Election Day voting, citing recent cases of absentee vote-buying in Illinois, Florida and Georgia and a concern about overseas ballots in Florida in 2000.

The Georgia case, from 1996, involved two candidates for county commissioner in Dodge County, who set up tables at opposite ends of the hall in the county courthouse offering $20 cash payments for absentee votes. Both candidates were convicted of vote fraud.

Mr. Gans also said that early voting could minimize the impact of events that occurred close to Election Day, leading to what he called a “differential of information” among voters.

“What if on the Friday before the election Osama bin Laden is captured?” he asked. “Or we had a terrorist act or the stock market tanked, or we learned of a major issue of moral turpitude involving a major candidate?”

The weekend before the 2003 election to recall Gray Davis, the California governor, The Los Angeles Times reported that several women had said that Mr. Schwarzenegger, the winning candidate, had groped them. At that point, more than 2 million of the 9.4 million votes cast in the election had already been mailed.

In giving voters more flexibility in casting their ballots, there are those who say that something intangible is lost. Election Day is a civic ritual, they say, the one occasion every two or four years when millions of citizens show up in a public place to exercise their right to choose their representatives.

“Absentee voting erodes that sense of community,” Professor Gronke said. “It is voting alone.”

Election Officials Concerned That Bulky Voter Guides Will Overwhelm Residents

SAN FRANCISCO -- Voter guides are landing with a thud on doorsteps across California as residents are facing an unusually large number of ballot measures and candidates in next month's election.

DOJ_NMG_0084757

Election officials worry that the state's largest guides -- 192-page books sent to 12 million homes -- will overwhelm and discourage would-be voters.

The array of complicated issues on the ballot might also lead to long lines and delays at polling sites if people haven't done their homework.

"The state guide is pretty overwhelming. I haven't gotten through it myself," Shasta County Clerk Cathy Darling said. "My absentee ballot is sitting here in my desk drawer because I haven't read it all yet."

A majority of voters are expected to vote by mail. But the ballots are so big that election officials fear some might be returned for insufficient postage.

California Secretary of State Bruce McPherson said that 24 counties have mail-in ballots exceeding one ounce and therefore requiring 63 cents of postage. He is working with the post office to help ensure that ballots with only one 39-cent stamp will be delivered by Election Day.

The November sample ballot in San Joaquin County is the largest ever -- 100 to 124 pages, depending on the district, or triple the normal size. Many pages are devoted to a proposed tax increase to pay for road and rail projects.

San Joaquin County Registrar Debby Hench said printing costs in a typical election are about $300,000, but the cost this time could be double.

"We know they're big and intimidating-looking, so we're telling voters they need to pre-mark the sample ballot and be prepared when they go into the booth so they don't have to read everything in the polling place -- they will never be able to do that in a timely way," Hench said.

California guides have been swelling since the 1970s, when candidates, voters and interest groups increasingly turned to state propositions to enact legislation.

The October 2003 special election, in which Gov. Gray Davis (D) was recalled from office and replaced by Arnold Schwarzenegger (R) from a field of 135 candidates, required supersize ballots and guides. But at least it was light reading, with quips from candidates such as Hustler magazine publisher Larry Flynt, former sitcom star Gary Coleman and melon-smashing comedian Leo Gallagher.

By contrast, the November ballot lists candidates for eight statewide offices, 13 propositions and local ballot measures in nearly all 58 counties.

"Voting in this state can sometimes feel like doing your taxes," said Kim Alexander, president of the California Voter Foundation.

Wealthy Coal Executive Hopes To Turn Democratic West Virginia Republican (NYT)

By Ian Urbina

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

CHARLESTON, W.Va. — Don L. Blankenship is not the governor of West Virginia. But here in coal country some say he may as well be, considering the power he wields.

Mr. Blankenship, the chief executive of the state's largest coal producer, Massey Energy, has promised to spend "whatever it takes" to help win a majority in the State Legislature for the long-beleaguered Republican Party in a state that is a Democratic and labor stronghold.

In a state where candidates who win typically spend less than $20,000, Mr. Blankenship has poured more than $6 million into political initiatives and local races over the past three years. Mr. Blankenship has spent at least $700,000 in his current effort to oust Democrats, and the state is awash with lawn signs, highway billboards, radio advertisements and field organizers paid for by him.

"Don Blankenship would actually be less powerful if he were in elected office," said United States Representative Nick J. Rahall II, a Democrat whose district includes a majority of Massey's coal mines. "He would be twice as accountable and half as feared."

Rather than bankroll his own political ambitions, as have businessmen like Gov. Jon S. Corzine of New Jersey and Mayor Michael R. Bloomberg of New York, Mr. Blankenship has exerted his financial clout in the mold of Warren Buffett and George Soros, choosing issues and candidates in line with his partisan philosophy.

Union leaders say Mr. Blankenship, 56, is the main reason that less than a quarter of the state's coal miners are now organized, down from about 95 percent just three decades ago. And environmentalists describe him as the biggest force behind a highly destructive form of mining called mountaintop removal that involves using explosives to blow off the tops of mountains to reach coal seams.

Local Republicans admiringly say that Mr. Blankenship combines the strategic savvy of Karl Rove, the White House adviser, and the fund-raising skill of Richard Mellon Scaife, the conservative financier. Mr. Blankenship personally oversees his media campaigns; he writes advertisements and designs polls, and speaks on talk radio more than the chairman of the state Republican Party.

"This has never been an easy state for Republicans," said the party chairman, Doug McKinney, seated in his party's headquarters, a dank cinder-block building in Charleston bought in 2002, half of it paid for with a $100,000 donation from Massey Energy. "But finally this state is at a tipping point, and Don is a big reason for that."

In 2004, Mr. Blankenship financed a $3.5 million campaign that catapulted a little-known lawyer, Brent D. Benjamin, who barely won the Republican primary, onto the public stage as the first Republican to serve on the state's Supreme Court.

In 2005, Mr. Blankenship spent $650,000 to deal Gov. Joe Manchin III, a Democrat, the most significant defeat of his tenure by blocking a plan to use bonds to shore up the state's under-financed employee pension plan.

George W. Bush won West Virginia in 2000, the first time since 1928 that voters backed a nonincumbent Republican for president. Mr. Bush won the state again in 2004, and in the past several years, a large number of Republicans have moved into the state's eastern panhandle, mostly from Virginia.

In 2002, Republicans picked up 11 seats in the House of Delegates (but are still in the minority), and local political analysts say it is possible, though a long shot, that the Republicans will pick up the additional 18 House seats they need to control the Legislature in November. The Democrats retain a strong majority in the Senate.

"Don is really the linchpin of it all," said Gary Abernathy, a consultant for the state Republican Party.

Mr. Blankenship, who declined to be interviewed for this article, told a gathering of Republicans last year in his famously blunt and monotone delivery that it "doesn't take clairvoyance to know what we need to do" in West Virginia.

"If you go down to Virginia and copy the law book and write 'West' in front of it, you would clearly have a more prosperous economy, a better education system and you'd have a better state. It's that simple," he said, referring to Virginia, which is deeply Republican and has more pro-business laws than West Virginia.

The first step in that mission, said Cecil E. Roberts, president of the United Mine Workers of America, has been to oppose unions fervently in the state. "From the first day he could, Don began busting unions," Mr. Roberts said. "He was pretty effective at that, so now Don is trying to extend his reach across the state in politics."

Raised just up the road from Matewan, the scene of an epic 1921 strike, Mr. Blankenship keeps a reminder of his anti-union beliefs in the back of his office. In 1985, Massey broke from the industry and insisted that miners at each site negotiate separately with the company. During the 11-month strike that resulted, someone shot through Mr. Blankenship's office window. The old Zenith television whose screen was shattered by the bullet still sits not far from his desk.

After graduating with an accounting degree from Marshall University in Huntington, Mr. Blankenship worked at several companies before becoming a manager in 1982 at Massey, the fourth largest coal producer in the United States. Eight years later, he became the first non-Massey family member to serve as president of the company.

Mr. Blankenship, who received about $34 million in compensation last year (roughly four times the industry standard) runs the company from a double-wide trailer just across the state line in Belfry, Ky. In April, Mr. Blankenship's personal housekeeper filed a lawsuit seeking unemployment benefits in which she accused him of responding with angry fits to infractions like getting the wrong McDonald's order or stocking the freezer with the wrong ice cream. After the disasters at the Aracoma Alma Mine, which Massey owns, and the Sago Mine, in which a total of 14 miners were killed, Mr. Blankenship drew sharp criticism after he told The Herald-Mail of Hagerstown, Md., that such accidents were rare and statistically insignificant.

E. Morgan Massey, the company's former chief executive and an admirer of Mr. Blankenship's, said that while the criticism he faced as C.E.O. was that he was "too paternalistic," Mr. Blankenship had been viewed differently.

"Let's just say Don is the other way entirely," Mr. Massey said. Mr. Blankenship has also been faulted for his company's environmental record. Massey has had more toxic spills of coal waste than any other company in the state, and from January 2000 to December 2005, it received 4,268 citations from state regulators. The next closest company received fewer than 800. A Massey spokeswoman responded by pointing out that Massey is the largest coal producer in the state.

One of Mr. Blankenship's biggest concerns, especially after Massey lost a $50 million jury verdict in August 2002 for having forced a smaller company out of business, has been "plaintiff-friendly courts" that he says have made West Virginia an expensive place to do business.

At the same time, Mr. Blankenship has not been shy about using the courts to deal with his adversaries. In the past several years he has sued the governor, the United Mine Workers union, the state Supreme Court, and The Charleston Gazette, the state's largest newspaper.

Governor Manchin said he tried not to pay Mr. Blankenship any mind.

"I know Don writes a lot of checks," Mr. Manchin said. "At this point, I'm just sticking with the issues and reminding voters of the successes we've had with help from the Legislature. I'm not paying attention to Don."

DOJ_NMG_0084759

The state Democratic Party, however, is taking the opposite approach. It is distributing bumper stickers saying, “Don, WV is not for sale,” and has set up a Web site listing controversial comments from Mr. Blankenship. The party has sent letters to Republican candidates pressing them to give back Mr. Blankenship’s contributions; so far, two candidates have done so.

The Democratic-controlled Legislature has also tried to rein in Mr. Blankenship’s influence.

Last year in response to Mr. Blankenship’s impact on the Supreme Court race in 2004, lawmakers passed a campaign-finance law capping at $1,000 how much an individual can give to so-called 527 groups like the one Mr. Blankenship used to influence that race.

However, individuals still can spend unlimited sums of their own money on campaign advertisements, and that is just what Mr. Blankenship has said he plans to do.

Party Of Jesse Ventura Vies To Be More (WP)

By Conrad Defiebre, Minneapolis Star Tribune

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

The Big Two Dwarf Minnesota's Independence Party, but It Refuses to Fade

In 12 years as a major political party in Minnesota, the Independence Party has produced one larger-than-life governor, an appointed U.S. senator for 7 1/2 weeks and a smattering of local officials.

Now the party of Jesse Ventura is pinning its hopes on eight statewide and federal candidates, none of whom has ever stood for election before, plus a collection of 17 seekers of lesser offices.

Is this really a major party?

Officially it is, by virtue of attaining 5 percent or more of the vote in at least one statewide race in every Minnesota general election since 1994. And polls show that string is likely to continue with veteran public policy wonk Peter Hutchinson's long-shot gubernatorial run this year.

In some ways, the Independence Party is a serious political force while in others it's still a struggling newcomer.

"They are definitely a player, at the moment probably the most successful third-party movement in America," said Larry Jacobs, director of the Center for the Study of Politics and Governance at the University of Minnesota. "But they're not yet an organization, and their support can be unstable."

Not surprisingly, the two dominant parties -- with more than 200 nominees apiece on the Nov. 7 ballots -- scoff at the IP's thin candidate slates, threadbare finances, middle-of-the-road politics and recent election failures.

"It's hard to talk about the future of a party that hit its high-water mark eight years ago," said Democratic-Farmer-Labor Party spokeswoman Jess McIntosh, referring to Ventura's election. "They had their shot, they showed us what independent leadership looks like, and I don't imagine voters will give them another chance anytime soon."

Added state Republican Party spokesman Mark Drake: "They've been losing a lot of influence in the post-Ventura years."

But state IP Chairman Jim Moore shot back: "The last time the state worked was with a former wrestler who wore a feather boa."

Since Ventura "shocked the world" in 1998 by winning a three-way gubernatorial race with 37 percent of the vote, Tim Penny, the IP's choice in 2002, saw his support fall from the mid-20 percent range in an early poll to 16 percent on Election Day. Hutchinson is languishing in single digits.

Moore says that's about where Ventura was at this stage eight years ago -- he registered 10 percent in a Sept. 23, 1998, poll. But while Hutchinson, a former state finance commissioner and Minneapolis schools superintendent, has impressed debate audiences with his articulate grasp of issues, he has not matched Ventura's name recognition, florid personality and ability to connect with alienated voters.

The party does seem to be trying to re-create something of the offbeat Ventura style. It has produced satirical radio ads featuring the former governor and started an interactive Web site where the party mascot, Indie the Buffalo, answers visitors' questions. A recent "speed candi-dating" event offered happy-hour bar patrons in downtown Minneapolis brief one-on-one conversations with IP candidates.

With its support of rail transit, aggressive environmental initiatives, and abortion and gay rights, the IP is often seen as draining support from the DFL. "They're true liberals," the GOP's Drake said of Hutchinson and other IP candidates who have backgrounds in the DFL. But Jacobs said his public-opinion research shows that Hutchinson draws his current 9 percent support equally from Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R) and DFL Attorney General Mike Hatch.

Tim Anderson, 40, a Minnetonka software consultant, said he will vote the IP ticket now after a lifetime as a dedicated Republican. Anderson said he responds to Hutchinson's calls to simplify the government and get it out of "the hot-button moral issues" that he said have preoccupied the GOP for the past 10 years.

"I don't think they're going to win," he said of the IP slate, "but I like them anyway."

DOJ_NMG_0084760

In addition to Hutchinson and his "Team Minnesota" statewide slate of experienced but little-known public policy hands, the IP is focusing resources on a "Team Washington" of U.S. Senate hopeful Robert Fitzgerald and U.S. House candidates Tammy Lee and John Binkowski.

They are young, likable and well-positioned between DFL and Republican rivals who are "on the edges of their parties," Moore said. But none of them has broken out of single digits in polls.

In the view of IP founder Dean Barkley, "Tammy Lee has an excellent chance of doing well" against Keith Ellison (DFL) and Alan Fine (R) in the Minneapolis-area 5th District. "She might be able to pull that one off."

Binkowski is running against Michele Bachmann (R) and Patty Wetterling (DFL) in the 6th District, north of the Twin Cities.

The IP has fielded only two winners of state offices -- Ventura and state Sen. Sheila Kiscaden, a moderate Republican legislator who was snubbed by her party, won reelection in 2002 under the IP banner and soon thereafter switched to the DFL.

There's little indication that this year's crop of 16 IP legislative hopefuls will repeat Kiscaden's success.

"The problem with the Independence Party is that their only message is 'none of the above,' " said the DFL's McIntosh. "It's not positive, it's not progressive and it's not a message you can actually govern on."

Barkley, who masterminded Ventura's election and later was appointed by him to fill out the final weeks of the late Democratic Sen. Paul Wellstone's term, takes a more positive view.

"They may not be doing as well as they'd like," he said last week from Austin, where he is managing the independent gubernatorial campaign of singer-writer Kinky Friedman. "But we're patient. It's not going to happen overnight. The party is larger than ever. In '94, there were about 12 of us. It gets a little bigger every year."

Running For Office? Better Run From Colbert (LAT)

By Jim Puzzanghera

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Lawmakers are wary of his Comedy Central show, which often gives them enough cable to hang themselves.

WASHINGTON — Most politicians are as likely to pass up free TV face time before an election as they would be to refuse a campaign check.

Then again, there's a price to be paid for looking stupid.

That's what members of Congress have learned recently about "Better Know a District," a sarcastic weekly skit that is part of "The Colbert Report," a nightly half-hour on Viacom Inc.'s Comedy Central network.

Hosted by comedian Stephen Colbert, the year-old program is a spinoff of the cable channel's wildly popular "The Daily Show Starring Jon Stewart" and one of an increasing number of political humor shows on cable that are drawing the young viewers whom advertisers covet.

Politicians covet them too for their votes. So, many lawmakers initially played along with the segments in which Colbert interviews a member of the House of Representatives, with few checks and balances on his proclivity to make fools of them.

But after a couple of House members stumbled badly on the show, some incumbents decided that the dumbest thing to do with Colbert's offer of free TV exposure was to take it.

"I watch it all the time," said House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-San Francisco), "and I think, 'Why would anybody go on there?' "

With polls showing that the balance of power in Congress could shift from Republican to Democrat in next month's elections, few incumbents are in the mood to take chances. Indeed, it's been two months since a current member has appeared.

One who did appear, Rep. Lynn Westmoreland (R-Ga.), discovered the pitfalls when Colbert asked him about a bill he co-sponsored requiring that the Ten Commandments be displayed in the U.S. Capitol.

"What are the Ten Commandments?" Colbert asked matter-of-factly.

"What are all of them?" Westmoreland said, taken aback. "You want me to name them all?"

The June segment showed Westmoreland struggling to name just three. Westmoreland actually named seven, said his press secretary, Brian Robinson. And the remaining ones, he added, were somewhat obscure.

A Bible Belt conservative, the embarrassed Westmoreland has been trying to live down his Commandments performance. No Republican has appeared since.

Negative phone calls from around the country poured in to Westmoreland's office, mostly from liberals charging hypocrisy, Robinson said. Several clips of the segment are posted on the YouTube website, and Westmoreland's Democratic opponent, Mike McGraw, put the video on his campaign website.

"It's a great thing to do if all Americans had a sense of humor," Robinson said of a Colbert appearance. "Unfortunately, some don't get the joke."

DOJ_NMG_0084761

What really got the attention of House members was the experience of Rep. Robert Wexler (D-Fla.). Colbert told him he was free to make even the most outrageous statements because he was running for reelection unopposed. Then Colbert coaxed Wexler into a spoof declaration that he enjoyed cocaine and prostitutes because "it's a fun thing to do."

Several media outlets trumpeted Wexler's comments without making it clear that he was only answering Colbert's fill-in-the-blank questions.

"I'm going to try to keep my day job and not go into comedy," Wexler said, although he noted that the reaction from his constituents was overwhelmingly positive.

Wexler's gaffe, following Westmoreland's trouble, has made some legislators gun-shy about facing Colbert with elections approaching. Colbert and the show's staff have declined media interviews about the segments since the Wexler episode.

But ignoring Colbert has its own perils.

When Rep. Sue W. Kelly (R-N.Y.) declined to appear for the segment that aired Thursday night, Colbert invited her Democratic opponent, John Hall.

"I oppose everything that you stand for," Colbert said, "but you were willing to talk to me. So let's move your numbers right here. Let's smear your opponent."

Hall picked from a deck of "smear cards" fanned by Colbert.

"My opponent smokes marijuana," Hall said blankly.

"That's a bold accusation," the host responded. "It's out there now that Sue Kelly smokes pot."

Ever since Richard Nixon delivered the "Sock it to me" punch line on "Rowan & Martin's Laugh-In" during the 1968 presidential campaign, politicians have sought to use comedy shows to prove they aren't the stiffs they seem to be. Gerald Ford taped two brief lines from the White House for a 1976 episode of "Saturday Night Live."

Bill Clinton defused criticism over a painfully long speech at the 1988 Democratic convention by letting "Tonight Show" host Johnny Carson place an hourglass in front of him during an interview. Four years later, Clinton scored points in his 1992 presidential campaign by playing the saxophone on comic Arsenio Hall's talk show.

But Colbert's series is different.

Instead of high-profile presidential wannabes, it features relatively anonymous House members. The interviews are taped in the lawmaker's office, so there's no studio audience to chastise a hostile questioner. And the approximately five-minute segments are culled from sessions as long as 2 1/2 hours — plenty of time for even an experienced politician to say or do something to make a press secretary cringe.

Over the last year, "Better Know a District" has become the comedic buzz of Capitol Hill. Colbert bills it as a "434-part series" — he's banned the San Diego-area district represented by his "friend," convicted felon Randy "Duke" Cunningham, because constituents didn't notice his "cry for help."

Congressional staffers e-mail video clips, critiquing each performance. Speculating about who will appear next — and how foolish they'll look — has become nearly as popular as handicapping which party will control the House after November's election.

Looking foolish is usually a good bet.

Each segment begins with a short send-up of the representative's district. Colbert introduced the district of Rep. Xavier Becerra (D-Los Angeles) "Entertainment Tonight"-style. He plugged the pastrami sandwiches at Langer's deli with numerous references to Tom Cruise movies and asked in a quiz which hunk — George Clooney, Antonio Banderas or Becerra — was the district's congressman.

Colbert's shtick lampoons blustery conservative cable TV commentators such as Fox's Bill O'Reilly. He remains in character when he sits down with members of Congress, firing off provocative or just plain stupid questions. Politicians often are flummoxed.

"Is it safe to say you're an America-hating terrorist lover hiding behind a stupid bow tie?" he asked Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.).

"Do you have to take your toupee off when you go through security?" Colbert asked Rep. John L. Mica (R-Fla.).

"Have you ever seen a naked woman?" he asked Rep. Brad Sherman (D-Sherman Oaks).

Paul Lewis, a Boston College professor who has studied humor and politics, said the series was just "a trap" for politicians.

"When they go on the show," he said, "they often seem like buffoons."

But for the 30 House members who have appeared over the last year, the risk of facing down Colbert has a potential reward — demonstrating a sense of humor and appealing to young people, who make up a large chunk of the 2 million people who watch each episode.

Many like to play along. Rep. Lynn C. Woolsey (D-Petaluma) arm-wrestled Colbert. Rep. Stephanie Tubbs Jones (D-Ohio) portrayed "Judge Tubbs" in a parody of TV court shows. Rep. Eliot L. Engel (D-N.Y.) let Colbert comb his mustache.

"We don't want to be stuffed shirts only doing dry subjects in a dull format," said Rep. Jack Kingston (R-Ga.), who was the first House member Colbert profiled and had urged colleagues to appear. "We need to make politics interesting and fun to people any chance we get."

Becerra, who is running unopposed, decided Colbert was a risk worth taking. Appearing in August, Becerra was the last incumbent to make that calculation. But it was worth it, Becerra said, noting that it brought attention to his bill to create a national museum for American Latino culture and history.

Well, attention of a sort.

"Why would you want to take America's great art and translate it into Spanish?" Colbert asked Becerra in his Capitol Hill office. "Is this what you want to see?"

Colbert held up a series of pictures. In "Washington Crossing the Delaware," the Father of Our Country wore a sombrero, and a pinata replaced the American flag. "Whistler's Mother" rocked under a fruit-basket hat a la Carmen Miranda. Colombian coffee pitchman Juan Valdez and his trusty mule were seen nosing into "American Gothic."

"That's very clever," Becerra responded, trying not to laugh.

He and others said the key to avoiding political damage was knowing when to stop playing along. "In our business, we're allowed to be funny," Kingston said, "but not real funny."

Sherman participated in a PG-rated spoof of a pornographic movie involving Colbert and a pizza deliveryman, a nod to his district being in the San Fernando Valley, home to the nation's adult film industry. But Sherman said he turned down several requests from Colbert to do potentially embarrassing things in the spoof, titled "Fresh Hot Slice."

In the end, Sherman was shown simply watching Colbert and the deliveryman indulge in some sexually suggestive pizza eating.

"I ate no pizza," Sherman said. "That's not because Colbert didn't want me to eat some pizza."

Democratic consultant Jenny Backus said Colbert offered lawmakers an excellent opportunity to broaden their appeal, just not in the home stretch of the campaign.

"There will always be people in the House trying to stick out of the crowd … but right now is not the season to be doing that," she said, noting that a series of congressional scandals have many voters in a less-than-jovial mood. "In this climate, it's must-not-do TV."

The GOP Victory (BAR)

By Jim McTague

Barrons, October 22, 2006

JUBILANT DEMOCRATS SHOULD RECONSIDER their order for confetti and noisemakers. The Democrats, as widely reported, are expecting GOP-weary voters to flock to the polls in two weeks and hand them control of the House for the first time in 12 years -- and perhaps the Senate, as well. Even some Republicans privately confess that they are anticipating the election-day equivalent of Little Big Horn. Pardon our hubris, but we just don't see it.

Our analysis -- based on a race-by-race examination of campaign-finance data -- suggests that the GOP will hang on to both chambers, at least nominally. We expect the Republican majority in the House to fall by eight seats, to 224 of the chamber's 435. At the very worst, our analysis suggests, the party's loss could be as large as 14 seats, leaving a one-seat majority. But that is still a far cry from the 20-seat loss some are predicting. In the Senate, with 100 seats, we see the GOP winding up with 52, down three

We studied every single race -- all 435 House seats and 33 in the Senate -- and based our predictions about the outcome in almost every race on which candidate had the largest campaign war chest, a sign of superior grass-roots support. We ignore the polls. Thus, our conclusions about individual races often differ from the conventional wisdom. Pollsters, for instance, have upstate New York Republican Rep. Tom Reynolds trailing Democratic challenger Jack Davis, who owns a manufacturing plant. But Reynolds raised $3.3 million in campaign contributions versus $1.6 million for Davis, so we score him the winner.

Likewise, we disagree with pollsters of both parties who see Indiana Republican Rep. Chris Chocola getting whomped by Democratic challenger Joe Donnelly, a lawyer and business owner from South Bend. Chocola has raised $2.7 million, versus $1.1 million for Donnelly. Ditto in North Carolina, where we see Republican Rep. Charles Taylor beating Democrat Heath Shuler, a former NFL quarterback, because of better financing. Analysts from both parties predict a Shuler upset.

Is our method reliable? It certainly has been in the past. Using it in the 2002 and 2004 congressional races, we bucked conventional wisdom and correctly predicted GOP gains both years. Look at House races back to 1972 and you'll find the candidate with the most money has won about 93% of the time. And that's closer to 98% in more recent years, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. Polls can be far less reliable. Remember, they all but declared John Kerry president on Election Day 2004.

Our method isn't quite as accurate in Senate races: The cash advantage has spelled victory about 89% of the time since 1996. The reason appears to be that with more money spent on Senate races, you need a multi-million-dollar advantage to really dominate in advertising, and that's hard to come by.

But even 89% accuracy is high compared with other gauges. Tracking each candidate's funding is "exceptionally valuable because it tells you who has support," says William Morgan, executive director of the renowned Mid-West Political Science Association in Bloomington, Ind. The cognoscenti, he says, give the most money to the candidate they believe has a good chance of winning.

WE FOUND NO SHORTAGE of people to challenge us. They argue that money doesn't make a difference when the electorate is as worked up emotionally, as it is this year. John Aldrich, a professor of political science at Duke University who writes extensively about elections, says that a candidate really doesn't need the most money to win; he merely requires enough cash to get his message across. Aldrich believes Democrats will win this year with less money because they won't have to spend so much to persuade voters to switch horses.

"The support for the president, the Congress and incumbents is relatively low by historical standards," he says. In fact, a new Wall Street Journal/NBC News Poll says voter disgust with Congress is the lowest in the survey's 17-year history.

It's true that our formula isn't foolproof. In 1958, 1974 and 1994, the wave of anti-incumbent sentiment was so strong that money didn't trump voter outrage. We appreciate that voters in 2006 are hopping mad at the GOP because of the war and because of scandal. We just don't agree that the outrage has reached the level of those earlier times. The reason is that the economy in 2006 is healthier. And the economy is the only other factor that figures in our analysis.

In 1958, in sharp contrast to now, the country was in a deep recession. Though the Democrats controlled the House, voters blamed their pain on Republican President Dwight David Eisenhower, and it cost the GOP 48 seats. In 1974, a Watergate year, inflation and an Arab oil embargo pinched household budgets and helped fuel voter anger at Republicans. In 1994, though the economy was improving, unemployment was above 6% and personal income began to fall in the quarter prior to the election, souring the mood of the electorate. People blamed their pain on high taxes, which they associated with Democrats, and ushered in Newt Gingrich & Co.

Though the current economy is slowing, unemployment remains relatively low, at 4.6%, and disposable-income growth is positive. While GDP figures will be revised downward in coming weeks and unemployment figures could edge up, it may not matter. Those numbers are "interesting stuff for economists, but voters will continue to focus on pocketbook issues like the price of gas and the value of their 401(k)s," says GOP insider Rick Hohlt. Pump prices have been falling and the Dow Jones Industrial Average has been on a tear, reaching 12,000 last week.

Hohlt and analyst John Morgan say Republicans will have unusually tough election-day challenges from Democrats in more than 50 races -- a high number. They recall no more than 20 highly competitive races in 2004. All but 10 of this year's contested seats are held by incumbents, and Hohlt and Morgan aren't predicting an outcome.

IF WE'RE EVEN HALF right, and the GOP retains control of the Senate but loses the House, then there would be important ramifications for the stock market. Since traders often have disdain for Democrats, there could well be a relief rally, at least in the short term. "It would force investors to rethink some overzealous discounting of stocks," says Chuck Gabriel, chief political analyst for Prudential Equity Group.

Fear of Democrats, he suggests, may be playing a role in the weakness in energy and pharmaceutical stocks, with investors bracing for a populist backlash against profits. "Elections may or may not be a driver, but it would not hurt to remove that headwind," says Gabriel.

Shares of student lender Sallie Mae also may also be feeling the weight of the presumed Democrat victory. The theory is that Democrats would reduce student-loan rates if they control both ends of the Capitol, hurting profit margins for parent SLM (ticker: SLM). It's unlikely Democrats could succeed with the Senate in GOP hands.

Gabriel adds that shares of mortgage giants Fannie Mae (FNM) and Freddie Mac (FRE), which have gained since Mark Foley resigned on Sept. 29 amid a sex scandal, might decline with even a partial GOP victory. Republicans are considered less friendly to the quasi-governmental agencies than pro-housing Democrats.

President Bush certainly would have to rethink his approach to Congress if our scenario plays out either in full or in part. The GOP majority in Congress would be so slim that the president would have to live up fully to a promise he made during his first election campaign to be a "uniter," not a "divider." He'd have a monstrously difficult time getting Congress to make his tax cuts permanent. His desire to reform Social Security with private investment accounts likely would remain unfulfilled.

The scandals and the unpopular war are not all that are propelling Democrats this year. The party has fielded candidates who are more attractive and better financed than in many past campaigns.

There are nine House races where the GOP's funding advantage is minimal, allowing for upsets. However, we don't think the Democratic pockets are deep enough to bring about a rout in these contests. There are nine other races where Democrats have very narrow funding advantages -- but the Republican Party has ready money to pour into such contests. Sara Taylor, director of the White House Office of Political Affairs, says the Republican Party has a $56 million cash advantage over Democrats going into the final weeks of the campaign. That's a lot of TV ads.

MANY ON WALL STREET believe the Democrats will triumph this year, too. "I'm not a big believer in generic polls, but the 23-point lead that Democrats have over the GOP in the recent USA TODAY/Gallup Poll is about as wide as it gets," says Greg Valliere, chief political strategist for the Stanford Washington Research Group, a leading adviser to the Street. The poll Valliere cites showed 59% of respondents favoring Democratic candidates, 36% favoring Republicans and 5% undecided. "I threw in the towel for the Republicans a day or two after the Foley scandal broke," he says.

Even the "investors" who buy contracts on the Iowa Electronics Market are down on the Republicans for the first time in memory. Contracts that will be worth $1 if Hastert & Co. end up retaining control of the House on Nov. 7 are trading for around 30 cents -- hardly a vote of confidence.

You hardly can blame Democrats for feeling giddy as the mid-term contest approaches. The GOP Congress has proved more adept at producing scandal than legislative reforms, and the unrelenting bloodbath in Iraq doesn't instill strong public confidence in our commander-in-chief. Maryland Democratic Rep. Chris Van Hollen contends the GOP's old trump card, terrorism, no longer has an effect on voters because they perceive America's pacification effort in Iraq "is a mess and in chaos because of gross incompetence by the Bush administration."

There's no denying that the Democrats have fielded stronger candidates this time around. The effects of that will be on display throughout Election Day in close races around the country. Here's a rundown on some of the tightest.

In Connecticut's fourth congressional district, Republican Rep. Chris Shays is in a bruising rematch against Diane Goss Farrell, whom he narrowly beat in 2004. He's raised $3.2 million to her $2.5 million. That puts her within reach of an upset, but we reckon Shays' funding advantage will help him keep his seat, even though the district voted against Bush in the past two presidential elections.

In New Hampshire's second district, incumbent Republican Rep. Charlie Bass, who was elected in 1994, has raised a total of $918,789. The challenger, lawyer Paul Hodes, whom Bass beat handily in 2004, has raised about $1.1 million. Although Bass is the incumbent and within striking distance, it looks as though he's going to be knocked off, based on the money.

In Indiana's 9th district, in the southeastern part of that state, Republican incumbent Mike Sodrel looks as if he will survive a spirited challenge by Baron Hill. Sodrel unseated Hill in 2004 after losing to him in 2002. Sodrel has raised $2 million versus $1.2 million for Hill, a comfortable funding advantage.

When Barron's visited the 9th district in July, we wrote that Sodrel would face an uphill fight because Republicans there were angry at Bush for running up the deficit and for mismanaging the Iraq war. Not only is Bush unpopular in the district; so is GOP Gov. Mitch Daniels. The fundraising numbers tell us that the GOP base might have had second thoughts about voting for a Democrat. Still, we expect Democrats to unseat Republicans in two other Indiana congressional districts.

In Pennsylvania, pundits have written off Republican Sen. Rick Santorum, who has raised $17.3 million. His Democratic challenger, Bob Casey, who has raised $15 million, has a large lead in the polls. This is the first serious challenge for Santorum since he was elected in 1994. We see him defying the pollsters on Nov. 7 and hanging on to his seat, with voters from the Western part of the state riding to his rescue.

Take a look at how Jim McTague did with his picks in 2004. (Part 1 | Part 2)In Rhode Island, we predict Republican Lincoln Chafee will lose to democratic challenger Sheldon Whitehouse, a former U.S. attorney. Whitehouse has raised more than $4 million versus about $3.5 million for Chafee. According to the Center for Responsive politics, nearly 80% of the challenger's money comes from individuals as opposed to political committees. Chafee has raised about 50% from individuals. Clearly Whitehouse has a better organization.

With only two weeks to go, a barrage of contradictory poll findings is apt to confuse the oddsmakers, not to mention voters. But we're sticking with our numbers, and they say one thing: The Democrats don't have quite enough heft to push aside the elephant.

With Farrakhan Ill, the Nation of Islam Prepares for Change

Nearly 30 years after Louis Farrakhan seized control of the Nation of Islam, the organization is preparing for a change at the top. The controversial minister is battling what he has described as a "life-threatening" illness -- painful swelling of the prostate that has left him more than 30 pounds underweight, dehydrated, anemic and unwilling to eat.

Farrakhan, 73, recently relinquished his duties and turned control over to an executive panel of trusted lieutenants, exhorting them to move the Nation of Islam forward and prove that it is more than the charisma and influence of one man.

"The minister has good days. He has bad days," said Ishmael Muhammad, who leads the organization's flagship Mosque Maryam in Chicago and sits on the executive board. "The doctors are meeting to talk about what steps they can take to help him . . . so that he does not have to suffer through the pain he's constantly in."

Muhammad said the board runs the Nation of Islam's day-to-day responsibilities. It includes Abdul-Alim Muhammad, Farrakhan's medical adviser; Leonard Muhammad, the chief of staff; and Mustafa Farrakhan, one of the leader's sons.

Although they are considered equals, each board member is poised to take over the organization if Louis Farrakhan fails to fully recover.

Power struggles are nothing new within the deeply insular Nation of Islam. After leader Elijah Muhammad died in 1975, Farrakhan split with Wallace D. Mohammed, the son who replaced him, and started his own following.

Wallace Mohammed angered some members by renouncing his father's unorthodox teachings and seeking to convert the Nation to orthodox Sunni Islam. But Farrakhan, a former calypso singer, followed Elijah Muhammad's doctrine almost to the letter, mesmerizing black audiences with messages of social liberation and empowerment that culminated with the Million Man March in 1995, one of the largest African American gatherings in history.

"Minister Farrakhan has been one of the strongest voices in our community in terms of his critique against racism in the black community, and that voice has been important," said Ronald Walters, a University of Maryland professor of political science who teaches a course in black leadership.

But Farrakhan failed to follow through on his promises to unify black men, create jobs and make black communities self-sufficient, Walters said.

"It didn't go anywhere," he said. "He didn't lend himself to implementation. He went off into the desert, and we couldn't get the implementation and administration started."

A change in leadership could allow the Nation to move away from a controversial mythology. Followers are taught that the group's founder, Wallace Fard, was an incarnation of God and that a scientist named Yacub created white people, notions that are dismissed by orthodox Muslims.

Eight years ago, as he fought prostate cancer, Farrakhan softened his tone and sought to burnish an image that had been improving since the Million Man March. He said reports that he had called Judaism a "gutter religion" misquoted him, and he said he did not mean to offend.

But recently, Farrakhan returned to anti-Semitic statements. During a speech at the group's Savior's Day ceremony in February, he was quoted as saying that "false Jews promote the filth of Hollywood," including homosexuality. "You may not like me," he said, "but I don't give a damn. I'm throwing down the gauntlet today."

Such comments by the Nation of Islam leader are "offensive not only to Jews, but it hurts their credibility as an organization trying to lift up blacks," said Deborah Lauter, director of civil rights for the Anti-Defamation League, a Jewish organization. "Promoting hatred of Jews and whites diminishes the positive messages they're trying to send. The Jewish people will not sit at the table with hate groups, whether they are black or white."

Earlier this year, Farrakhan began experiencing pain that he says was a result of the radiation treatment he received for his bout with prostate cancer in 1998.

"As you know, I have been suffering from the after-effects of an extremely high dose of radiated seed," Farrakhan wrote in a statement last month. "Over time, these seeds have done severe internal damage."

He continued, "I am postponing indefinitely all engagements, meetings and appointments so that I can concentrate, with Allah's (God's) Help, to bring myself back to a state where I may be able to continue to serve the rise of our people."

Speaking more directly to his followers, he wrote, "I know that you (the Believers) will accept the challenge to move our Nation forward, being ever watchful for any smart, crooked deceiver and hypocrite who would create confusion over my present condition."

In Washington, Abdul-Alim Muhammad said the Nation of Islam will thrive with or without Farrakhan. "As we go forward, it will not be wise to think that we are going to produce someone like him," he said.

Although Farrakhan vowed to come back strong, "so that I can continue to serve because I do not believe that my earthly work is done," some followers, in private conversations, seemed uncertain about his future.

Benjamin Muhammad, who once ran the NAACP under the name Benjamin F. Chavis Jr., wished Farrakhan well and said he is in his prayers. But he said the illness is a difficult challenge to overcome.

DOJ_NMG_0084766

Ishmael Muhammad said speculation about life without Farrakhan "is premature when the man is still yet present among us." He said the Nation of Islam would continue to fight oppression through its members worldwide.

"We never discuss actual membership," he said. Critics have said the number of Nation of Islam followers has fallen greatly as black Americans convert to orthodox Islam.

Others outside the organization wondered whether it could last without Farrakhan's charismatic influence.

"My guess is that the NOI will be around in some form for the indefinite future," said Ibrahim Abdil-Mu'id Ramey, director of human and civil rights for the Muslim American Society's Freedom Foundation.

"It will not in my opinion be as large or vital as it is now. I think an analogy that might be appropriate is the analogy of the Garvey Movement."

When Marcus Garvey died in 1940, his Universal Negro Improvement Association faded almost to nothing. There are people today who keep its memory alive, Ramey said, "but it is no longer an organization at the forefront of the African American struggle."

Rice Criticizes Russia's Limits On News Media (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice criticized shrinking Russian press freedoms, questioned the enforcement of a restrictive new law on foreign private groups here and called for eased tensions between Russia and neighboring Georgia when she arrived here Saturday to discuss the North Korean nuclear crisis.

Ms. Rice's remarks raised the possibility of a testy atmosphere for the discussions in Moscow, the last stop of her pan-Asia trip aimed at urging tough enforcement of the Security Council sanctions imposed on North Korea a week ago in response to its Oct. 9 underground nuclear test.

In a symbolic decision that no doubt will be scrutinized by the Kremlin leadership, Ms. Rice invited senior editors of Novaya Gazeta, a leading independent journal, to a meeting at her hotel. The session, which included the son of the assassinated journalist Anna Politkovskaya, came just before she headed into official government meetings.

Earlier, Ms. Rice said that the future of a free Russian press and electronic media "is a major concern" of the United States government.

"There is still an independent print press," she said. "Unfortunately, there is not much left of independent television in Russia."

Ms. Politkovskaya, shot to death this month in what appeared to be a professional killing, had made a name for herself with tough reporting on the war in Chechnya, and was a fierce critic of the administration of President Vladimir V. Putin.

Mr. Putin, who was to meet with Ms. Rice not long after her session with Ms. Politkovskaya's colleagues and the journalist's son, Ilya Politkovsky, has described the killing as "a crime of loathsome brutality," but also said that "her influence on political life was extremely insignificant in scale."

Ms. Rice told correspondents traveling aboard her plane that she also would ask Russian leaders to explain the enforcement of a new law that requires foreign nongovernmental organizations to register with the government. The deadline for registration was last Thursday, and dozens of the groups, many of them highly critical of the Kremlin, were told to cease operations until their registration applications had been processed. How long that will take is unclear.

"In some cases it is being implemented in ways that are making it difficult for NGO's to operate, and so I think we have to go over that," Ms. Rice said.

A senior State Department official, speaking on condition of anonymity in accordance with diplomatic protocol, said later Saturday that three organizations at the center of the debate — the National Democratic Institute, the International Republican Institute and the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace — had successfully registered. Even so, the official said, the United States still sees no guarantee that "Russia will not abuse this law and this process."

As she began a day of meetings that was to include lunch with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and a dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov, Ms. Rice said she planned to urge Moscow to reduce any chance for increasing conflict with neighboring Georgia. Simmering Russia-Georgia animosity escalated this month after Georgia detained four Russian military personnel for suspected espionage.

The senior State Department official described Ms. Rice's discussions with Mr. Lavrov on Georgia as "constructive." The official added: "I'm not here to tell you that all will be well. I'm here to tell you we had a good conversation" on potential steps to help ease tensions between the two countries.

On North Korea, Ms. Rice cast doubts on South Korean press reports that the North's leader, Kim Jong-il, had expressed regret to a visiting Chinese envoy for ordering the nuclear test and had pledged not to detonate another nuclear device.

Ms. Rice said she was given no information to confirm those press reports during her talks in Beijing on Friday and said she believed that the North Koreans "would like to see an escalation of the tension."

During her talks in Moscow, Ms. Rice said, she also intended to discuss efforts to halt not only North Korea's nuclear program, but Iran's. Before her arrival, Mr. Lavrov, the foreign minister, told a Kuwaiti news service that his government would not allow the Security Council to be a vehicle for pressuring Iran over its nuclear program.

Moscow Meeting Highlights Concerns On Press Freedom (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Saturday interrupted her diplomacy on the North Korean nuclear crisis to meet with the son of a slain Russian journalist and top editors of her newspaper, saying that "the fate of journalists in Russia is a major concern."

Rice's high-profile meeting, scheduled at the request of the State Department, came shortly before she met with Russian President Vladimir Putin, primarily to discuss Russia's implementation of sanctions on North Korea for testing a nuclear device.

Rice arrived here Saturday after stops in Japan, South Korea and China, and her decision to highlight her concern about eroding press freedoms in Russia indicated the delicate balance the Bush administration is trying to strike with Russia. One of Rice's aides said the meeting was intended to express condolences and offer support for independent journalism. "It was not a poke in the eye but the right thing to do," he said.

Anna Politkovskaya, a veteran journalist who had sharply criticized the Kremlin and its proxies in the conflict in Chechnya, was shot four times on Oct. 7, presumably for her reporting. No senior Russian officials attended her funeral, which attracted thousands of mourners.

"Anna Politkovskaya was a particularly well-known and well-respected journalist, so I think it's important to note that," Rice told reporters traveling with her from Beijing to Moscow, previewing the comments she made to the editors of Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where Politkovskaya had worked.

Novaya Gazeta is "one of the best independent voices in Russia," Rice said, noting that the country still has independent print media and some independent radio. "Unfortunately, there is not much left of independent television in Russia," she said.

When Rice entered the meeting with the journalists, she introduced herself and made brief opening remarks in Russian before reverting to using an interpreter.

Dmitry Muratov, editor-in-chief of Novaya Gazeta, gave Rice some books and copies of the newspaper dedicated to Politkovskaya. The slain journalist's son, Ilya, 28, a public relations specialist, said he agreed with Rice's comments about his mother's courage and the tragedy of her loss, but he declined to comment on Rice's statements on press freedoms. He said that was not his area of expertise.

Rice on Saturday also cast doubt on a widely publicized report that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had assured Chinese officials he would not conduct a second nuclear test. The Chinese envoy who met with Kim "did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or that he would not ever test again," she said.

Rice Takes Time Out From North Korea To Push Russia On Rights (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 22, 2006

US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice broke away from her North Korea crisis mission to send some pointed messages to President Vladimir Putin's government over human rights and other sore points in US-Russian relations.

Rice arrived from Beijing at midday for a flurry of meetings with Putin, Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov that were to focus primarily on implementing UN Security Council resolution 1718 imposing sanctions on North Korea over its recent nuclear test.

But she found time to meet at her request with editors of Novaya Gazeta, the independent newspaper of slain investigative journalist Anna Politkovskaya, and also questioned the Russian leaders over human rights issues.

Rice requested the encounter, which took place in a Moscow hotel, a State Department official said.

Politkovskaya's son, Ilya Politkovsky, 28, was also present.

The journalist, a prominent Kremlin critic who investigated corruption and human rights abuses, was gunned down this month outside her Moscow apartment in what police said was a contract killing.

No arrests have been made in the case, the 13th apparently deliberate killing of a journalist since Putin came to power in 2000.

DOJ_NMG_0084768

Independent media have dwindled significantly under Putin's rule, with virtually all television networks now under state control and many radios and newspapers held by interests close to the Kremlin, US officials said.

Two days after Politkovskaya's October 7 murder, Rice warned the Russian government "that everybody is watching, that an investigation of this event is absolutely necessary."

In an emotional encounter, Rice, a Russia scholar and expert in the history of the former Soviet Union, briefly addressed the group in Russian before making a few remarks in English on the purpose of her one-day Moscow visit.

A senior State Department official said Rice wanted to hold the meeting "as part condolences... and part support for what is left of a free media in Russia."

He denied the meeting was intended as a slight to Putin.

"We certainly didn't plan it as a poke in the eye, but the right thing to do," he said.

In addition to concerns about press freedom under Putin, Rice said she and her aides would ask about a new law requiring foreign non-governmental organisations (NGOs) to register with authorities.

The NGOs, including Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch, have complained that the law is a bid by Putin to monitor and restrict their work, which often involves investigating alleged human rights abuses in the country.

A deadline for registration passed on Thursday and a number of NGOs that did not submit their documents in time were forced temporarily to suspend their operations, though Russian officials said most did comply on time and promptly received new registration.

The State Department's point man for Europe, Dan Fried, discussed the issue Saturday with Russia's Human Rights ombudsman, Vladimir Lukin, a senior official said.

While the Americans welcomed the fact that some major US NGOs had received their registration, there were still concerns the law could be misused in future, the official said.

"I can't say with confidence that the Russians will not abuse this law," he said.

Rice and her delegation also raised the flare-up in tensions between Russia and the pro-US government of the former Soviet republic of Georgia and reports of harrassment of Georgians living in Russia.

Relations between the two states soured dramatically after Georgia arrested four Russian military officers accused of spying last month.

The four were quickly released, but the two governments remain locked in confrontation over two breakaway Georgian regions, Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which have received support from Moscow.

Georgia has threatened to use military force against the rogue regions, a move that could spark a conflict with Russia.

"Cooler heads need to prevail here... because that is the kind of problem that can get out of control," Rice said before meeting with the Russians.

The senior official said the two sides held constructive talks on the crisis and "the Russians acknowledged that they don't want to go over the cliff, to have some terrible blowup with the Georgians that destabilizes the South Caucasus."

Rice Prods Moscow On Press Freedom, Iran (AP)

By Anne Gearan

AP, October 22, 2006

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Saturday delivered a symbolic rebuke to Russia over shrinking press freedoms even as she courted President Vladimir Putin for help punishing Iran over its nuclear program.

Rice made a point of scheduling an interview with Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where a reporter critical of Russian policy in neighboring Chechnya had worked before her murder this month. Rice also met with the reporter's son.

Rice's one-day trip to Moscow followed talks in Asia last week over North Korea's nuclear test on Oct. 9. Russia voted for U.N. penalties against North Korea after the test, and the United States is seeking Russian cooperation for an upcoming vote on sanctions against Iran.

Yet even before Rice arrived in the Russian capital, her Russian counterpart said Moscow will not allow the Security Council to be used for punitive measures against Iran. Russia, however, was ready to discuss ways to pressure Iran into accepting broader international oversight of its nuclear program, Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said.

"Any measures of influence should encourage creating conditions for talks," Lavrov said in an interview with the Kuwaiti News Agency KUNA that was posted on the Russian Foreign Ministry Web site Saturday.

"We won't be able to support and will oppose any attempts to use the Security Council to punish Iran or use Iran's program in order to promote the ideas of regime change there," according to the interview Friday.

A draft resolution is expected to be introduced in the Security Council early this week, and diplomats have said they would seek limited penalties for Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

DOJ_NMG_0084769

Rice's decision to meet with Novaya Gazeta editors and reporters was a reminder to Putin of the widening rift between Russia and the U.S. over what the Bush administration sees as a rollback of democratic gains under the Russian president.

She met privately with Putin later Saturday.

Previewing her message to the newspaper editors, Rice told reporters traveling with her that she wanted to speak to one of a shrinking number of "independent voices" in Russian media.

"The fate of journalists in Russia is a major concern," Rice said. "Anna Politkovskaya was a particularly well-known and well-respected journalist so I think it's important to note that."

Politkovskaya repeatedly had accused Chechen Prime Minister Ramzan Kadyrov's security forces of abducting, torturing and killing innocent people. Her newspaper posthumously published her last story that described alleged torture by the Kremlin-backed Chechen security services.

Politkovskaya, a sharp critic of Putin and the conduct of the Kremlin and of Russia's war in Chechnya, was found shot dead at her Moscow apartment building.

Since Putin's election more than six years ago, he has presided over what critics have called a steady rollback in press freedoms won since the Soviet Union's collapse. Top independent television stations have been shut down and print media are under growing pressure from officials.

Putin said the killers had done the Russian government no favor. The killing "inflicts much greater damage to the government than any of her writing," he said after the killing.

The media rights group Reporters Without Borders has called Putin one of the world's press freedom "predators."

Rice's last Asian stop was in Beijing, North Korea's traditional ally, where she met with a Chinese government envoy just back from a hastily arranged visit with North Korean leader Kim Jong Il.

Rice said the envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, told her nothing that confirmed news reports about conciliatory moves from the North.

"Councilor Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or said that he would never test again," Rice said, adding that she does not know the source of widely circulated South Korean media reports to the contrary.

"I don't know whether or not Kim Jong Il said any such thing. But the Chinese ... in a fairly thorough briefing to me about the talks, said nothing," that confirms it, Rice said.

Lavrov, in the Kuwaiti interview, urged the U.S. and North Korea to settle issues such as U.S.-imposed financial restrictions in order to clear the way for international talks to resume on the North's nuclear program.

"Both sides should show flexibility," he said.

Rice's Visit To Newspaper Seen As Rebuke To Putin (WT/AP)

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice delivered a symbolic rebuke yesterday to Russia over shrinking press freedoms even as she courted President Vladimir Putin for help punishing Iran over its nuclear program.

Miss Rice made a point of scheduling an interview with Novaya Gazeta, the newspaper where a reporter critical of Russian policy in neighboring Chechnya had worked before her slaying this month. Miss Rice also met with the reporter's son.

Miss Rice's one-day trip to Moscow followed talks in Asia last week over North Korea's nuclear test on Oct. 9.

Diplomatic Juggling Act In Russia (LAT)

By David Holley

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Rice discusses nuclear issues with Putin and officials, and shows support for press freedom.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice pressed Russia for a tougher stance against nuclear proliferation Saturday while fitting into her schedule a gesture of support for press freedom here.

In a diplomatic juggling act, Rice met with President Vladimir V. Putin and other officials, but also risked the Kremlin's ire by meeting with editors of the newspaper Novaya Gazeta.

Anna Politkovskaya, a prominent reporter for the newspaper who had been a fierce critic of Putin, was gunned down outside her home Oct. 7. The apparent assassination has not been solved.

Rice squeezed an afternoon meeting with Politkovskaya's colleagues between sessions with Foreign Minister Sergei V. Lavrov and with Putin. She was also scheduled to have a late dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov.

Few details emerged on the results of Rice's meetings, which culminated a four-nation tour that began in Asia and focused on North Korea's nuclear program. U.S. officials had no immediate comment on the talk with Putin.

A senior State Department official said that in her meeting with Lavrov "there was a discussion of next steps" to be taken in regard to Iran's nuclear research. "This was a decent exchange, a good exchange, and I think we're making progress," he said. "But I don't want to predict next steps."

This week, the U.N. Security Council is scheduled to consider a draft resolution on Iran that is expected to call for penalties over Tehran's refusal to suspend uranium enrichment.

Russian presidential spokesman Alexei Gromov told reporters that Rice had briefed Putin on her visits to Tokyo, Seoul and Beijing.

"The president and the secretary of State shared perspectives on issues relating to North Korea as well as on more general issues of nuclear non-proliferation," Gromov said, according to the Russian news agency RIA Novosti.

Speaking on her airplane with reporters traveling with her, Rice said that in her meetings with Russian officials she would discuss steps to implement the recent U.N. resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea in response to its Oct. 9 nuclear test.

She mentioned possible U.S.-Russian cooperation in enforcing sanctions against North Korea under the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative, which involves a group of 16 countries that have agreed to take steps to stop the flow of weapons of mass destruction, including boarding ships for inspections.

Rice also said, according to a State Department transcript, that she would discuss relations between Russia and Georgia, a former Soviet republic. The relationship has withered in recent months over several issues, including Russian support for separatists in Georgia.

"I think we've been clear with both sides that cooler heads need to prevail here," she said.

The State Department official said that in the meeting with Novaya Gazeta, Rice wanted to show support for Politkovskaya's family, the newspaper and the remaining independent media in Russia.

There was no intent to insult Putin, he added.

DOJ_NMG_0084771

"We certainly didn't plan it as a poke in the eye, but an absolutely necessary and human step," he said. Politkovskaya was born in the United States when her father was a Soviet diplomat at the United Nations, and she held dual Russian and American citizenship. She made her career in Russia, achieving prominence for her coverage of human rights abuses in war-torn Chechnya.

The journalist's son, Ilya Politkovsky, 28, was present at the meeting.

"I was touched to the soul to see how Condoleezza Rice, both as a person and a politician, found precise, delicate and tactful words to express her deep sorrow and sympathy in front of the slain journalist's son," said Dmitry Muratov, editor of Novaya Gazeta. He declined to comment further on what Rice said about political issues or press freedoms, or to allow the release of a transcript before the next edition of his newspaper, which comes out Monday.

In her comments to reporters en route to Moscow, Rice cast doubt on reports in South Korean and Japanese media claiming that North Korean leader Kim Jong Il had told a Chinese envoy, State Councilor Tang Jiaxuan, that Pyongyang was contrite about the test and had no plan to explode a second nuclear device.

"Councilor Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong Il either apologized for the test or said that he would not ever test again," Rice said.

Rice said that China's vote in the Security Council in favor of sanctions against North Korea marked a "very unusual and quite significant" step by Beijing.

"I don't think that there is any doubt that Chinese attitudes about North Korea are evolving," Rice said. "I cannot conceive of even a short time ago China agreeing to call North Korea's behavior a threat to international peace and security."

Thugs Pillage Moscow Art Gallery, Beating Its Activist Owner (NYT)

By Sophia Kishkovsky

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — A group of men burst into a contemporary art gallery here Saturday, destroying work by an ethnic Georgian artist and beating up the owner, Marat Guelman. Mr. Guelman is well known both for his display of politically inspired and irreverent art and, most recently, his public attacks on neofascists for their dislike of non-Russians and of Western influence on Russian society.

Mr. Guelman said the attack was carried out by 10 men who looked like skinheads. The attack was the latest incident to raise troubling questions about xenophobia and freedom of expression in Russia.

On Friday, Russian officials seized 11 pieces of art that Mr. Guelman had exhibited. The art was on consignment to a London gallery owner, Matthew Bown, who was taking the pieces out of the country when he was detained at Sheremetyevo-2 airport on Friday.

The photo collages that were seized included one depicting President Vladimir Putin, President Bush and Osama bin Laden lounging in boxer shorts and another of a veiled suicide bomber with her skirt held up to reveal racy lingerie.

Mr. Bown was allowed to leave for London, but the artwork was not released.

It is unclear whether the seizure of the artwork on Friday and the attack on the gallery were related, coincidence or driven by news about the airport seizure on the radio and the Internet. Mr. Guelman has made a fair number of enemies this year because of his public criticism of neofascists and nationalists.

He is now on a list of “enemies of Russia” that is being circulated on the Internet by Russian neofascists.

Anna Politkovskaya, the journalist who was gunned down in her apartment building on Oct. 7, was also on the list, as are many prominent human rights advocates. Ms. Politkovskaya made her name as a searing critic of the Kremlin and its policies in Chechnya.

Mr. Guelman has also angered Russian Orthodox fundamentalists with his criticism of their influence on politics and for displaying artwork they consider antireligious. Although he has long cultivated connections with the Kremlin, he has been increasingly critical of Mr. Putin.

It was also unclear whether the attack on the gallery and the Georgian art was related to anti-Georgian sentiment that has surged this fall.

Tensions between the Kremlin and President Mikheil Saakashvili of Georgia led to a crackdown on Georgians in Russia this month. The government has accused some Georgian-owned businesses of violating health or other regulatory standards and has deported hundreds of ethnic Georgians deemed to be in Russia illegally.

In a telephone interview on Saturday evening after he was released from the hospital, Mr. Guelman said he had been treated for a broken nose and other injuries.

He said 10 men dressed in dark blue and wearing hats and heavy boots charged into the gallery at around noon, forced the employees against a wall, seized their phones and then proceeded to vandalize the artwork and attack him.

"They started to beat me with their shoes, with chairs," he said. "Then they threw a computer at me. It was awful."

He said pieces of graphic art by Alexander Djikia, a Moscow-based ethnic Georgian artist who has lived in the United States, were destroyed and paintings by him were damaged. Mr. Djikia could not be reached for comment.

The official RIA Novosti news agency said Saturday that the Moscow prosecutor's office had opened a criminal investigation into the gallery attack.

Aleksandr Brod, the director of the Moscow Bureau of Human Rights, which tracks xenophobia and hate crimes in Russia, said the attack on Saturday highlighted troubling currents. Mr. Brod is also on the list of "enemies of Russia."

"Such demonstrative attacks on famous people are becoming the norm," he said. "This is a big misfortune and serious grounds for the authorities to stop and think," he said.

In Anti-Immigrant Mood, Russia Heeds Gadfly's Cry (NYT)

By Steven Lee Myers

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 — Aleksandr A. Belov found wide publicity last year when the organization he created gave a cash award to a Russian woman accused of stabbing an Armenian taxi driver to death. During her trial, covered with lurid relish by the news media, she testified that the driver had tried to rape her.

"She rid Moscow of a rapist," Mr. Belov told a radio station at the time. Not just a rapist, however: a rapist from abroad. He went on to assert that half of all serious crimes were committed by immigrants, the issue at the heart of his personal mission and, by all appearances, his growing public prominence.

A court convicted the woman, Aleksandra Ivannikova. But the verdict was later overturned after a public outcry amplified in no small part by Mr. Belov and the group he started four years ago, the Movement Against Illegal Immigration.

Now after years on the fringes of polite conversation, Mr. Belov's views — unabashedly hostile to foreigners, at times unflinchingly racial in character — are no longer just tapping a nativistic undercurrent, but moving into the mainstream of the political debate. Or perhaps the mainstream is moving toward them.

"The president has made statements in the last couple of weeks that are practically identical to what we were calling for a year ago," Mr. Belov said in a lengthy interview on Wednesday, referring to President Vladimir V. Putin. "I cannot say that our group directly influenced the president, but we identified this problem earlier."

The problem, in his view, is immigrants, almost all of them former comrades of the Soviet Union, divided now not only by new borders but also by religion and ethnicity.

Like immigrants everywhere, they have come in search of work. And as elsewhere, their presence has fueled resentment, cultural clashes and, especially here in Russia, a wave of racial violence that has included at least 39 racially motivated killings this year, according to Sova, an organization that monitors hate crimes.

On Oct. 5, Mr. Putin gave such simmering feelings a public endorsement, denouncing the "semi-gangs, some of them ethnic" that control Russia's wholesale and retail markets, where many migrants work. He said markets should be regulated "with a view to protect the interests of Russian producers and population, the native Russian population."

Mr. Putin's remarks echoed complaints voiced widely last month in Kondopoga, a small mill town in northern Russia. A bar fight there ended with the deaths of two ethnic Russians and led to mass protests and ultimately a violent rampage on Oct. 2 that destroyed markets and other businesses owned by Chechens and other immigrants, who fled the town in fear. A common grievance heard afterward was that the newcomers had criminally cornered the city's markets.

"Criminal groups play a major role in markets," Mr. Putin said a month later. "And all of this results in our citizens being rightly indignant."

In Kondopoga that day, standing and holding a microphone, was Mr. Belov. His exact remarks — whether he called for the expulsion of the migrants or not — remain a matter of dispute, but he is unapologetic about what unfolded there.

"Russians are a sufficiently tolerant people," he said during the interview, conducted in a Japanese restaurant in southern Moscow. "We have lived a long time with a huge number of people. We are like a family. And one day the mother-in-law comes to visit, and everything is fine. But then the mother-in-law brings her brother, her mother, uncles, aunts. Then they decide to live forever in your apartment. And you have to say, 'Mother-in-law, you cannot come to visit anymore.' "

Mr. Belov is 30, part of the first post-Soviet generation in Russia, a country that is still struggling, in a way, to define itself and its ideology. The Soviet Union endeavored to erase ethnic and racial boundaries, at least officially. And its collapse gave rise to a new Russian nationalism, founded on the language, culture and history of the Russian Empire, on the Orthodox Church and on an abiding preoccupation with ethnic identity.

He said Russia, despite its ethnic diversity, was never a country open to immigration or assimilation, but rather an empire that conquered others, who then had to adapt to the majority's values. "Russia is not, like the United States, a country that was founded by immigrants," he said. "It was founded as a nationalist state."

Post-Soviet Russia has produced other nationalists. Some are blatant racists operating in the shadows. Some are members of religious or social organizations. Still others are politicians, most notably the leader of the Liberal Democratic Party, Vladimir V. Zhirinovsky, a former presidential candidate known for his clownish antics and expressions of xenophobia.

Mr. Belov is far less flamboyant and, he said, uninterested in politics — or at least becoming a politician. "Elections in Russia," he said, "are just a formality." Instead, he vows to throw his support to any party that "subscribes to our views."

He grew up in Moscow, the son of parents who worked in science. He has spent his working life in civic groups. He was a member of Pamyat, an ultranationalist organization that emerged in the chaos of the Soviet collapse but has since faded from public view, with many of its leaders jailed for anti-Semitic statements and acts. His family name was originally Potkin, but he changed it, he said, to disassociate himself from his previous position at Pamyat. (Belov is derived from the Russian word for white.)

Mr. Belov argues that his cause is not based on race, but solely on the issue of immigration, and the illegal sort above all. He created the Movement Against Illegal Immigration in 2002 in response to racially charged incidents in small cities near Moscow: a gang rape in Khimki blamed on immigrants; and a fight between immigrants and local residents in Krasnoarmeisk.

For a time, the group, known here by its initials in Russian as D.N.P.I., existed largely in cyberspace. Its members railed against immigrants and their crimes, but also against citizens of Russia, especially those from Chechnya and the Northern Caucasus, a predominately Muslim region. ("In the Caucasus, people live on a different civilizational level of development," Mr. Belov said.)

Raising money online and gathering political support among like-minded politicians, the group has become more organized. It now claims thousands of members in branches across all of Russia. Last November, at the time of Ms. Ivannikova's acquittal, Mr. Belov's group joined others in a mass demonstration in Moscow on a newly created holiday known as Day of National Unity.

Rights organizations denounced the march as an ugly expression of hate and a mockery of the holiday, which replaced the old one commemorating the Bolshevik Revolution.

The authorities also appeared shocked by the crowd and the message, though they had granted a permit for the rally.

A year later, at Mr. Putin's directive, the authorities have begun the most aggressive campaign against immigrants to date.

The arrests of four Russian military officers for spying in Georgia last month precipitated a wave of harassment against Georgians living here.

The authorities have closed casinos, restaurants and markets where Georgians worked and deported hundreds of Georgians, including more this week, saying they were here illegally.

The anti-Georgian campaign has roots in the Kremlin's hostility to Georgia's politics and its president, Mikheil Saakashvili, of course. Its results, however, fit seamlessly with Mr. Belov's prescription for what ails Russia.

Mr. Belov and the movement have not been fully embraced by the authorities.

Dozens of the movement's members have been arrested for holding unsanctioned protests; Mr. Belov himself was detained briefly in July.

The group has applied for a permit to hold another Day of National Unity march, but has not yet received one.

Mr. Belov said the Kremlin feared all public protests, wary of what he called "this mythical orange revolution," referring to the mass protests in Ukraine in 2004 that overturned a fraudulent election.

"The government," he said, "should not be afraid of its own people."

Georgia Denies Military Plan (LAT/AP)

From The Associated Press

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili on Saturday ruled out the use of force to establish control over two pro-Russian separatist regions.

He also said Tbilisi remained open to dialogue with Moscow to reduce tension that has escalated since the former Soviet republic temporarily detained four purported Russian spies last month.

"We certainly, absolutely, categorically are not starting any military confrontation," Saakashvili said.

His comments were a rebuttal to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's assertion Friday at a summit with European Union leaders that Georgia was planning to take back South Ossetia and Abkhazia by military means.

Abkhazia and South Ossetia, which broke away from Georgia's control during bloody wars in the early 1990s, receive strong Russian backing. Many residents in both regions hold Russian passports. Fears are strong that the escalating tensions between Moscow and Tbilisi could trigger an outbreak of violence that could draw in the entire volatile Caucasus.

Putin sidestepped European appeals for moderation on Georgia. "The situation is developing in the direction of possible bloodshed," he told reporters Friday. He accused Georgia of trying to take back the two regions "by military means."

Russia Warns Against Iran 'Regime Change' Through UN (AFP)

AFP, October 22, 2006

Russia would oppose any effort to use the UN Security Council to promote a change of regime in Iran, Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov has said in an interview.

"We cannot support and will actively oppose any attempt to use the Security Council to punish Iran or to use Iran's nuclear program in order to promote the idea of regime change" in Tehran, Lavrov said in the transcript of an interview with the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA, released by the Russian foreign ministry on Saturday.

Lavrov added that Russia regarded the threat of nuclear weapons proliferation as an "extremely serious" problem and called on Iran to respect international demands aimed at ensuring that its nuclear program posed no threat in this regard.

"We believe that the Iranian side must finally bow to the constructive proposals that have been made and fully cooperate with the IAEA to answer all currently outstanding questions" about its nuclear ambitions, Lavrov said.

The interview with Lavrov was conducted on Friday and the transcript was released by the foreign ministry as he held talks in Moscow with US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, who arrived in the Russian capital Saturday on the final stop of a trip focusing on the North Korea crisis.

The United States has accused Iran of seeking to develop nuclear weapons under cover of a nuclear power program that is being developed with Russia's help. Tehran has consistently denied this charge, maintaining that the program is strictly for energy production, and therefore allowed by treaty.

Lavrov said that the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), the UN nuclear watchdog agency, at present had no way of telling whether or not there was a military component to Iran's fledgling nuclear program.

At the same time however, IAEA experts still had several "serious questions" about Tehran's nuclear program, based on their own inspections of Iranian nuclear facilities, that Iranian nuclear negotiators had promised to answer fully.

"We firmly call on our Iranian colleagues to provide these answers as soon as possible," Lavrov said, stressing that it was Iranian nuclear negotiators themselves who had pledged to provide detailed clarifications on a number of points.

"But all this does not mean that the presence of a threat to peace and security can be confirmed. And it is only such a threat that can provide a basis for sanctions," he said.

Lavrov reiterated Russia's position that only IAEA nuclear inspectors had the expertise and the access to determine whether or not Iran's nuclear program did indeed pose a threat, and insisted this idea was at the core of the UN resolution on Iran adopted in July.

Rice Gets Russia Assurances On North Korea Sanctions (AFP)

By David Millikin

AFP, October 22, 2006

Russia has indicated it would strictly enforce sanctions on North Korea as US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met top leaders in Moscow at the end of a tour to push for full implementation of the UN penalties in response to Pyongyang's nuclear test.

"It seems clear that the Russians take 1718 seriously," a senior State Department official said Saturday after Rice held talks with Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov, referring to the UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea.

"They talked about tightening some of their controls on the border," the official said, adding: "They are interested in working with us" on the sanctions.

There was no immediate comment from Russian officials on Lavrov's talks with Rice.

Rice was due to hold separate meetings with President Vladimir Putin and Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov, though all of her meetings in Moscow were closed to media.

She arrived in the Russian capital Saturday from China and was scheduled to depart Sunday.

Speaking to reporters aboard her plane en route to Russia, Rice said the purpose of her stop in Russia at the end of a five-day swing that included visits to Japan, South Korea and China was to coordinate tactics to counter the threat posed by North Korea's recent nuclear bomb test.

"The purpose of this visit is to continue the discussions about the North Korean nuclear test and adherence to resolution 1718," Rice said.

"Since Russia is part of the six-party framework, we can talk as we have in other places about the path back to diplomacy should North Korea choose that path. The trip to Moscow really is a continuation of the work with the members of the five parties on the North Korean file."

Rice queried reports that North Korean leader Kim Jong-Il had apologized for the nuclear bomb test his country carried out on October 9 and, according to South Korea's Yonhap news agency, had promised that the country would not conduct a second test.

"I don't know whether or not Kim Jong-Il said any such thing," Rice said.

She said she had heard nothing of the kind in her discussions in Beijing with Tang Jiaxuan, China's special envoy on North Korea who on Thursday became the first foreign official to meet Kim face to face since the October 9 test.

"Tang did not tell me that Kim Jong-il either apologized for the test or said that he would not ever test again."

Lavrov said prior to his meeting with Rice that both the United States and North Korea needed to be flexible in resolving their differences.

"Both sides need to show flexibility," Lavrov said in an interview with the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA, the transcript of which was published on the Russian foreign ministry's website.

Rice's visits to Japan, South Korea and China this week focused on how to implement UN sanctions, which include international inspections of North Korean cargo.

Her talks in Seoul and Tokyo were inconclusive in terms of securing specific promises on implementation of these cargo inspections.

The United States says it wants to prevent the North, which US President George W. Bush has described as part of an "axis of evil," from transferring weapons of mass destruction and nuclear know-how to groups and governments hostile to the United States.

In addition to withdrawing from the Nuclear Non-Proliferation Treaty in 2003, North Korea is also on the list of nations that have not joined an international treaty banning chemical weapons.

Rice has been urging nations to vigorously enforce the sanctions and take a hard line on Pyongyang.

Prior to Rice's arrival in Moscow, North Korea said that US joint war games with South Korea, coming in the wake of the recent imposition of fresh UN sanctions, were pushing the region to the edge of war.

The statement, carried by the official Korean Central News Agency, said North Korea possessed a "tremendous war deterrent" and also warned Japan against taking part in any future joint exercises.

"The US is ceaselessly staging DPRK-targeted war exercises in the sky, on the ground and in the sea of the Korean Peninsula and its vicinity," it said, using the initials of the Democratic People's Republic of Korea.

"This is a grave provocation driving the situation on the peninsula to the brink of war and a dangerous play with fire aimed at igniting a war against the DPRK," it said, citing one ongoing operation and another war game planned for next week in South Korea.

Although Rice and other US officials insisted that the Moscow visit was about North Korea, Rice also said that she would raise a variety of other issues with her Russian hosts, including controversial regulations for non-governmental organizations (NGOs) and the crisis with Georgia.

Rice Sees Bright Spot In China's New Role Since N. Korean Test (WP)

By Glenn Kessler

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

MOSCOW, Oct. 21 -- President Bush came into office six years ago deeply skeptical of Chinese intentions, casting doubt on the idea advanced by the Clinton administration that there could be a "strategic partnership" between China and the United States.

Now, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice and other U.S. officials have begun to depict China's increasingly central role in the administration's myriad foreign policy problems as a significant achievement.

Rice, who arrived here Saturday on the last leg of her mission to galvanize action against North Korea, said she saw "some data points" that suggest China is becoming more of a partner on issues of importance to the United States, though the shift will not "happen in one fell swoop."

There is some evidence of China's shift, but the argument also has the virtue of finding a silver lining in the dark strategic cloud posed by North Korea's test of a nuclear weapon.

Many experts regard North Korea's test as a failure of Bush's nonproliferation policy. Critics have charged that Bush, distracted by Iraq, allowed North Korea to bolt from a Clinton-era agreement on freezing its nuclear programs, build a stockpile of weapons-grade plutonium and finally test a weapon. Bush, unlike President Bill Clinton in an earlier crisis, refused to conduct sustained bilateral negotiations with North Korea and instead set up a somewhat cumbersome six-party negotiating framework hosted by China.

At many points, the United States found itself at odds with other partners in the six-party process, such as China and South Korea, which repeatedly urged the Bush administration to show more flexibility in its tactics. Meanwhile, administration officials were often divided on North Korea policy, with some wanting to engage the country and others wanting to isolate it.

Before North Korea announced it had detonated a nuclear device, some senior officials even said they were quietly rooting for a test, believing that would finally clarify the debate within the administration.

On her trip to Asia this week, Rice has come close to saying the test was a net plus for the United States. She has tried to deflect criticism by saying the test was an affirmation, rather than a failure, of the Bush administration's policy of trying to draw China deeper into negotiations on North Korea.

Noting that North Korea has spent three decades developing a nuclear weapon, Rice said it was "very unusual and quite significant" that China, which has traditionally considered sanctions to be a violation of national sovereignty, supported a tough U.N. Security Council resolution punishing North Korea. The resolution is under Chapter 7 of the U.N. charter, which calls for mandatory sanctions for issues affecting international security.

"I don't care how many times you visited Pyongyang," Rice said, referring to a trip made by then-Secretary of State Madeleine K. Albright to the North Korean capital in 2000. "China had to be part of this regime to deal with the North Korea nuclear problem, and you're seeing it. Thirty years ago, you wouldn't have been able to get a Security Council resolution on North Korea, and when you get one it's Chapter 7, it's 15-0 and China's at the center of it. Not bad for a couple years' work."

Rice acknowledged that it was still unclear how hard the Chinese government would push North Korea, although she said China's views on the issue were "evolving." She said China had concerns about North Korea's stability and the prospect of a mass influx of refugees if the government collapses. And though China has always valued the status quo, Rice said: "I don't think that they are making a lot of assumptions about the status quo."

China is very concerned, for example, that Japan might decide to build a nuclear arsenal in response to North Korea's test. The Japanese government has ruled that out for now. But when Rice visited Tokyo on her first stop, officials there wanted to focus almost exclusively on receiving firm assurances that Japan is still protected by the U.S. nuclear umbrella. The test "had set off a lot of questions that the Japanese were asking about their own security posture," Rice said.

In addition to the North Korea discussions, China is an important participant in the drive to roll back Iran's nuclear program. China also has extensive oil investments in Sudan, which has adamantly rebuffed a U.S.-led push to bring U.N. peacekeepers to Sudan's troubled Darfur region.

In 2005, when China abstained from a U.N. resolution launching a war crimes investigation into atrocities in Darfur, U.S. officials reported that China's state-owned petroleum company immediately erected billboards in Khartoum, the Sudanese capital, attesting to China's friendship with Sudan. But in Rice's talks with Chinese officials Friday, she said she was able to have "more concrete discussions" about how to deal with Sudan, including strategizing on an upcoming meeting of African leaders in Beijing.

U.S. Reaffirms Promise To Defend S.Korea (AP)

By William C. Mann

AP, October 22, 2006

The U.S. is pledging "immediate support" of South Korea as part of a "firm" commitment to defend its ally under America's nuclear umbrella, stronger language than in last year's version of their long-standing policy statement.

Noting North Korea's nuclear test Oct. 9, Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung "demanded that North Korea refrain from any further action that might aggravate tensions," according to the joint communique made public Saturday.

Both sides agreed that North Korea's "continued development" of weapons of mass destruction and long-range missiles, and the threat of proliferation were "a challenge" to the alliance between the United States and the Republic of Korea, the defense chiefs said in the statement.

It said Rumsfeld "offered assurances of firm U.S. commitment and immediate support" to South Korea, including continuation of the extended deterrence offered by the protective umbrella of the U.S. nuclear arsenal.

By comparison, last year's statement said Rumsfeld "reaffirmed the U.S. commitment to the security" of South Korea and "to the continued provision of a nuclear umbrella" for the U.S. ally.

At their meeting Friday, Rumsfeld and Yoon disagreed over how explicitly the U.S. should say that South Korea is under that umbrella.

The recent North Korean nuclear test has raised South Koreans' concerns about the future of their defense relationship with the United States. Already, there are significant changes in the works as the U.S. reduces the number of its ground troops in South Korea and pulls troops farther from the North Korean border area.

The South Korean delegation sought to persuade Pentagon officials to issue a public statement saying that if the North attacked the South with nuclear weapons, the U.S. would retaliate as if American territory itself had been attacked by nuclear weapons.

U.S. officials resisted, saying that would go beyond what the U.S. normally says publicly about how it would respond with regard to nuclear weapons. For decades, U.S. policy has been deliberately designed to include some ambiguity about the circumstances under which it would use nuclear arms.

Japan is covered by a similar U.S. "umbrella" promise.

The new joint statement said Yoon "expressed appreciation for the close cooperation and steadfast support of the U.S. in the face of North Korean intransigence."

Rumsfeld, at a news conference Friday with Yoon, noted that a public statement is issued each year following the U.S.-South Korean defense talks and that it always reaffirms the provision of a nuclear umbrella for South Korea, consistent with the 1954 U.S.-South Korean defense treaty.

Rumsfeld said he was unaware of any proposal to change the language, "nor can I imagine how it could be improved upon."

Yoon responded by saying the matter had been discussed extensively in a series of meetings this past week and that he hoped the language on U.S. nuclear protection for South Korea would be different than in years past.

Seoul Hesitant To End N. Korea Projects (AP)

By Burt Herman

AP, October 22, 2006

South Korea is still sending tourists to a mountain resort in the North and maintaining a joint economic zone, despite pressure to cancel the projects after Pyongyang's nuclear test.

The country has its reasons for refusing to shutter key projects that help keep Kim Jong Il's regime afloat, including competition with China for influence over the impoverished nation.

South Korea and China together account for two-thirds of overseas trade for the communist North, and South Korea hopes to one day reunite the two Koreas.

The U.S. has scoffed at the tourism venture at the North's majestic Diamond Mountain resort, saying the project simply hands money to the North Korean government. Washington also has questioned labor practices in a joint economic zone where North Korean workers provide cheap labor for South Korean firms.

But Seoul has been reluctant to inflame North Korea as it pursues its policy of reconciliation that has led to unprecedented cooperation between the two countries that share a peninsula.

Totally cutting off the joint projects also would mean Seoul would lose influence in the North, leaving the isolated nation wide open for China — the North's No. 1 trade partner and a key source of aid.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has said she will not presume to tell South Korea or China how to enforce U.N. sanctions imposed against North Korea after the Oct. 9 underground blast.

But she has called on all nations to cooperate and pointedly noted in a South Korean TV interview Friday that the North "set off a nuclear weapons test right here in South Korea's backyard."

"It is important to use whatever leverage a country feels that it can use to get the North Koreans to make the right choice" to rejoin arms talks and disarm, Rice told KBS in Seoul.

South Korea is keen to maintain stability and not let its unpredictable neighbor spoil its hard-won prosperity built from the ruins of the 1950-53 Korean War. Today's South Korea is a high-technology mecca and cultural trendsetter for Asia, proudly proclaiming itself as "Dynamic Korea" in its main tourism slogan.

The inter-Korean projects are part of Seoul's strategy to use trade and exchanges to ensure that success is not wiped out by a war or a chaotic collapse of North Korea. The North has needed foreign assistance to feed its 23 million people since the mid-1990s, when its state-run farm system collapsed after the loss of Soviet subsidies.

But in the wake of the North's first-ever nuclear test, Seoul has faced new calls to cancel the landmark reconciliation projects in line with the U.N. sanctions.

On Tuesday, the U.S. envoy on North Korean human rights, Jay Lefkowitz, warned that unmonitored assistance to the North could prop up a "criminal regime."

China has made increasing economic inroads in the North in recent years, and South Korea has expressed concern that North Korea could become a de-facto Chinese province.

Chinese goods are the dominant products in what passes for "markets" in North Korea, and Chinese tourists visit regularly.

A state-supported Chinese think tank has claimed that two ancient Korean kingdoms were actually Chinese, including the Koguryo dynasty that reigned from 37 B.C. to A.D. 668 in an area that stretched from the Korean peninsula to Manchuria in northeast China. Koguryo is viewed by Koreans as the origin of their nation, and its name forms the root of today's "Korea."

China had its fingers in Korean politics going back centuries, under the tributary system in place across east Asia.

The idea that China is staging a shadow campaign to maneuver for position after a North Korean collapse rattles intensely nationalistic Koreans, who have seen their tiny peninsula survive as a nation despite being surrounded by massive powers. They also keenly remember decades of Japanese occupation in the early 20th century, which ended with the heart-rending division of the peninsula.

Despite appearing to vacillate in the face of U.S. demands to comply with U.N. sanctions, Seoul's reluctance to back out of its projects with North Korea could be a way of signaling strength — and ensuring that Koreans will have a land to call their own for centuries more.

Envoy's Tirades Elicit Chuckles At U.N. (WT)

By Damien Mcelroy, London Daily Telegraph

The Washington Times, October 22, 2006

NEW YORK -- Diplomats at the United Nations dread the arrival of North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil-yon at the microphone.

Known sarcastically as Dr. Chuckles for his highly-strung manner, he is a master of florid tirades.

"He just comes in and tells us how Pyongyang is defending itself from terrible aggression and then flounces off," a diplomat said. "We never get anything worthwhile out of him."

The United States and North Korea do not have diplomatic relations, but Pyongyang has posted officials to New York to represent it at the United Nations.

As negotiations drag on over sanctions after its nuclear test, Mr. Pak has scurried around the corridors of the U.N. building, condemning moves to adopt sanctions, claiming instead that the world should congratulate North Korea's scientists.

In exchanges notable for their harsh tone, Mr. Pak has threatened more nuclear tests.

Cornered by Korean reporters, he screamed: "Do I have to repeat the same story again and again? We will do everything."

The ambassador's performance has done nothing to salvage the already low reputation of North Korean diplomacy.

North Korean embassies, outposts of the ruling Workers' Party, are notorious as linchpins of lucrative drug-running and money-laundering activities.

In a decade, there have been 50 criminal cases involving North Korean diplomats uncovered by law-enforcement authorities worldwide. Diplomats have been arrested in or thrown out of Egypt, China, Russia, Germany and Bulgaria.

David Asher, a former State Department adviser, said Pyongyang expected its embassies to funnel funds back to the ruling party.

"North Korea is perhaps the only country in the world whose embassies and overseas personnel are expected to contribute income to the party center, not rely on central government funds for their operations," Mr. Asher said.

Even in the depths of its stiffest challenge, the country's unending taste for intrigue has been on display.

Until earlier this month, Mr. Pak's deputy, Han Song-ryol, was the mission's spokesman. But he has been silenced and recalled to Pyongyang.

In contrast to his ebullient leader, Mr. Han morosely refused to comment.

"I do not have the right to talk because I will soon leave this position," he said prior to his departure.

Tension, Desperation: The China-North Korean Border (NYT)

By Norimitsu Onishi

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084779

NORTH KOREA'S porous 880-mile border with China is its lifeline to the outside world. About 39 percent of its trade last year was with China, which, critically, supplies it with 80 to 90 percent of its oil. Trafficking in money transfers and human beings also flourishes.

By contrast, North Korea's border with Russia is 11 miles and heavily guarded; the 150-mile-long demilitarized zone with South Korea has hundreds of thousands of soldiers on each side. Until now, the North's ships have regularly visited Japan, from which relatives sent cash and goods, but North Korea's nuclear test is expected to end that trade.

For China, the bottom line is to erect the right number of fences, as it did along the border city of Dandong recently. Build too few and you invite instability in China. Build too many and North Korea collapses.

A collapse is clearly something Beijing doesn't want, and why it is lukewarm toward harsh sanctions. A collapse might send more North Koreans into China than the 100,000 to 300,000 estimated to have flooded the border during the North's great famine in the mid- to late-1990's. (Paradoxically, the famine also opened trade links when local North Korean groups formed to barter raw materials for Chinese grain.)

The end of the North Korean state could also bring reunification of the Korean Peninsula under America's ally South Korea, another development Beijing does not want. Also, the border itself could be put into question. South Korea has, in recent years, challenged China over the legacy of Koguryo, an ancient Korean kingdom whose rule extended into present-day China. The region is home to hundreds of thousands of ethnic Korean-Chinese, who face discrimination in China and might be sympathetic toward a reunified Korea making territorial claims.

Send In The Fat Guys (NYT)

By Nicholas D. Kristof

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

A North Korean visiting South Korea once sniffed that all the cars must have been brought in from around the country just to make a good impression for his visit. His South Korean host added dryly that it had been even more difficult to bring in all the tall buildings.

Such interactions with the outside world are the best hope to chip away at North Korean totalitarianism, but we've missed the opportunity because for decades we've conspired with Kim Jong-il to isolate his people.

Lately Americans have been quarreling over who is more to blame for North Korea's nuclear test, Bill Clinton or George W. Bush.

Well, Mr. Clinton inherited a situation that, if it had continued, would have resulted in North Korea having hundreds of nuclear weapons by now, and producing an additional 50 each year. Instead, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal with North Korea that resulted in it producing not a single ounce of new plutonium in his eight years in office.

In contrast, President Bush inherited that North Korean nuclear freeze and, if he had just left it alone, North Korea wouldn't have produced any new plutonium. But Mr. Bush overruled Colin Powell's efforts to continue the engagement — and so North Korea has churned out enough plutonium on Mr. Bush's watch for perhaps eight nuclear weapons.

But in a larger sense, the North Korean nuclear test — and the fact that Kim Jong-il is still in power — represent a failure not so much of either Mr. Bush or Mr. Clinton, but of decades of bipartisan American policy that aimed to isolate the North.

Look around the world at the regimes we despise: North Korea, Cuba, Burma and Iran. Those are among the world's most long-lived regimes, and that's partly because the sanctions and isolation we have imposed on them have actually propped them up — by giving those countries' leaders an excuse for their economic failures and a chance to cloak themselves in nationalism.

Kim Jong-il sees that the best way to preserve North Korean totalitarianism is in the formaldehyde of its own isolation. In effect, Mr. Kim has placed sanctions on his own country, and we're abetting him.

In the 1970's, North Korea poked its head out of its shell, negotiating with South Korea, seeking foreign investors and sending letters to Jimmy Carter seeking talks. Mr. Carter considered inviting the leaders of North and South Korea to a summit meeting at a place like Camp David — but dropped the idea when his own aides reacted with horror.

Yet if we had held such a meeting, and gradually encouraged trade and other contacts, North Korea's regime might well have collapsed by now. At least, it would have moderated enough that the country would look like China or Vietnam.

I lived in China in the 1980's and 1990's when Communist ideology was collapsing there, and I'm convinced that the best way to undermine North Korea's government would be to send in business executives — overweight ones, if possible. In a country like North Korea, where the government responded to famine by broadcasting a cautionary "documentary" about a man who exploded after eating too much rice, nothing would be more subversive than tubby foreigners.

Mr. Bush is right that we have to punish North Korea for its brazen nuclear test, and the administration has been sensible and prudent in the last few weeks in devising a series of penalties. But after North Korea drags itself back to six-party talks, we should begin to move away from our long, failed strategy of trying to isolate the world's most isolated country.

In particular, it's a mistake for us to reproach the South Koreans — who have more of a stake than anybody, and who understand the North Koreans better than we do — for operating factories in the Kaesong industrial zone in North Korea.

It's true that those North Korean workers have no rights, and that North Korea will use the hard currency to bolster its military. But those South Korean factories are expected to employ 700,000 workers by 2012.

While North Korea can survive punitive sanctions, I don't think the regime can survive the shock of having 700,000 of its citizens working for South Korean capitalists — and realizing that the southerners are so rich and spoiled that they refuse to eat rice with gravel in it.

The biggest threat to North Korea's regime isn't from American warships, but from the sight of other Koreans dieting, or listening on iPods to love songs, or watching decadent television comedies.

So let's stop helping the Dear Leader isolate his own people.

Radioactive Nationalism (NYT)

By Peter Maass

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

In a classic Mexican standoff, two men point guns at each other's heads. Neither wants to shoot, but each knows the downside of not pulling the trigger first. It is an inherently gripping situation, and Quentin Tarantino's "Reservoir Dogs" offers one of the most memorable examples: in a climactic scene that takes place in a warehouse, three men aim guns at one another, with catastrophe (for macabre laughs) just a twitch away.

We can now thank North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, who is credited with directing several movies, for creating a Mexican standoff that outdoes Tarantino but is no postmodern parody; it takes place in the real world. Earlier this month, North Korea announced that it had exploded an atomic bomb, thus becoming the newest and scariest nuclear power in the world. This set off alarms in South Korea, Japan, China, Russia and the United States; all have good reasons to fear North Korea and one another. We now have a Mexican standoff that involves a) as many as six participants, including b) countries that are threatening one another with c) nuclear weapons. Tarantino couldn't invent it.

Yet something — someone — is missing from this semi-apocalyptic drama. Warming his hands over a fire in north Waziristan or wherever, Osama bin Laden, the embodiment of evil in our times, is no more a factor than John Dillinger. True, there are fears that North Korea might try to sell a nuke to Al Qaeda or other terrorist groups. But diplomats are just as concerned that Japan might choose to build a nuclear weapon or two, that South Korea would be tempted to do the same, that China, Russia and the United States will shove against one another and that in the Middle East, Iran will accelerate its nuclear program, leading Saudi Arabia and Egypt to Google "how to build the bomb."

What's happening, in other words, is an old-fashioned clash of nations and national interests, exacerbated, as often happens, by the imperatives of regime survival. The suspicions and alliances date back a century or more, though the weaponry, instead of muskets and catapults, is nuclear. After 9/11, we came to believe that the menace that mattered most was the wrath of religious terror, and our geopolitical lingua franca embraced a new vocabulary to define it — jihad, suicide bombers, asymmetric warfare, nonstate actors. Whatever happened to nationalism and the risky maneuverings of states? Nothing, actually. Kim Jong Il, entering from stage far-left, reminds us that new threats, like Islamic extremism, do not replace old ones.

The Korean peninsula is an ancient hothouse for nationalism and its offshoots; it is also a brilliant example of the uses, abuses and durability of national esteem. The peninsula is sandwiched between China and Japan, which are two of the great powers of modern and not-so-modern history; without their pride and willingness to sacrifice for a common goal, Koreans would speak Japanese or Chinese today. Defiantly, through a millennium or two of attack and occupation, they held on to their language and even their gene pool. When I lived in Seoul in the 1980's, intermarriage, to a Japanese or an American or whomever, was rare and an occasion for scorn or, at best, pity. The taboos are lessening — earlier this year, the government lifted a ban against mixed-race Koreans serving in the military — but as a recent article in The Asia Times noted, "A foreigner, even another Asian, stands out." More so on the other side of the DMZ: not long ago, a North Korean general chastised South Korea for even allowing intermarriage.

The Korean peninsula was divided into American and Russian zones after World War II — Japan had ruled Korea brutally for nearly a half-century — and was then reduced to cinders by the Korean War. The resurrection of North and South was stunning because they started from utter scratch and without a blueprint or Marshall Plan. Both governments drummed into their people that unless they worked hard and prepared to fight hard, they would be overrun and subjugated by their brother enemies. Each side wanted to prove itself as the true carrier of the Korean torch. The peninsula's division and war was akin to the splitting of a highly charged nationalist atom that unleashed an explosion of directed energy.

The cross-border rivalry provided material not just for political experts but also for Freudian analysts. In addition to postwar spasms of violence — like several attempts by northern assassins to kill South Korea's leaders — the one-upmanship reached the absurd. American soldiers at Panmunjom, the truce village, entertain visitors with a story of how, at the outset of armistice talks in the 1950's, delegations from North and South brought in larger and larger national flags — each side wanted its totem to be the biggest. Eventually, the flags were too large to fit through the doors; physics rather than good sense forced them to agree to modest and identically sized flags.

My three-year sojourn in South Korea was punctuated with iterations of nationalist fervor, some of them charming. There was, in those days, a club that supported Koreans training for stunts that would get them into The Guinness Book of World Records; if memory serves, one hopeful was a man who walked up mountains on his hands. The club's aim wasn't just to help zealous citizens get into the holy book, but to have South Korea itself inscribed as the country with the most world records. This wasn't entirely removed, in its linking of nationalist glory and athletic achievement, from East Germany's effort to legitimize itself, and trump its brother state, by becoming an Olympic power, even if that required doping a generation of athletes (which it did).

Today, even though it has a highly advanced economy — more than 80 percent of South Koreans have broadband Internet access at home, the highest rate in the world — the country has a nearly provincial relationship to its local heroes, like Ban Ki-moon, the foreign minister who will be the next U.N. secretary general. The most famous South Korean of recent times was Hwang Woo Suk, a scientist who in 2004 and 2005 announced breakthroughs in cloning. At home, he was worshiped, a hybrid of Einstein and Madonna. The government awarded him the title Supreme Scientist and gave him millions of dollars. The embrace was so intense that when a television news program reported on unethical conduct in Hwang's lab, the program's sponsors withdrew their ads and the show was temporarily taken off the air. The reporting was accurate — Hwang faked his research. The awards were withdrawn, prosecutors charged him with embezzlement — yet even so, supporters staged rallies, and a Web site in his honor pleads, "Please come back, Dr. Hwang."

In North Korea, nationalism has taken a different course and been put to different uses by a tyranny that exports counterfeit dollars and has been described, with amusing accuracy, as a "Soprano state," after the Mafia family in the HBO series. But until the 1970's, when it began to be hollowed out because of the inherent contradictions of command economics, North Korea was more industrialized and prosperous than South Korea. It has always, and proudly, had the upper hand in a key nationalistic category — foreign troops are not based on its soil. When I visited Pyongyang in 1989 (a long time ago, but North Korea's cryonic rhetoric has changed little in half a century), officials I met were obsessed by two things: the threat posed by American troops on their doorstep and South Korea's cowardly acceptance of these foreigners. It was not unlike, I now realize, the religious fervor with which Islamic conservatives criticized the presence of American troops in Saudi Arabia and the cowardly royal family that welcomed them (when Iraq invaded Kuwait in 1990).

The decades-long rotting of North Korea's economy, and thus the erosion of its military power, was a key reason to develop nuclear weapons: nukes are a poor man's defense, cheaper to build and maintain than an army, and a guarantee that you will not be invaded because the stakes are cataclysmic. North Korea's million-man army is poorly equipped and poorly trained, and no match for the smaller but more sophisticated South Korean military, which is augmented by 28,000 G.I.'s on the ground and additional U.S. forces that would come to South Korea's aid if attacked. Nukes are also a great way, if you lead a small, hopelessly poor and violently repressed nation, to get the attention of the rest of the world; rather than being treated like Albania, North Korea will be treated like Albania with nukes. The government's English-language announcement boasted that its test came "at a stirring time when all the people of the country are making a great leap forward in the building of a great prosperous powerful socialist nation." This nationalist, and deluded, phrase was in the first sentence.

Because nationalism is more of a collective belief than a particular policy, the positions adopted in its name can evolve, even rotate. Inter-Korean hostility subsided as a result of the "sunshine policy" initiated by former President Kim Dae-jung, who dropped the stance of utter hostility taken by the conservative generals who ruled South Korea from the 1960's until the 1990's. The same national pride that set North and South against each other can also create common ties. Now, instead of regarding the North as a violently psychotic regime, the southern attitude is more along the indulgent yet exasperated lines of "Oh, no, what's our nutty brother done today?" Particularly among South Koreans with no memories of the Korean War — that's now most of the country — yearnings for peace and good relations, as well as anti-Americanism, are stronger than the hostile anti-Communist intent of their fathers and grandfathers. And in the wake of Germany's costly unification, policy makers in Seoul realize that the collapse of the North, which an older generation wished for, would create a high degree of political instability and an enormous financial burden that should perhaps be avoided. This helps explain why Seoul has limited its antinuclear criticism of the North, and why South Koreans aren't rushing for bomb shelters quite yet.

One factor bringing the Koreas together is their shared enmity for Japan. North Korea's tirades against Tokyo are nearly unprintable; the South Koreans are more polite but fervently resolute whenever their prestige is challenged by Japan. In the mid-1990's, when FIFA, the international soccer organization, decided to hold the 2002 World Cup in Asia for the first time, the host-country finalists were South Korea and Japan. The competition was intense beyond belief; among other extravagances, Buddhist monks in Seoul prayed three times a day that their homeland would get the nod. In the end, recognizing that the humiliation of losing to an ancient rival would be too much for either side to bear, FIFA took the unusual step of splitting hosting duties between the two countries. Even then, naming the event was problematic; FIFA called it "World Cup 2002 KoreaJapan," but when Japan printed its tickets, the geographic reference was deleted because Korea came first.

More than any other country, Japan feels threatened by North Korea's nuclear capacities. The brutality of the Japanese occupation of parts of China and all of Korea has not been forgotten in the region nor fully apologized for. The sexual slavery of Korean women during World War II remains an issue the Japanese avoid rather than accept full responsibility for. Of course Japan is linked to China and South Korea in good ways — they are major trading partners, and Japan has been an important source of loans and investment. None want to go to war, and one triumph of the nation-state system is that it is not a suicide pact, though neither is it a foolproof way to keep the peace.

If this sounds familiar — history shaped by the rivalries, interests and missteps of nations rather than terrorists dashing from hideout to hideout — it should. It's the way the world has been ordered and disordered since the emergence of the nation-state and even before, and it did not vanish on Sept. 11, 2001. If anything, traditional powers that kept to themselves in past years are asserting themselves in new ways. Because of an influx of funds for its oil and gas, the Russia of Vladimir Putin is far more aggressive than the shipwreck presided over by Boris Yeltsin. The fast growth of China's economy has increased its appetites for not just greater political clout but also for resources with which to feed its bustling industries. And of course there is Iran, which has not forgotten its Persian history and would not mind recapturing, by becoming a nuclear state, the influence it once had.

In the 19th century, Britain and Russia struggled for control of Central Asia in what was called "the Great Game." In the 21st century, the great game is far more complex, taking place across the globe between an expanding number of actors with a multiplicity of interests and a variety of weapons. Yet certain basic facts — war is an extension of politics, politics are often driven by a need for resources as well as collective feelings of pride or shame — remain much the same in the wake of Sept. 11. We are obliged to focus on Islamism and the terrorist threat it has produced, to study Arabic and the work of Sayyid Qutb, but we should not fail to consult Kennan, Clausewitz or Thucydides either.

The Chinese Go After Corruption, Corruptly (NYT)

By Jim Yardley

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

BEIJING

THE corruption scandal in Shanghai that had already taken down one of China's most powerful officials claimed two smaller scalps last week: the chief of the national statistics bureau was fired, and an official with the Formula One racing circuit was hauled in for questioning. The contrast between the statistician and the racing executive may have been incidental, but it underscored the perception, fair or not, that official corruption is everywhere in China.

To some extent, the ruling Communist Party does not disagree.

In an economic boom gilded with excess and profiteering, official corruption is so widespread, and increasingly so brazen, that it is almost taken for granted. The latest World Bank governance survey found that China had seriously backslid in the category of "containing corruption" when much of the rest of the world, if not improving, was basically unchanged on the issue.

President Hu Jintao and Prime Minister Wen Jiabao have warned that corruption threatens the credibility and legitimacy of Communist Party rule and have vowed to stamp it out. But many experts say that truly stamping out corruption would involve the type of broad political reform and a full embrace of the rule of law that the party has long resisted. The current corruption sweep authorized by Mr. Hu in Shanghai and other cities is widely viewed as more of a purge of allies linked to his predecessor, President Jiang Zemin, than an unfettered crackdown.

"The problem with China today is that if you want to pursue corruption, so many people are tainted," said Minxin Pei, a scholar at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace in Washington. As a result, Mr. Pei noted, Mr. Hu could never investigate corruption solely on its merits because it would topple so many of his own political allies.

No one truly knows the depth of corruption in China because so much malfeasance goes undiscovered or is covered up by the party. Even so, the information that does reach the public domain is stunning. Last year, the party committee responsible for internal discipline investigated more than 147,000 corruption cases, most handled outside the legal system. The People's Supreme Court reported that more than 10,000 officials were convicted of corruption charges in the first six months of this year. Chinese newspapers regularly carry stories about the latest arrests or executions with details about officials using government money to pay for prostitutes, luxury homes, extravagant meals and vacations.

Some accounts seem out of Dickens: a cadre with the Chinese Federation of Cripples is sentenced to prison for stealing about $12,000 that was to have been used to organize the Congress of Chinese Cripples. An accountant with a nursery school run by the state-owned China Northern airline is caught stealing roughly $15,000, including the children's lunch money.

The Communist Party is trying to send a signal to rank-and-file members that corruption must be reined in, partly because of rising public anger over abuses like officials' illegally seizing land from farmers or razing blocks of apartments to clear land for developers. In these cases, officials typically pay meager compensation to farmers and tenants but then reap enormous profits by selling to the developers.

"There is a long tradition of corruption," said Andrew H. Wedeman, a China specialist at the University of Nebraska who is researching a book on the link between corruption and development in China. "But in this transitional period, the stakes have gone way up."

The transitional period is China's shift to a market economy, in which party officials at all levels, operating under minimal oversight, often control whether someone can get land, or a needed license or purchase order. The Ministry of Commerce has estimated that 4,000 officials have fled overseas in recent years with roughly $50 billion in embezzled money. In 2005 alone, an expert in the National Audit Office found, $35 billion in state funds was misappropriated.

Mr. Wedeman said higher amounts of money at stake have corresponded to corruption seeping into higher levels of government. He noted that the number of officials at the county level or higher prosecuted for corruption had tripled in the last decade, to almost 3,000. By one count, 20 officials at the ministry level of the central government have been arrested since 2002.

Official corruption also has contributed to the deepening moral vacuum and cynicism felt by many ordinary Chinese when making money is paramount. Petty corruption is commonplace. Peddlers sell fake expense-account receipts outside train stations. Doctors demand "red envelope" payments from patients. Graduate students bribe scholarly journals to publish their work.

"The problem is that ordinary people don't believe there is anything in place to control the power that officials have," said Zhang Jiansheng, 53, a retired soldier who owns a small teahouse in the provincial capital of Yinchuan. He added: "People are in search of material comforts now. That spirit of helping each other is not as strong."

The government responds largely with propaganda campaigns, like the recent "Eight Honors and Shames" theme promoted by Mr. Hu to encourage upright behavior and discourage deceit. Some older people like Mr. Zhang appreciate the effort. But many people, particularly the young, regard such campaigns as cynical efforts to avoid meaningful changes — like political reform.

To some extent, the corruption problem is not atypical for the country's stage of development, some analysts say. In ratings by Transparency International, the global civil society organization fighting corruption, China ranks in the bottom half of the world, though not the very bottom. Daniel Kaufmann, an author of the World Bank governance survey, said that China had steadily declined in the bank's corruption ranking.

"It is pertinent to ask the question of whether the measures and approaches being implemented are the most effective ones," he said.

Mr. Kaufmann is one of many experts who contend that any country trying to curb corruption inevitably benefits from a freer press and greater government transparency. Corruption is hardly a secret in China, and cases are reported and investigated in some newspapers. But the lines are clearly drawn. No newspaper would dare independently investigate a high official in the central government. At the local level, officials commonly censor corruption reports. The scrutiny is so great that a minor government official in southwest China was arrested for writing a satirical poem about corruption and sending it to friends by e-mail and text message.

China's legal system also is curtailed. The overwhelming majority of corruption cases are never presented to prosecutors but are instead handled by party investigators. And when cases are handed over to the courts, analysts say, the party often recommends the punishment.

The Shanghai investigation is a case in point. Under Mr. Hu's orders, the powerful party boss Chen Liangyu, also a member of the ruling Politburo, was arrested last month on allegations that he misused city pension funds for speculative real estate deals and other ventures. Notably, he was detained not by the local police or prosecutors but by an investigative team sent down from Beijing by the party's Central Inspection Discipline Commission. It is a reminder that often the Communist Party opts to address corruption outside the law.

Egypt, Under Stress, Sees U.S. As Pain And Remedy (NYT)

By Michael Slackman

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

CAIRO, Oct. 20 — Faced with twin political threats — a rising Islamic movement at home and diminished influence throughout the region — Egypt is pressing the United States for an aggressive promotion of Palestinian statehood as a means of strengthening itself and other Arab governments allied with Washington, senior officials say.

DOJ_NMG_0084784

Egyptian officials told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on her recent visit here that the United States should move straight "to the endgame," with a major policy initiative tackling the most contentious Palestinian issues: borders of a future state, the site of the capital, and the so-called right of return for Palestinian refugees.

Whether Washington agrees — a senior Egyptian official with first-hand knowledge of the conversation said Ms. Rice seemed to be listening — Egypt's request is evidence of growing concern and frustration here. The leadership is showing signs of vulnerability, and in large measure it has blamed American actions in the Middle East for many of its problems, from the rise of Iran as a regional power to the growing popularity of political Islam.

Egyptians and other Arab leaders who are friendly with the United States see a major regional peace initiative by Washington as the first necessary step toward stealing momentum from Islamic groups, officials here said. In Egypt, however, optimism is limited that Washington will put the stated interests of its Arab allies ahead of the perceived interests of Israel.

"There is a realization that strategic estrangement in the post-Iraq period has been harmful to both sides," said Abdel Moneim Said, the director of Egypt's premier research center, the Ahram Center for Political and Strategic Studies, and a member of the governing National Democratic Party. "Both are going through a series of reassessments of their positions."

Egypt itself is in a moment of political twilight, so the regional and domestic challenges it faces appear magnified. The situation is delicate, and officials interviewed spoke only on condition of anonymity.

While its critics say the government's own failure to combat poverty, corruption and political oppression is to blame for its weakened state, officials say the United States has undermined them. The invasion of Iraq has put Baghdad into Iran's orbit; the insistence on democratic elections allowed Hamas to gain power in the Palestinian areas; and, more recently, the refusal to press for a speedy end to Israel's bombardment of Lebanon helped lionize Sheik Hassan Nasrallah, the leader of the militant group Hezbollah.

Add to the mix the fact that President Hosni Mubarak is 78 and has ruled Egypt for 25 years. Increasingly, it appears he is trying to pave the way for his son Gamal to inherit the presidency. But there is no consensus among the ruling elite. Some are concerned that the son would lack legitimacy unless selected through a free and democratic process, which Egypt has shown no hint of supporting.

And there is no certainty that the military would go along with the president's son, who would be the first president from outside the armed forces since the monarchy was overthrown in 1952.

For all the hand-wringing, experts agree that a sudden political crisis is unlikely in Egypt, or at least not the kind that would lead to an Islamist-led revolution. But the confluence of internal uncertainty and external pressures has affected Egypt's policies, and its regional influence.

For example, despite repeated efforts, Egypt has been powerless to stabilize the conflict between the main Palestinian factions, Hamas and Fatah. In the past, Egypt's security services were influential, and effective, in the Palestinian areas.

On the domestic front, Egyptian officials have stepped up repression as a means to blunt the rising popularity of the Muslim Brotherhood, locking up its leaders without charge. There also is talk of amending the Constitution to avoid the embarrassing prospect of only one candidate for president, but in such a way as to prohibit any independent candidates aligned with the Brotherhood. The group has been the only credible opposition.

In its foreign relations, for the first time in nearly three decades Egypt is trying to improve business ties with Russia, and President Mubarak plans to visit China next month. Top government and party officials have also made aggressive public statements aimed at embarrassing, or challenging, the United States. In one notable scene when Ms. Rice was in Cairo, she and the Egyptian foreign minister, Ahmed Aboul Gheit, appeared together at a news conference beamed live around the world.

"I've spoken about Ayman Nour each time that I meet with my Egyptian counterpart," Ms. Rice replied when asked by a reporter if she was still pushing for the release of Mr. Nour, the imprisoned opposition political leader.

"You didn't raise it today," Mr. Aboul Gheit interjected without hesitation.

But these efforts, the moves toward Russia and China, and the aggressive public remarks from officials mask a reality that is driving the government to press the United States to become more engaged in the Arab-Israeli peace effort.

"You can't have a deal in the Middle East without the Americans, regardless of the judgment we carry," one government official said.

Many people, inside and outside government, say the roots of the government's problems lie more in its domestic failures than in outside pressure. Although Egypt's government has moved to improve macroeconomic policies, for example, a vast majority of this nation of 70 million live in deep poverty.

While they talk about moving toward democracy, Egyptian authorities have canceled elections, prohibited the creation of new parties and locked up political opponents. "The state is failing to meet its most basic responsibilities, starting with providing clear drinking water," said Mustapha Kamel, a political science professor at American University in Cairo. "There is a feeling the ruling team does not have a good vision for dealing with the problems of the country."

The popularity of political Islam in Egypt, many political analysts said, is not a result of the Palestinian crisis. “It is not because the Brotherhood is religious, but because the public is fed up with the ruling party and their promises,” said Abdallah al-Ashaal, a former assistant to the foreign minister who now teaches international law and relations at Cairo University.

But Dr. Ashaal did say Egypt — and the United States — would benefit greatly if the Palestinian issue were addressed. “If you find a fair solution to the Palestinian problem, you pave the way for talks with all parties,” he said, referring to Syria and Lebanon as well.

So in an atmosphere of distrust of the United States, officials here are still hoping that Washington will heed their call. “You can’t achieve peace without the United States,” said Hesham Youssef, chief of staff at the Arab League, “but we can’t continue business as usual.”

Abbas Seeks To Curb Hamas In West Bank (AP)

By Josef Federman

AP, October 22, 2006

The Palestinian president brought a security commander out of retirement Saturday to block Hamas from building up its forces in the West Bank, the latest sign that the standoff between the Islamic militant group and Fatah could erupt into widespread violence.

The commander, Ismail Jaber, has been tainted by corruption but is respected by thousands of gunmen loyal to Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement and holds sway over key West Bank commanders.

Abbas has been locked in a power struggle with Hamas since the Islamic group trounced Fatah in parliamentary elections early this year, with control over Palestinian security forces a key aspect of the dispute.

Most of the forces are loyal to Abbas, but Hamas formed its own militia of 6,000 men and deployed it throughout the Gaza Strip, a move that has sometimes led to violent clashes.

Jaber's appointment came a day after Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas leader, said the Islamic group would beef up its militia in Fatah's West Bank stronghold. A Hamas official said they planned to recruit about 1,500 members there.

Under Abbas' new plan, Jaber will take command of all West Bank security forces, except for three branches that fall under control of the Hamas-run Interior Ministry.

Abbas hopes Jaber will help him curb Hamas' plans in the West Bank, an official close to the Palestinian leader said, speaking on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to discuss the issue with the media.

Adding to Fatah's concerns, Hamas officials said Iran has promised to help train their security forces.

Jaber's appointment marks a turnaround for Abbas. In April 2005, Abbas forced Jaber and other senior officials into retirement as part of his efforts to root out corruption. Jaber was suspected of putting thousands of fictitious names on his payrolls and pocketing the money.

However, Jaber has years of experience and is seen as one of the few people who can unify the pro-Fatah forces in the West Bank, which have been riven by infighting and rivalries.

Jaber, who is in his 60s, was a top commander for the Palestine Liberation Organization in Lebanon during the 1980s, and later followed the late Yasser Arafat to the West Bank after the interim peace deals with Israel in the early 1990s. He served as Arafat's national security adviser and police chief in the West Bank.

Jaber also has influence over parts of the Al Aqsa Martyrs' Brigades, a violent but decentralized group of gunmen loosely linked to Fatah.

On Friday, Al Aqsa leaders from four large refugee camps in the West Bank met in the city of Nablus to discuss the threat posed by Hamas.

"We decided there will be no Hamas force in the West Bank. We won't let them do what they did in Gaza," said one of the commanders, Nasser Abu Aziz. "Every Hamas policeman will be in our sights."

Both Hamas and Jaber face difficult tasks. Hamas' power base in the West Bank is much smaller than in Gaza. The Fatah-dominated security forces, meanwhile, are largely in disarray, and it is unclear whether Jaber will have the funds or organizational abilities to impose order.

Jaber did not return a message seeking comment. In Gaza, Hamas officials declined comment on the appointment.

But the appointment was likely to add to growing tensions. Some 17 people have died in Palestinian infighting in recent weeks, and on Friday, Fatah-aligned gunmen opened fire on Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's convoy, causing no injuries.

The violence stems from a political standoff between Abbas and Hamas over international calls for the Islamic group to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

Abbas, a moderate who was elected separately last year, has urged Hamas to accept the demands in order to get international sanctions lifted. Hamas refuses to give in, despite widespread hardship caused by the sanctions.

In new violence Saturday, members of the Palestinian security forces fired in the air in Gaza City's main shopping district and burned tires near Abbas' home to press demands for the payment of salaries on the eve of a major Muslim holiday. The three-day Eid el-Fitr holiday begins early next week, and children are traditionally given new clothes and toys.

A similar protest by unpaid security men near the Nusseirat and Bureij refugee camps in central Gaza erupted into an armed battle with Hamas gunmen early Sunday. Witnesses and hospital officials said a well-known Fatah activist was killed, and three people were wounded.

Because of the sanctions, the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority has been largely unable to pay the salaries of 165,000 civil servants, including 80,000 members of the security forces, since it came to power in March.

Russian Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov said Hamas should be given more time to meet international demands to renounce violence and recognize Israel.

"Demanding now that Hamas fully accept the Quartet's conditions, such as the recognition of Israel, the denunciation of violence against Israel, and the acceptance of all existing agreements is unrealistic at the present stage," Lavrov told the Kuwaiti news agency KUNA on Friday.

For Multiculturalist Britain, Uncomfortable New Clothes (NYT)

By Alan Cowell

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

LONDON

RARELY has Britain's struggle to define its relationship with a disaffected and diverse Muslim minority seemed so fraught as it was last week, with the debate fixated on where a woman can wear a flimsy, kerchief-size item of Islamic dress called the niqab, the full-face veil.

The discussion, intensified by Prime Minister Tony Blair's calling the veil "a mark of separation,'' is not simply about dress. It seems to signal a broader shift as non-Muslim Britons set new limits of tolerance, not just for recent immigrants but for a younger, home-grown generation of more assertive British Muslims.

Among some of those who have long favored tolerance for individual choice, there is a ginger step toward the notion that the right of the group might trump the right of the individual under more circumstances, even as they are hard-pressed to say exactly why they are drawing the line at the niqab, beyond its being a matter of "communication."

For 40 years, Britain has nurtured a policy of multiculturalism celebrating ethnic diversity and its emblems. That policy evolved in the 1960's, at a time when Muslim immigrants, largely from Pakistan, arrived to take menial jobs. Now, Britons are confronted with the sometimes alienated descendants of that first generation — like three of the four London ers last year — people born in the country, raised in its schools and newly drawn to a re-examination of their ancestors' faith.

A blame-game question is emerging: Who is responsible for the widening gulf between majority and minority?

Along with Mr. Blair's comment, a Conservative opposition figure, David Davis, said some British Muslims had set themselves on a course of "voluntary apartheid," leading parallel lives outside the mainstream. The inference was that multiculturalism had failed.

The counterargument emerged at a labor tribunal in Yorkshire where Aishah Azmi, 24, a teaching assistant, challenged a school board's decision to suspend her from teaching because she wore the full veil.

"Muslim women who wear the veil are not aliens," Mrs. Azmi said at a news conference after the tribunal found that she had not been discriminated against or harassed, though it concluded that she had been made to feel like a victim. This split ruling left her ultimate return to the school, veiled or not, uncertain. "Integration requires people like me to be in the workplace so that people can see that we are not to be feared or mistrusted," she said.

But those who have opposed the wearing of the niqab, like Jack Straw, the Labor Party veteran who is leader of the House of Commons, argue that it prevents communication. They point out that, while the Muslim head-scarf — the hijab — allows the face to be seen, the niqab reveals only the eyes. In school, opponents of the niqab argue, particularly in language lessons, students cannot see the face of the teacher to follow what she is saying.

Of course, the niqab is not the only item of clothing used to express a distinctive notion of piety. There's the Sikh turban, the nun's wimple, the Hasidic Jewish man's black hat and side curls. None of those — not since the battle of Sikhs to wear their turbans at work in the 1970's — has been so singled out.

But the niqab is the only item that completely masks its wearer. In much of the Muslim world, it is part of a pervasive culture dictating that women show their faces only to other women, or to men in their families. In Britain, it has come to offer an emblem by which Islamic separation may be criticized without challenging the right of 1.6 millions Muslims — fully 3 percent of the population — to practice their faith.

The debate opened this month when Mr. Straw complained that in his constituency office in Blackburn, he felt unable to communicate with women wearing the niqab. "There is a wider issue here," he said. "Communities are bound together partly by informal chance relations between strangers, people being able to acknowledge each other in the street or being able to pass the time of day. That's made more difficult if people are wearing a veil."

His remarks drew broad support among non-Muslims, prompting suggestions that he had used the issue to raise his profile as Labor Party figures maneuver for position after Mr. Blair steps down. Only 22 percent of Britons surveyed in an opinion poll taken afterward said they thought Muslims had done enough to integrate, while 57 percent said Muslims should do more to fit it.

For some it is an uneven debate.

"It's not a neutral conversation," said Salma Yaqoob, a Muslim city councilor in Birmingham. Non-Muslims start from a perception that " 'we have all been victimized as a majority by this awkward minority'; they start from a hostile stance and the Muslims start from a defensive stance."

The full veil, she said, is worn by a "tiny, tiny minority" of Muslim women, some of whom have taken to it after concluding that Islam provides "a sense of identity that gives a framework for their lives." Indeed, it is the very intensity of the debate about Islam, Ms. Yaqoob said, that propels their embrace of it.

"As the context now is so highly politicized, and the Muslims are so much in the headlines, people ask, 'What is this thing we are being demonized for?' " she said in a telephone interview.

Shahid Malik, a Muslim Labor legislator from the same area of Yorkshire as Mrs. Azmi, said he welcomed the debate over the full veil. "If we don't talk about these things, they are stored up for the future," he told reporters in Yorkshire.

"As individuals, all women have the right and freedom to wear what they wish, and rightly so," he said. "However, in certain occupations there are dress codes which employees are expected to adhere to while at work. All right-minded people — Muslim and non-Muslim alike — will agree that in asking a classroom assistant not to wear a veil while in contact with children because it hinders their learning is perfectly acceptable and just common sense. But when your style of dress limits your ability to carry out your role, then the welfare and education of the children must come first."

The paradox is, of course, that Muslims born and raised in Britain are an integral part of the society that seems to reject them. To be accepted, they need to assert their presence, yet in doing so, they fall afoul of pressures to conform to the standards of the non-Muslim majority.

The debate may also exact a toll on that majority. In an interview, David Edgar, a British playwright, said Britain risked losing the "Voltaire principle, which is: I disagree with what you say but I defend to the death your right to say it."

"We are slipping very quickly from saying something I agree with — that the veil is a separatist gesture — to something I profoundly disagree with, which is that it should be banned," he said.

Yasmin Alibhai-Brown, a Muslim who is a columnist for The Independent, sees it a little differently. "What any of us does in our own lives is a private matter — a precious and inalienable right," she wrote. "But once we enter the job market or national and local authority domains, or tread into places where there is interaction with different citizens, privacy and individual choice become contested — quite rightly, for there is such a thing as British society."

Europe's Immigration Quagmire (LAT)

By Ayaan Hirsi Ali, Ayaan Hirsi Ali, A Former Dutch Legislator From Somalia, Now Lives In The U.s., Where She Is A Fello

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The continent needs more realistic policies that recognize both immigration's economic benefit and the dangers of Islamism.

IN AFRICA, we sometimes used animals to say things on sensitive issues to avoid discussing the messenger instead of the message. So I shall use the ostrich and the owl to sketch the two most important positions on immigration and pluralism in Europe.

The view of things in Europe today, as the ostrich sees them, is bright. He sees an open market of 450 million people with an amazing potential. He sees a thriving economy and the free movement of people, goods, money and services. Immigration, to the ostrich, can only be viewed as an opportunity for an aging native population. Borders are better open than closed. Islam is a faith like Christianity, and Muslims shall adapt their religion to life in Europe.

According to the ostrich, very soon there shall be a European Islam, signs of which are already visible in the young women in tight jeans; high heels; black, sleeveless, tight tops and matching head scarves, all designed by Prada. This Prada Islam will replace the old rural one and function as a vaccine against the Wahhabi Islam of the Saudis.

The overrepresentation of migrants in all the wrong statistics — such as unemployment, unfinished education and crime — is to the ostrich merely a temporary affair. It's a phase that all groups from underprivileged backgrounds go through, and it will be short, as long as there is economic growth.

According to the ostrich, the wealthy natives should stop whining about the backwardness of immigrants and concentrate on the benefits. The ostrich points to the nurses, nannies, construction workers, grocers, bag carriers, cleaners, factory workers and a host of other jobs natives won't do but are necessary to keep the economy going.

The ostrich is not worried about the flow of migrants transforming the culture and society of Europe in any negative way. He sees only one thing as a setback: the xenophobia of native Europeans. If only the inherently racist white society could overcome its fear of what is alien, it would notice how migrants have improved the cuisine, the music, the arts and the economy of Europe.

Then there's the owl, which is a night bird and gets, more often, a glimpse of the dark side of things. Europe is healthy and wealthy, but the owl worries that it may not be so wise.

The shadow side of the free movement of people, for instance, is the trade in women and children for the ruthless sex industry. Also, weapons go unnoticed from hand to hand, from country to country. Some of these weapons could be biological, chemical or worse.

The old owl sees how poor migrants are exploited by cruel employers who provide little or no pay and hire and fire the migrants at will. The owl can't help but notice that even after the recent amnesty, Spain has an estimated 1 million illegal immigrants. Britain has roughly half a million. France, 200,000 to 400,000, if you trust the French. I think there are more. Germany has about 1 million.

The owl acknowledges unreservedly Europe's aging populations, its decreasing population growth and its need for migrants — but also sees that selection of migrants is not always based on who is useful for the economy.

The owl sees that Islam is not Christianity and that not all Muslims understand or want to share in any European future based on European values of freedom, tolerance and an attitude of live and let live.

The owl sadly looks on as poor kids are taught to view themselves as victims, and the society in which they live as the enemy. He can't help but notice that Muslim migrants are receptive to the seduction of the Islamist movement. Even worse, there are now natives converting to this brand of totalitarianism.

Nor can the owl ignore the growth of the extreme right-wing movements and parties. He fears that the debate on pluralism in Europe will be hijacked by two uncompromising extremes: whites' power fascism and Islamic fascism.

The owl thinks that the ostrich is right: We should always look on the bright side of life. But he also thinks we should be careful not to get delusional.

Foretelling the future can be fun for astrologists and crystal-ball gazers. For academics, it is not. If you get it right, you're damned like Samuel Huntington. If you get it wrong, you're called a certified idiot. So instead of predictions, we draw rough sketches of a best-case scenario and a worse-case scenario.

In a worst-case scenario, the warnings of the owl will not be heeded. The optimism of the ostrich will be abandoned. The monopoly of force that is now exclusive to states will be challenged by armed subgroups. European societies will be divided along ethnic and religious lines. The education system will not succeed in grooming the youth to believe in a shared past, let alone a shared future.

The European states will find themselves limiting civil liberties. Europeans will come to accept the de facto implementation of Sharia law in certain neighborhoods and even cities. The exploitation of the weak, women and children will be commonplace. Those who can afford to emigrate will do so.

Instead of an ever-growing union in Europe, future generations may witness an ever-disintegrating one.

In a best-case scenario, Europeans will heed the caution of the owl without losing the liveliness of the ostrich. This approach will be translated into a three-dimensional, comprehensive policy.

First, controlled or planned immigration. The European Union will introduce quotas such as those in the U.S., based on the selection of migrants who are beneficial to the economy. The current system in most European countries is designed to attract the highest number of people with truly heartbreaking stories, not the highest number of people who are willing and able to adapt to the European society.

Second, an intervention, sometimes proactive, in Europe's neighboring states or in failed states with conditions that force people to migrate in large numbers. This plan will consist of aid, trade, diplomatic pressure and military intervention, if necessary. That's taboo in Europe at the moment. Right now, the EU selects the countries it wants to aid based on lists provided by the World Bank or the United Nations. The criteria for aid are based on such vague notions as the 100 poorest countries or countries with good governance or some other goody-goody sounding reason. That should change.

Finally, in a best-case scenario, the EU will implement an assimilation program guided by the lessons learned from our failed attempts at multiculturalism. It will acknowledge that the basic tenets of Islam are a major obstacle to integration. In practice, Muslims will continue to enjoy religious freedom, as long as exercising that precious right does not infringe upon the freedoms of others, including daughters and wives.

In a best-case scenario, EU policymakers will invest in girls and women, protect them from violence and punish those who try to limit their freedoms. Those policymakers will reform the welfare state; regulations pertaining to the hiring and firing of employees will be made more flexible, making it easier for migrants to enter the labor market.

The combined vision of the ostrich and the owl is indeed possible in Europe, but it requires a great deal of willpower, leadership and, above all, the recognition that tolerating oppressive cultures and encouraging more mass migration from Islamic countries often hurts precisely the people we seek to help.

A misguided vision brought Europe to its current predicament; an idealistic vision convinced of the inherent superiority of enlightened values over the values of oppressive cultures, a vision steeped in individual rights, the rule of law and the equality of men and women can help guide Europe out of it.

Schroeder: Bush's Faith Raised Suspicion (AP)

By Melissa Eddy

AP, October 22, 2006

Ex-Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose second term was marked by vehement opposition to the war in Iraq, described in an advance copy of his memoirs how he was suspicious of President Bush's constant references to his Christian faith.

In an excerpt of his book, "Decisions: My Life in Politics" published in the German weekly Der Spiegel Saturday, Schroeder discusses the key political choices that marked his seven-year term in office, including the decision to call early elections and his split with Bush over the Iraq war.

"I am anything but anti-American," Schroeder told Spiegel in an interview to accompany the excerpt of the more than 500-page book that goes on sale Thursday.

In it Schroeder, who led the Social Democrats to power in 1998, recalls the tears in his eyes as he watched television footage of people jumping from the burning World Trade Center on Sept. 11.

He knew Germany would have to react.

"It was important to me that Germany fulfill its requirements as an ally" of the U.S., he wrote. "It was also fully clear to me that this could also mean the German army's participation in an American military mission."

Several months later, during Bush's 2002 visit to Berlin, Schroeder wrote he was surprised at what he described as Bush's "exceptionally mild" speech to the German parliament.

While meetings with Bush at that time were friendly, Schroeder said he could not reconcile himself with the feeling that religion was the driving force behind many of Bush's political decisions.

"What bothered me, and in a certain way made me suspicious despite the relaxed atmosphere, was again and again in our discussions how much this president described himself as 'God-fearing,'" Schroeder wrote, adding he is a firm believer in the separation of church and state.

Schroeder accused some elements in U.S. as being hypocritical when it comes to secularism in government.

"We rightly criticize that in most Islamic states, the role of religion for society and the character of the rule of law are not clearly separated," Schroeder wrote. "But we fail to recognize that in the USA, the Christian fundamentalists and their interpretation of the Bible have similar tendencies."

Panama Steams Ahead On Vote To Expand Canal (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The $5.2-billion project is expected to pass. Critics find their voices drowned out by the government campaign.

Voters are likely to approve a $5.2-billion project to expand the Panama Canal today, according to polls, despite warnings of an accumulation of debt, competition, technical miscalculations and possible environmental damage.

Only scattered opposition has developed to the proposal to expand the 92-year-old canal to allow transit of a new generation of larger container ships. If voters approve, construction will begin next year, with completion expected in 2014, in time for the 100th anniversary of the canal's opening.

Opponents, who include a former Panamanian president, a onetime canal administrator and a number of engineers and financiers, say the expansion amounts to fixing something that isn't broken, and that the nation is risking its most important asset on dubious engineering and financial assumptions. Revenue from the canal accounts for 8% of the national budget.

The contrarian views have been obscured by the well-oiled campaign by the government of President Martin Torrijos to sell the expansion as a competitive necessity. Polls indicate that support for expansion has grown and that the referendum could pass by a as much as a 2-1 margin.

Canal administrators and many shipping experts argue that the canal could become irrelevant unless it is modernized, because of the enormous increase in container cargo traffic bound to and from the U.S. East Coast since the emergence of China as a world trader.

The growth in volume has lengthened the waiting time for ships at either end of the canal. Alternative projects, including a waterway in neighboring Nicaragua, have been proposed to handle the extra traffic. An expansion of the Suez Canal is also being considered, as are several projects to hurry freight across North America from new Canadian and Mexican ports.

If the referendum passes, the canal expansion will involve digging a third shipping lane and construction of a parallel set of locks for ships 50% larger than those that currently travel the 51-mile canal.

The project would be entirely self-financed by doubling tolls over the next 20 years, said Francisco Miguez, master plan coordinator at the Panama Canal Authority, the quasi-independent body that has run the canal since the United States turned it over at the end of 1999. The authority would manage the expansion as well.

But skeptics say that cost overruns are inevitable and that they will be shouldered by taxpayers. Walter Molano, an analyst with BCP Securities in Connecticut, said Panama was already burdened with high debt and poverty and was underestimating the pressure from competition to keep prices down in coming years.

"This is an extensive project with limited payoff for all but a small group of people involved in the construction," said Molano, a specialist in Latin American bonds.

Carlos Guevara-Mann, a Panamanian who is a political science professor at the University of Nevada in Reno, said the project still lacked a thorough economic impact study or final construction plans.

"I was a credit manager at an international bank before I became a professor, and if someone sent me a proposal like this for a loan, I'd have turned it down," Guevara-Mann said. "The whole plan is sloppily done, poorly prepared."

Several experts doubt that the expansion can be done for $5.2 billion. A previous plan for expansion developed in the early 1990s envisioned the construction of new reservoirs west of the canal. The current plan, however, avoids those reservoirs, and the displacement of about 8,000 people, by recycling 60% of the water needed to fill the new locks. The plan also foresees raising the level of Gatun Lake, the main water source for the canal's locks, by a foot and a half.

Paul Labonte, a Tustin civil engineer who helped develop an alternative canal water recycling plan financed by the Inter-American Development Bank, said the final plan badly underestimated the amount of water the new locks would require.

The canal authority vigorously disputes the criticism, saying technical and financial assumptions were given three rounds of independent scrutiny and that the $5.2-billion cost estimate includes a margin for "everything going wrong," in Miguez's words.

The canal authority talked to all the operators who use the 114 shipping routes that pass through the canal and came away convinced that its competitive position was strong and would remain so, Miguez said.

Fare increases totaling 60% since Panama took over the canal operation have failed to dent market demand, he said.

In Cuba, 'On The Left' Means A Flourishing Black Market (WP)

By Manuel Roig-franzia

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Guile and Caution Employed to Counter Chronic Shortages

HAVANA -- Most mornings a woman with darting brown eyes lingers here in the sticky hot corner of an open-air vegetable market.

She effects a casual stance, elbow propped nonchalantly against a cigar stand, waiting for the regulars. If she nods, her customers follow her to a side street.

A few quick, nervous glances and the woman reaches inside her blouse. From her bra, she removes her contraband -- neatly folded plastic grocery sacks, illegal except in state-run stores.

Five for one cent.

The transaction, like countless others each day in Havana and throughout this island nation, takes place " por la izquierda ," or "on the left." Cubans use the phrase to describe back-alley deals both large and small. They scheme on the left to cope with chronic shortages and to skirt myriad rules that prohibit most forms of private enterprise and govern the minutiae of their daily lives.

Cubans go to the left for almost anything: for staples, such as rice and beans; for quotidian items, such as the plastic grocery sacks; and for forbidden delights, such as lobster or scarce beef. On the left, Cubans risk fines or jail sentences to watch soap operas captured by illegal satellite dishes, to prowl restricted Internet sites and to boil "secret potatoes" bought after reaching limits on the ration cards that dictate the buying habits of everyone in the country. Mothers of children under the age of 7 -- the only Cubans allowed to buy discounted milk at state stores -- even sell their allotments at inflated prices to collect money for extra food.

The thriving underground economy functions as a pocket of capitalism, prescribed by supply and demand, within the Western Hemisphere's only communist state. Observers say it may be the precursor of a push for a market economy, one that could accelerate after President Fidel Castro dies; on the other hand, they say, the black market may simply be the byproduct of a system that rewards the wily and well-connected.

"They're very entrepreneurial," Wayne Smith, a former chief of the U.S. Interests Section in Havana, said in an interview. "When I go down to Cuba, I've had the impression that everyone is waiting for something to happen. There's a sense that changes are going to come."

While the world wonders what a post-Castro Cuba might look like, the resiliency of the island's black-market culture demonstrates how far Cubans are willing to go to circumvent Castro's dictums. But it also exposes a certain elasticity in government control of the island.

Some of the deals made on the left, though illegal, are clearly tolerated. They sometimes take place in plain sight of uniformed police, or in view of the less obvious, but equally pervasive, network of neighborhood informers.

The sense of tolerance, however, can vanish abruptly. In August, shortly after Castro underwent stomach surgery and relinquished power during his recovery, government authorities swept through neighborhoods in a crackdown on illegal satellite dishes. The agents were presumably bent on blocking outside news broadcasts -- rife with rumors that Castro was dead or suffering from terminal cancer -- that might cast doubt on the rosier official accounts.

As word spread, Cubans scrambled to dismantle satellite dishes that had been open secrets, squirreling them under floorboards and in attics.

"There used to be dishes there, there, there," a man who lives in a Havana suburb said recently, pointing at his neighbor's homes.

"The funny thing is that they think we want to watch the news from Miami," said the man, a government port worker who, like dozens of others interviewed, spoke on condition of anonymity. "But all my wife wants to see are the soaps."

The Castro government says the restrictions that push so many Cubans to the left are, in some cases, necessitated by the U.S. trade embargo and, in others, a counteroffensive in the nearly half-decade propaganda war between the countries.

Satellite dishes are banned in order to block the U.S. government's TV Marti, which broadcasts programming critical of Castro, National Assembly President Ricardo AlarcÃ³n said in an interview. Internet use is restricted, he said, because the embargo prevents Cuba from tapping high-speed cables in international waters.

When the subject of food rationing comes up, AlarcÃ³n invariably points again to the U.S. embargo and to a declassified U.S. State Department memo written shortly before the trade embargo was enacted in the early 1960s. "The only foreseeable means of alienating internal support," the memo states, "is through disenchantment and disaffection based on economic dissatisfaction and hardship." The memo proposes "a line of action which makes the greatest inroads in denying money and supplies to Cuba, to decrease monetary and real wages, to bring about hunger, desperation and overthrow of government."

"It's equivalent to genocide," AlarcÃ³n said of the memo and of the subsequent embargo.

Even Cubans who are critical of the Castro government tend to have similarly heated reactions to the embargo. Their trips into the black market unspool as quiet acts of rebellion against both U.S. policy and the restrictions imposed by Castro.

Entire networks have developed to feed the black market system. There are suppliers, who skim materials from state-run enterprises. And there are middlemen, who buy the stolen goods and resell them.

One recent afternoon in Cojimar, a town outside Havana famed as a hangout of Ernest Hemingway's, a middleman sat shirtless in his living room, flashing signals at passersby. He gave a thumbs-up to a man looking for chicken; he shook his head at a woman looking for milk.

"Here, everything is on the left," he said, sweeping his arm across his modest home and shouting to be heard over a Steven Seagal movie that he'd picked up from an illegal DVD vendor.

The house, once half its current size, had grown wider and longer because of several dozen bags of cement that he had collected one at a time from "some guys" over more than a year. His guys would stuff their pockets with cement at the end of each workday until they had accumulated enough to fill a bag. The family's freezer bulged with chicken waiting to be resold, and the refrigerator held three large flans, because the middleman had come into a windfall of eggs.

"This is an art," he said, sagging back into a recliner. "Not everyone can sell like me."

That same afternoon, in another town near Havana, a 30-something Cuban went out in search of videos to rent. He walked down a street lined by homes with peeling facades, then stopped at an entrance that stood out because of its fresh paint job.

A gaunt man cracked the door open a few inches, and tersely asked: "What do you want?"

After poking his head out and looking each way down the street, the man ushered his customer inside. The floor was brand-new faux marble, the recliners plush velvet -- more signs of prosperity amid the street's decay.

"I've got some Julia Roberts, I've got some Al Pacino," he said.

But he had no intention of handing them over. Instead, he would relay a message to a courier, who would inform "the old man." The customer would have to wait six hours, then go to the old man's house to retrieve the movies.

"Things are tight now," the movie dealer said, explaining that police had been more vigilant since Castro's illness.

A few days later, back at the market where izquierda culture might be strongest, a customer was on the lookout for lobsters. A man stepped up to him and whispered, "Meet me two blocks down the street."

Lobsters, abundant in Cuban waters, are illegal in all but a few of the most expensive state-run restaurants. The rest of the catch is exported.

The lobster vendor hopped in the customer's car and directed him through a labyrinth of city streets to a colonial-era home. A man on the rooftop flashed a caution signal, and the vendor instructed the customer not to move.

The vendor slipped out of the car and disappeared through a door, reappearing 10 minutes later to wave the customer inside. At the top of the stairs, a woman appeared with a dozen beautiful lobster tails.

The customer handed over six dollars, grabbed the lobsters and dashed down the stairs. He wheeled his car back toward the market. Three blocks away, the vendor yelled, "Stop!"

He jumped out of the car, and in a moment, he was gone.

Mexican Gangs Displaying Severed Heads (AP)

By Will Weissert

AP, October 22, 2006

The drug lords at war in central Mexico are no longer content with simply killing their enemies. They are putting their severed heads on public display.

In Michoacan, the home state of President-elect Felipe Calderon, 17 heads have turned up this year, many with bloodstained notes like the one found in the highlands town of Tepalcatepec in August: "See. Hear. Shut Up. If you want to stay alive."

Many in Michoacan's mountains and colonial cities are doing just that: They are tightlipped, their newspapers are censoring themselves and in one town, 18 out of 32 police officers quit saying they had received death threats from drug smugglers.

In the most gruesome case, gunmen burst into a nightclub and rolled five heads onto the dance floor. In another, a pair of heads were planted in front of a car dealership in Zitacuaro, a town best known until now as a nesting ground for monarch butterflies.

By a highway outside Tepalcatepec, suspected drug smuggler Hector Eduardo Bautista's tortured body was dumped on July 10. Near a black metal cross put up by his family at the spot, killers apparently avenging his death have been leaving severed heads — five so far — each with a threatening message.

Beheadings and accompanying notes in sometimes cryptic and misspelled Spanish are becoming a ghoulish vogue among the gangs that grow marijuana, cook methamphetamine and run cocaine in Michoacan. There have been 420 homicides in the state this year, including 19 police chiefs and commanders, and Juan Antonio Magana, the state's attorney general, says well over half the killings were drug-related — the work of smuggling gangs reorganizing after authorities captured some of their top leaders.

"These are groups that are very big, very strong and are out to dominate territory," Magana said in an interview.

Drug smuggling in Michoacan has traditionally been controlled by a syndicate known as Los Valencia. Police arrested its leader, Armando Valencia, in August 2003 and one of his lieutenants, Carlos Alberto Rosales Mendoza, a year later.

Now, anti-narcotics investigators say, the Gulf cartel based in northern Mexico is battling its way into Los Valencia territory, relying on "Los Zetas," ex-Mexican army operatives-turned hit men. Los Valencia loyalists have fought back fiercely.

Many notes attached to slaying victims are signed "The Family," a possible reference to Los Valencia. Some mention "La Chata," a known alias for a top reputed Gulf cartel hit man.

"They don't need to leave written messages. The mere fact that they are using such high levels of violence is sending messages of intimidation, causing fear," Magana said. "But doing it shows other gangs they can act in even more gruesome and violent ways than their rivals."

With a vast and sparsely populated Pacific coast and the rugged Sierra Madre del Sur Mountains, Michoacan is good territory for producing and smuggling drugs.

Many farmers have abandoned avocado, coffee and corn in favor of marijuana in the highlands, where roads are few and police can't easily penetrate. Smuggling gangs have cleared forests for airstrips. Small planes crammed with Colombian cocaine streak in, leaving loads that are ferried to the coast and stowed on fast boats that speed north toward the U.S. border.

Michoacan also has become a den for hidden meth labs.

Journalists statewide have covered the murders but some have avoided digging further after receiving death threats. On Oct. 13, police recovered the body of an unidentified man who had been shot 38 times and dumped outside the town of Tacambaro. An attached note in fluorescent yellow marker appeared to directly threaten the media: "The family and the ZZs are the same thing. Media outlets, don't sell out."

Calderon, who will be sworn in as president on Dec. 1, wants a new, better trained federal police force to investigate drug smuggling, longer prison terms for drug convicts and more extraditions of kingpins wanted in the U.S.

He says Mexico also needs more help from U.S. law enforcement, since Mexican smugglers are serving American drug users.

Attorney General Magana denies Calderon's contention that Mexican law enforcement is overwhelmed. But in Villa Madero, a logging town of crowing roosters and stray dogs asleep on cracked asphalt streets, the abrupt mass departure of police officers suggests a different picture.

"There's an enormous pressure here," said former officer Reyes Alberto Gamino, now retired at 21. "It's very dangerous."

Mayor Alberto Villasenor has said the police were fired for failing to show up to guard a municipal dance Sept. 16. The former officers claim they quit because gunmen were waiting to kill them for arresting a reputed drug boss.

One of the officers who resigned is Gildardo Villa. Interviewed in front of his home, Villa seemed nervous, looking over his shoulder constantly and answering questions in hushed tones.

"The threats had been coming for a long time," he said. "That's why we left."

Inside his cramped City Hall office, Justice of the Peace Apolinar Yanez acknowledged that police are afraid of the gangs, whom he described as "very well armed and very dangerous."

"I'm not going to tell you who they are, not going to give you names or tell you what kinds of activities they are involved in. I don't want problems," Yanez said. "But they were threatening the police."

Since the police officers quit, many in Villa Madero say they are afraid to leave their homes.

"There's a fear that affects everyone," said Enrique Acerra, 70, who runs a used-clothing store. "It's hard to feel safe."

Torrent Of Mud Swamps Indonesia (WP/AP)

Sludge Unleashed By Rig Accident Displaces 10,000

DOJ_NMG_0084794

PORONG, Indonesia Factories that once produced watches and shoes lie under a sea of thick, stinking mud. Villagers stand on hastily constructed dams and gaze at the thousands of homes swallowed by brown sludge.

Four months ago, a torrent of hot mud from deep beneath the surface of Indonesia's seismically charged Java island began surging from a natural gas exploration site following a drilling accident.

The "mud volcano" pours out about 165,000 cubic yards of mud every day -- enough to cover a football field about 75 feet deep. Often spewing out in geyser-like eruptions, the mud has left about 665 acres swamped or abandoned as unsafe, forcing more than 10,000 people from their homes.

Experts say the mud volcano is one of the largest ever recorded on land. Geologists fear the technology may not exist to stop the eruption, saying mud could flow for years or even centuries -- or stop on its own at any time.

The mud is believed to come from a reservoir 3 1/2 miles below the surface that has been pressurized by shifts in the crust or by the accumulation of hydrocarbon gases.

The calamity has underscored the patchy safety record of mining companies exploiting the natural resources of this Southeast Asian nation made up of thousands of islands.

Police seized the drilling rig involved in the accident and are investigating whether to bring criminal charges against the principal well owner, PT Lapindo Brantas.

Lapindo, which is linked to the wealthy family of Indonesia's welfare minister, is paying for an ever expanding network of earthen dams to contain the mud, but many people fear the resulting slimy ponds will overflow during the approaching rainy season.

"The volume of mud that is coming out of the hole is not just large, it's enormous," Earl Hunt Jr., an engineer from Woodward, Okla., said while supervising dredging operations.

"We are running out of room up here, period," he said. "If they don't pump it to sea or something soon, then there will be more villages lost."

The government recently gave permission to dump the mud into the sea via a local river. But experts question whether that will get rid of the sludge faster than it gushes from the hole, and environmentalists are opposing the plan as a threat to the marine ecosystem.

The mud, which stands as deep as 16 feet in places, has submerged or washed into houses in four villages. At least 20 factories and many acres of rice fields and prawn farms have been destroyed.

The sludge has repeatedly washed over a major road, closing it for weeks at a time, and now it is threatening a rail line in the industrial area just outside Surabaya, Indonesia's second-largest city.

The mud, which is not toxic, first appeared several days after a blowout deep in Lapindo's well shaft May 29.

Police claim the company mishandled the accident by failing to cap the hole properly, allowing the mud to surge to the surface from several cracks close to the well.

Independent analysts also have said the company's activities were a factor in the torrent.

"This is a natural disaster induced by drilling activity," said Andang Bactiar, a consultant for the oil and gas industry who is working with authorities investigating the case. "Somehow, or somewhere, several mistakes occurred that caused the mud to come from the hole."

The company declined to give its version of what happened or the steps it took to stem the mud, citing possible legal liability. But spokeswoman Yuniwati Teryana said drilling activity had not been proven to be linked to the eruption.

The well is 50 percent owned by Lapindo. Another Indonesian firm, PT Medco E&P Brantas, has a 32 percent stake and Santos Ltd. of Australia holds the remaining 18 percent.

Lapindo has made emergency payments to those who have lost homes and promises to compensate their losses.

But in a country where mistrust of government runs high after decades of dictatorship that ended only in 1998, many people fear the company will try to dodge its responsibilities. The involvement of Welfare Minister Aburizal Bakrie's family in Lapindo has only added to worries.

"We are just poor people, our rights will be torn up as usual," one resident, Sukararji, said as he stood on a dam gazing at mud that reaches the second-floor windows of his house. "We are being stepped on like ants."

After two unsuccessful attempts to stop the flow, Lapindo is digging three shafts alongside the hole, hoping to kill the eruption by pumping in concrete.

Experts are skeptical that will work.

"If they manage to stop it, it will be the first time in the world that it has been done," said geologist Arif Munsyawar.

A New Tack On Darfur (WP)

By Morton Abramowitz

DOJ_NMG_0084795

The Washington Post, October 22, 2006

Instead of saving Darfur's people, their advocates may be prolonging their agony. They need to consider whether a different message is required to get urgent action from the Bush administration on ending the violence. Specifically: Is it not time to go beyond urging greater pressure on Sudan and using force in the region to seek immediately an effective negotiated peace settlement between Sudan's leader and the rebel groups in Darfur? That is a necessity in any event.

For three years nongovernmental organizations and the media have pursued a relentless campaign to persuade Western governments to stop the killing in Darfur, protect and feed its people, and get millions of refugees out of camps and back home. The recent renewed military carnage in Darfur has prompted continuing ads in major newspapers and on television imploring President Bush to get a United Nations force into Darfur to "stop the genocide."

This advocacy has rested on two assumptions: First, that only outside pressure will persuade Sudan's government to reverse course; the country's leader, Omar al-Bashir, will do nothing without a gun to his head. Second, if his government resists, Western governments can ultimately be persuaded to do the right thing -- to take aggressive measures to force Khartoum to capitulate. Such measures include a no-fly zone in Darfur, a blockade of Sudan's ports, NATO intervention and sending a U.N. force (whether or not Khartoum accepts it).

What have advocacy efforts accomplished so far? They have caught the attention of Sudan's government, brought in money to keep people alive and made it difficult for governments to avert their gaze. But they have not stopped Sudan's marauding or gotten Western governments to change the situation decisively. International officials say violence is worsening again. Meanwhile, 2 million displaced people remain warehoused.

What is the problem? While public pressure for aggressive military measures has sometimes worked in persuading Western democracies to take actions they prefer not to take, as in the Balkans, those governments interested in Darfur -- in Africa, Arab countries and NATO -- are divided. Robust military measures are, unfortunately, simply not acceptable to governments, whatever they may say about "never again." The United States, which could catalyze strong action, is hampered by its involvement in Iraq.

Indeed at times the advocates for Darfur have accepted half-hearted measures. Sending in an ill-equipped, understaffed and underfunded African Union force, however useful, did not end the killing, but it made the world believe that the problem was heading toward resolution.

When pressure is applied to the Sudanese government, there is always the perceived sense, much as there was in Vietnam, that just a little more and Khartoum will cave. Perhaps. But Bashir, admittedly no Ho Chi Minh, is sitting on growing oil revenue, and he can see that the international community is divided and that the demands for more aggressive action are going nowhere.

Moreover, many measures the advocates demand for bringing pressure on Bashir, such as targeted sanctions, an investigation of Sudan's business holdings or a threat of action by the International Criminal Court, hardly meet the standard of urgency, however much these things may be worth doing.

So how do we change course if the situation is so dire? Clearly regime change would be the best approach, though it's hard to believe we know how to do this without force. Failing that, we must accept that the Darfur Peace Agreement, reached in May, has collapsed and it is time to talk once again to Bashir about a more effective peace agreement.

To begin, the five foreign ministers of the permanent U.N. Security Council members and the head of the African Union should visit Khartoum immediately and tell Bashir that they intend to work with him to correct the flaws in the agreement and strenuously seek to get rebel groups on board. They will put trusted representatives at the negotiating site until a revised agreement is reached.

Bashir, in turn, must immediately stand down his forces, confine the Janjaweed militias and allow outside aid to flow to the displaced. China's government, no great humanitarian institution and a financier of Sudan, should be more willing to do this, since countries would be trying to work with Bashir, not pummel him.

This sort of effort is no easy matter. The diplomats might not like it, and it might not thrill the Sudanese government, even though Sudanese forces are performing badly in the Darfur area. Numerous practical problems would have to be worked out between the government and the fractious rebels, who are hard to corral. There is an unhappy history with the perfidious Bashir on negotiations. And even if an agreement can be forged, its durability is uncertain.

But this would constitute a serious and uncontentious effort to end immediately what we are told is a rapidly deteriorating situation. If it's not in the cards or doesn't work, Darfur advocates can again raise the decibel level, and perhaps part of the international community will finally get angry enough to match words with deeds.

Speaking To Syria (LAT)

DOJ_NMG_0084796

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

The isolated country could hold the key to Middle East peace, if only the U.S. would start talks.

'KEEP YOUR FRIENDS CLOSE, and your enemies closer." It's an adage the Bush administration surely knows, yet it continues to insist that merely talking to nasty regimes legitimizes and empowers them. This stance is impeding progress on Middle East peace. The U.S. should sit down and talk to Syria — and encourage Israel to do the same.

For years, the Syrians refused even to recognize, let alone negotiate with, Israel, or they set impossible preconditions. But lately Syrian President Bashar Assad keeps saying he wants peace talks.

Israel is internally divided on the wisdom of taking Assad up on the offer, knowing that Syria is weak and that the price of peace would almost certainly be the return of the Golan Heights. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has ruled out peace talks, but Public Security Minister Avi Dichter, Defense Minister Amir Peretz and Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni are in favor of finding out what kind of a deal Assad might have in mind — or of calling his bluff. The White House, however, is reportedly pressuring Israel not to negotiate with Damascus, arguing that to do so would undermine U.S. efforts to isolate and punish Syria.

Assad is certainly no democrat, and the U.S. relationship with Syria is unquestionably difficult. Syria has a strategic partnership with Iran, supports the terrorist group Hezbollah, was gleeful over Israel's setbacks during last summer's war in Lebanon and has not been helpful to the U.S. in Iraq — though its record on that score is improving.

But productive diplomacy is not simply talking to your like-minded friends. The need now is for the U.S. to press for peace in the Middle East rather than dwell on the undeniable faults of the Assad regime. For more than 30 years, the U.S. has endeavored to coax, cajole and browbeat Arabs and Israelis into forging a durable Middle East agreement. But with a global Islamist revival and a terrorist challenge — and with anti-Western sentiment raging in Arab nations — could the White House pick a worse moment to back away from its commitment to bring all parties to the negotiating table? Isn't it worth at least exploring whether Syria might be persuaded to recognize Israel or to stop supporting Hezbollah? The administration should realize that the mere act of talking to your adversaries is not a sign of weakness.

Talking to Assad does not require the United States to lift economic sanctions against Damascus. It doesn't prejudice the U.N. investigation of the assassination of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafik Hariri, for which Syrian officials, if implicated, should be brought to justice.

President Bush should send former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to Damascus. Baker, a veteran of many rounds of bruising negotiations with Assad's father, has said he favors talking to Damascus. An Israeli-Syrian breakthrough is attainable, and it could jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process. Baker also appears to believe that a peaceful future for Iraq will require the negotiation of regional security arrangements among Iraq's neighbors, including Syria and Iran. He'd best get started.

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Denies Entry To Muslim Scholar. The AP (10/22) reports, "An Islamic scholar from South Africa has been denied entry into the United States, prompting questions from Bay Area Muslims who had invited him to participate in activities marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan. Fazlur Rahman Azmi was detained by officials from U.S. Customs and Border Protection when he arrived at San Francisco International Airport from London on Friday afternoon, according to" CAIR. The scholar, "who made previous visits to the country as recently as April without problems, was questioned for hours before being denied entry and sent on a plane out of the country Saturday, the group said." The AP adds, "About 1,000 people are denied entry into the United States daily." The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

DOJ_NMG_0084800

Conspiracy Theorist Quits BYU. The AP (10/22) reports, "A Brigham Young University physics professor who suggested the World Trade Center was brought down by explosives has resigned, six weeks after the school placed him on leave." Steven Jones's retirement is effective Jan. 1, 2007." He "recently published theories about U.S. government involvement in the events of Sept. 11, including one suggesting that explosives inside the World Trade Center -- not airplanes striking the twin towers -- brought the complex down." BYU, which had begun investigating his research, "abandoned its review Friday after reaching a retirement agreement with Jones."

More Remains Found At Ground Zero. The AP (10/22) reports, "Workers recovered more human remains Saturday from several manholes as the city began a new search for Sept. 11 victims. The search was ordered after the surprise discovery of dozens of bones in an abandoned manhole this week. ... The active search for the dead ended at the site in 2002 after a massive cleanup of 1.5 million tons of debris." Bereaved relatives "of some Sept. 11 victims called for a federally led new search for remains."

WAR NEWS:

White House Denies Reports That It Is Drafting Iraq Timetable. In a front page story, the New York Times (10/22, A1, Cloud, 1.21M) reports that according to senior American officials, General George Casey and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad are "drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and assume a larger role in securing the country," which "is to be presented to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki before the end of the year" when, "for the first time" Iraq likely will be "asked to agree to a schedule of specific milestones." Senior officials' "willingness to discuss a plan that has not been fully drafted appeared intended at least in part to signal renewed flexibility on the part of the administration, and perhaps also to pre-empt the recommendations of" James Baker's bipartisan Iraq Study Group. It also "moves the administration closer to an idea advocated by many Democrats, who have called for setting a date for beginning phased withdrawals of American troops." Bush also "emphasized that the administration was staying flexible in its planning and would 'make every necessary change to prevail'" in his Saturday radio address. While "White House spokeswoman, Nicole Guillemard, said the Times's account was 'not accurate,'" she "did not specify what officials found to be inaccurate."

And McClatchy Newspapers (10/22, Walcott) report Bush "discussed the plan" for establishing milestones in disarming Iraqi militias "as well as broader strategic and tactical issues in Iraq, with his top military commanders on Saturday, and the officials stressed that any effort to step up the pressure on the Iraqi government would be consistent with the president's longtime strategy." The plan "could take some pressure off Republican candidates in next month's elections at a time when many are finding it increasingly difficult to defend the administration's 'stay the course' rhetoric. It also could blunt Democratic calls for a new direction in Iraq or for a phased withdrawal of American forces."

In contrast, the Washington Post (10/20, A8, Fletcher, 748K) reports, "Bush met with his top advisers and military commanders on Iraq," including Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Khalilzad and Casey, "in a White House session that, senior officials said, weighed options for forging a way forward amid the surging violence but did not contemplate any major shifts in strategy." The Post also disagrees with the Times in saying "in his Saturday radio address, Bush offered no indications on any major shift." The Post notes the Times story on a timetable, as well as the White House's denial of it. NSC spokesman Frederick Jones said, "The story is not accurate." Still, there is "growing U.S. frustration with the deteriorating state of affairs in Iraq," and "administration officials acknowledge that they have been pressing for months for the Iraqis to take greater responsibility for disarming warring militias and to take other steps to stabilize their country." Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush, also said "Benchmarks have been part of the U.S. policy in Iraq for months."

The AP (10/22, Loven) follows the same track as the Washington Post, saying the meeting "indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "I wouldn't read into this somehow that there is a full-scale push for a major re-evaluation." The AP also acknowledges the New York Times story.

Similarly, the Washington Times (10/22, Curl, 88K) reports, "With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG)…swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months." The President "sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, 'who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists.'"

Bloomberg (10/22, Keil, Capaccio) notes, "Colonel Nelson McCouch, a spokesman for General George Casey…said the approach described in the Times article wasn't new. 'We've been doing this all along,' he said. The U.S., McCouch said, has already established milestones that are adjusted according to conditions in Iraq and aren't hard deadlines."

US Diplomat Said To Admit "Arrogance" And "Stupidity" In Handling Iraq. The AP (10/20, Hendawi) reports that "In an interview with Al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department offered an unusually candid assessment of America's war in Iraq," saying "the United States had shown 'arrogance' and 'stupidity' in Iraq but was now ready to talk with any group except Al-Qaida in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation." He spoke to Al-Jazeera "after a man claiming to speak for Saddam Hussein's outlawed Baath Party told the network the United States was seeking a face-saving exodus from Iraq and that insurgents were ready to negotiate but won't lay down arms." Fernandez called the comments "very removed from reality."

However, a separate AP (10/22, Loven) article notes, "A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly," saying, "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position." Fernandez "disputes the description of his comments." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "he says…that is not an accurate reflection of what he said," and when asked if "the Bush administration believes that history will show a record of arrogance or stupidity in Iraq, McCormack replied, 'No.'"

Three Washington Post Columnists Criticize Administration Iraq Policy. The Washington Post op-ed section has several pieces devoted to Iraq. In the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), George Will writes critically of the administration's conduct of the war, "Today the policy of 'staying the course' means Americans dying to prevent Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other." In 1986 Reagan was advised "that his presidency could not be revived without the removal of Don Regan as White House chief of staff. Regan was removed. The Study Group almost certainly will, like the Tower Commission, refrain from making personnel recommendations. But is it plausible that the Bush presidency can pivot without changing senior Defense Department personnel?"

David Broder, in his column in the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), describes what Sens. Carl Levin and Jack Reed would do if Democrats regained the Senate. Both Levin and Reed would, with conditions, favor "engag[ing] directly in talks with representatives of" North Korea. Concerning Iraq, "the two Democrats harked back to the amendment that 39 senators supported during a debate earlier this year -- an amendment that called for a start on U.S. troop withdrawals within six months but set no numbers and specified no target date for ending the U.S. military presence." They argue that the US needs "to force the politicians in Iraq to realize we're not there as their security blanket," in Levin's words. However, they "quickly ruled out" cutting off "funds for the war," saying that change in control of even one chamber of Congress "would have a major impact, a huge motivating force on the president to change course," according to Levin.

James Hoagland, in his column in the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), criticizes the administration's conduct of the war, writing, "The bloody chaos of Iraq under U.S. occupation is shaking Western governments into sobering reassessments of that conflict and of war itself. More urgently, some of these governments have launched tightly held contingency planning for the consequences of a possible American failure in Iraq." Hoagland concludes, "The extent to which U.S. forces were unprepared for insurgency and sectarian warfare in Iraq has become painfully apparent. The lessons they are learning -- which have become prohibitively costly for Americans and Iraqis -- must never again be forgotten."

WPost Calls For Bush To Change Iraq Strategy. The Washington Post (10/22, B6, 748K), in an editorial titled "Change Course In Iraq," writes, "A revised U.S. strategy must aim to jump-start political accord and militia disarmament. But it must also provide for the possibility that decisive progress will not be achievable soon. It should position the United States to defend its interests during a protracted conflict, with levels of troops and other resources that will be sustainable. It should reach out to Iraq's neighbors and other governments with an interest in stabilizing the country. This calls for diplomacy far more deft and aggressive than the administration thus far has engaged in." The US "should abandon attempts to pacify Baghdad or other areas with its own forces. It should adopt a strategy of supporting the Iraqi government and army in a long-term effort to win the war. … Meanwhile, the U.S. and Iraqi governments should formally agree on a plan for turning the fighting over to Iraqi troops, province by province; Mr. Maliki himself has said he wants that transition to occur by the end of next year."

NYTimes Accuses Bush Of Using Iraq War For Political Gain. The New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), in an editorial, accuses President Bush of "finally" consulting with "his generals to consider a change in tactics in Iraq" because of the upcoming elections." The Times states, "For far too long, the White House has looked upon the war as a tactical puzzle for campaign strategists. The early notion of combining Iraq and the war on terror as an argument for re-electing Republicans robbed the nation of any serious chance for a bipartisan discussion of these life-and-death issues." The Times concludes, "There is probably no worse time to begin a serious discussion about Iraq policy than two weeks before a close, bitter election. But now that the discussion has begun, it must continue, as honestly and openly as possible. It is time for the American people to confront all the things that the president never had the guts to tell them about for three and a half years."

Iraqi Policemen Found To Be Part Of The Problem Of Baghdad Violence. In a front page article, the New York Times (10/22, Gordon, 1.21M) reports that "the American command acknowledged that the Baghdad security plan had yet to stem the escalating bloodshed in the city," and a "major reason" is that "After spending billions on building up Iraqi forces, and making withdrawal contingent on that buildup, the Americans have discovered that many of the Iraqi security forces are still not ready to handle security on their own. Throughout much of the city many Iraqis do not trust their own police forces." Iraqi forces "who were supposed to help the Americans keep the lid on the sectarian strife in Baya had stoked old animosities." Furthermore, "American officials say it is clear that the Iraqi forces vitally depend on the Americans for backup." Now "American troops have been sorting the good policemen from the bad the hard way: on the streets of Baghdad, as they try to stop the spiraling sectarian killings."

UK Minister Says Iraqi Army Is "Coming Along." The AP (10/21, Lawless) reports that Foreign Office Minister Kim Howells said that "Iraqi police and military should be ready to take on much of the work being done by U.S.-led forces within a year." Labour Party member Doug Henderson, a former defense minister, though, "said ... that Iraq would probably break into at least three countries -- Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish -- once allied troops have withdrawn." The Washington Times (10/22, Curl, 88K) cites his remarks in passing.

Despite Amara Cease-Fire, Worries Continue About Spread Of Violence. The New York Times (10/22, A14, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "Iraqi troops patrolled a tense cease-fire in the southeastern city of Amara on Saturday, but scattered clashes between rival Shiite militias farther north raised new concerns about the potential for a widening of the chaos that shook the city the day before," and "there were other indications that the Amara crisis was far from over." This "concern appeared to be shared by coalition military commanders, who moved a 600-man British battle group to the outskirts of Amara." However, according to government officials Moktada al-Sadr, the political master of one of the militias, "played a crucial role in calming Friday's violence, and that Mr. Sadr's representatives in the city were cooperating in talks aimed at avoiding a resumption." Also, "a government spokesman said senior officials dispatched from Baghdad were investigating the Friday upheaval and were working with tribal leaders and representatives of the rival militia groups on ways of reinforcing the truce, including steps to address the grievances that had caused the clashes."

Mortar Attack Kills 32. The Washington Post (10/22, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Mortar rounds fired by suspected Sunni Arab insurgents rained on a market crowded with shoppers Saturday, killing 32 Iraqis in a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad, hospital officials said. Three Marines were killed in attacks in the western province of Anbar, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in a year. Seventy-eight American troops have died this month in Iraq, the highest monthly toll since 84 U.S. troops were killed in November 2005." "Several" Mahdi Army members were among the dead in the market; "Sunni families hid in their homes after the attack, fearing retaliation."

October Becomes Deadliest Month Of 2006 In Iraq For US. The AP (10/22, Bodeen) reports the death toll in the market as 18 but repeats the Post's statement that October had become "the deadliest month for American forces this year." The UN "has said at least 100 Iraqis are now killed daily." The San Francisco Chronicle/AP (10/21, Salaheddin) also gives the toll of the marketplace bombing as a "confirmed" 18 dead. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Anti-American insurgents have launched a bombing and shooting campaign that has in part coincided with Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, as well as the midterm U.S. election and a more active American military presence in Baghdad and other areas."

Village Sheik Mediates Conflicts In Southern Iraq. In a front page, 2,226-word article, the Washington Post (10/22, Shadid, 748K) reports on Sheik Adnan Aidani of Yusufan who "has an unenviable task in his warren of mud brick, cinder block and concrete: keeping order in a land without it, where society is fracturing, crumbling, even disintegrating. The brutality of today's Iraq has washed over his largely Shiite village of 4,000: In the past few months, 10 people have been killed in Yusufan." The sheik "tries to draw on centuries-old traditions honed by Bedouins in the desert, rules built on honor, respect and reciprocity. ... But in the end, the threat of punishment secures respect for Aidani. That same threat gives power to militias, gangs and criminals who now hold sway even in the streets of a village like Yusufan." The Post relates several instances of conflict mediation by the sheik. Residents "estimate there are about 19 Islamic parties in the region around Basra, each with armed followers."

Iraqi Group Buries Unclaimed Dead. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Salman, Smith, 918K) reports on "a word-of-mouth burial society for the unclaimed dead, formed during the 1980s war with Iran, starting small and growing with the need. Today, about 500 men -- laborers, professionals, clerics and tribal leaders -- are members of the legation of the dead in this country where deep piety and terrible brutality have repeatedly intertwined." The group has a heavy workload as on "an average trip [to the cemetery], there will be 70 to 100 bodies, victims of the sectarian bloodletting that has gripped Iraq."

Professor Calculates War Has Cost Iraqis 40% Of National Income. The New York Times (10/22, Bernasek, 1.21M) in an "Economic View" article in its business section asks "What has been the cost of the Iraq war for Iraq? As it turns out, it's not easy to find an economist who can provide an answer. … Colin Rowat, has made some preliminary calculations using the best sources available. ... His calculations are a work in progress, but what he has found so far is sobering: the cost amounts to a cut of at least 40 percent in Iraq's national income."

State Department Poll Shows Iraqi Youth Want US To Leave. The AP (10/22, Shrader) reports, "Majorities of Iraqi youth in Arab regions of the country believe security would improve and violence decrease if the U.S.-led forces left immediately, according to a State Department poll that provides a window into the grim warnings provided to policymakers." The poll is "unclassified, but marked 'For Official Government Use Only.'" In it, "strong majorities of 15-to 29-year-olds in two Arab Sunni areas - Mosul and Tikrit-Baquba -- would oppose joining the Iraqi army or police," bespeaking "the difficulty that the U.S.-backed Iraqi government faces as it tries to add ethnic diversity to its security institutions."

Some Afghanis Upset With Government Turn To Taliban. In a 10,052-word article for the New York Times Magazine (10/22), contributing writer Elisabeth Rubin writes part I of her two-part article about the Taliban, in which she explains its resurgence and the reasons that the Pakistani ISI may have had for wanting a Taliban revival: "It is not at all clear that Afghans want the return of a Taliban government. But even sophisticated Kabulis told me that they are fed up with the corruption. And in the Pashtun regions, which make up about half the country, Afghans are fed up with five years of having their homes searched and the young men of their villages rounded up in the name of counterinsurgency." In Helmand province, where the Taliban had once suppressed opium, it now "agreed to protect it"; in addition, the US-backed warlords lost support because of their abuses.

Returnees And Families Brace For Next Tour In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Perry, 918K) reports on the stress of families waiting for troops to return from Iraq: "But amid the kisses and tears of relief there was the reality that Joyner and other members of the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing will probably return to Iraq, maybe next year. For families, another deployment means another prolonged period of constant worry in which every knock on the door carries the potential of the worst possible news." Relatives of several troops who have had three or four tours of duty are quoted.

Seamen Increasingly Become Part Of Ground Force. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/22, Hansen) reports, "The military calls them 'IAs,' shorthand for individual augmentees. They're the 46,000 men and women who have been picked from Navy units to serve, often facing danger, with soldiers and Marines in Afghanistan and Iraq. Once considered a short-term program, the Navy and defense experts acknowledge these sailors are now a permanent part of today's ground force." To reflect the permanence of the change, "The Navy this month created the Expeditionary Combat Readiness Center at Little Creek to track and assist those sailors uprooted from their ships and shore commands." Lexington Institute researcher Dan Goure "said the Navy should expect to fill its support role for a long time. Army and Marine units have been overstretched, deploying three and four times since the Iraq war began."

Debt Keeps Some Troops From Overseas Deployment. The New York Times/AP (10/22) reports, "Thousands of American troops are being barred from overseas duty because they are so deep in debt that they are considered security risks, according to a review of military records by The Associated Press. The number of troops held back has climbed sharply in the past few years. And while it appears to represent a small percentage of all military personnel, the increase is occurring at a time when the armed forces are stretched thin by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. ... The problem is attributed to several factors, including a lack of financial acumen among young recruits; reckless spending among those exhilarated to make it home from a tour of duty; and the profusion of so-called payday lenders."

Hemet High School Loses Three To Iraq War. In the Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K), columnist Steve Lopez visits Hemet, California, whose high school has had three graduates die in the war. Lopez visits the school, the Army recruiting office, and the family of "Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., 20, [who] was killed in Baghdad on Oct. 13." He observes, "Driving away, I find that I'm disturbed by the quiet acceptance of sacrifice to what has been a dubious mission from the beginning. I can't help but remind myself that the architects of the war have risked no personal loss, staying the course with someone else's children."

Doonesbury Creator Incorporates Iraq War Into Strip. In an 8,437-word article for the Washington Post Magazine (10/22, 748K), staff writer Gene Weingarten writes about Garry Trudeau's incorporation of the Iraq war into the Doonesbury comic strip. Weingarten reports, "Trudeau has been talking to injured vets for a couple of years now. It's partly compassionate support for people he has a genuine regard for, and it's part journalism -- the damnedest sort of reporting, for a professional cartoonist....you can't help but hear faint, soul-rattling echoes of Vietnam, which he escaped, like many sons of privilege, by gaming the system." When Trudeau decided to have a character injured in Iraq, he "got a call from the Pentagon. The brass was offering to help him figure out where to go next." Trudeau has won acceptance from former critic Sen. John McCain and a "standing ovation" from a Vietnam veterans' convention, at which he said, "I, like so many of our countrymen, must walk this strange line between hating the war but honoring the warrior."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Bears Burden Of Enron Collapse In Monday Sentencing. The AP (10/22, Lozano) reports, "Ken Lay's death wiped away his convictions. Andrew Fastow got a reduced six-year sentence. That leaves former CEO Jeffrey Skilling as the sole top Enron Corp. executive who could be given at least 20 years in prison when he is sentenced Monday for helping orchestrate the biggest corporate scandal in U.S. history." The AP continues, "In addition to the legal consequences of his actions, the burden of lost jobs, worthless pension plans and ruined lives that resulted from Enron's 2001 collapse has now shifted solely onto Skilling's shoulders. … Lay's death and the lighter than expected sentence handed last month to Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, will work against Skilling when he faces sentencing, former federal prosecutor Robert Mintz said." The AP adds, "Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Lay, Enron's founder, was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases. His death in July vacated those convictions. … Both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew an illusion of success was propped up by accounting maneuvers that hid debt and inflated profits. … 'In theory, the death of Ken Lay should have no impact on the sentence that Mr. Skilling receives. But it's hard to ignore the reality that Jeff Skilling is now standing alone as the figurehead who orchestrated Enron's demise,' Mintz said. 'There will certainly be pressure to make an example of Jeff Skilling and send a message with his sentence.'"

New UnitedHealth Board Chair Faces Difficult Rebuilding Task. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/22, Phelps) reports, "To fix a board gone bad, UnitedHealth Group Inc. turned to the guy who started the company's big push for profits 30 years ago." The Tribune continues, "Richard Burke, the new chairman of UnitedHealth Group, has a long history in Minnesota health care. In the 1980s, Burke ran a small company, then called UnitedHealthcare, that managed one of Minnesota's first HMOs, Physicians Health Plan (PHP). PHP eventually became Medica while UnitedHealth grew under William McGuire into the country's second-biggest health insurer. … Now, after McGuire's ouster a week ago in a stock-option scandal, Burke, 62, is presiding over a company with a badly wounded reputation and a board whose future is in doubt." The Tribune adds, "More than a dozen shareholder lawsuits await the company in federal court. The Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the Minnesota attorney general's office are sifting through corporate documents looking for legal violations."

Senate Probes SEC's Handling Of Allegations Against "Major" Bush Fund-Raiser. The New York Times (10/22, Bogdanich, Morgenson, 1.21M) reports, "By the evening of June 20, 2005, the government's investigation of possible insider trading by Pequot Capital Management, a prominent hedge fund, had reached a critical stage. Throughout the day, Robert Hanson, a branch chief in the Washington office of the Securities and Exchange Commission, had been questioning his lead investigator in the case about taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive. The investigator, Gary J. Aguirre, was trying to find out if Mr. Mack had obtained inside information about a merger and passed it to his friend, Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg. … But three days later, the investigation abruptly changed course. Mr. Aguirre later told a Senate committee that after news broke that Mr. Mack was being considered to run Morgan Stanley, his supervisor said he could not interview the executive because of his political power. Mr. Aguirre protested and was eventually fired." The Times adds, "Now, it is the S.E.C. that is under scrutiny. Two Senate committees — Finance and Judiciary — are investigating how diligently the S.E.C. pursued its Pequot inquiry, whether Mr. Aguirre's firing was an attempt to silence him, and whether senior S.E.C. officials gave special treatment to Mr. Mack by not taking his testimony when Mr. Aguirre wanted to. Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's 2004 campaign, was eventually interviewed last August, after Congress began asking questions."

Ruling On Election Of Directors Puts Pressure On SEC Chairman. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Peterson, 918K) reports, "In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox is widely credited with bringing accord to a panel that was bitterly divided over how aggressive it should be in policing corporate wrongdoing in the wake of Enron and other scandals." Cox "has shepherded a handful of reform-oriented measures without controversy, steering clear of proposals on which the odds of finding common ground appeared slim. Now, however, a federal appeals court decision has tossed a grenade-like issue into the SEC's chambers — putting Cox's diplomatic and leadership skills to their toughest test. The court decision is forcing the agency to again confront demands to give shareholders a bigger say in the nomination of corporate directors. … Although the panel's makeup has changed, it is not clear that the group of three Republicans and two Democrats can take more than a cautious step to open up elections before exposing its own ideological differences. Nor is it clear that Cox is prepared to follow his predecessor in bringing up matters that force him to cast contentious, tie-breaking votes."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Reaches Settlement With Columnist Over NCLB Promotion. The Washington Times (10/22, Debose, 88K) reports, "The Justice Department has reached a settlement with conservative commentator Armstrong Williams, closing a yearlong investigation into his promotion of Bush administration education reforms. The final eight-page agreement among Mr. Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum

DOJ_NMG_0084806

Communications, was reached Thursday. The carefully worded settlement papers…state that Mr. Williams is not guilty of any criminal violations, but must repay a portion of his fee to the federal government. According to the documents, Mr. Williams will have to pay $34,000 to settle the case."

Districts Use NCLB Funds To Purchase Products From Neil Bush's Company. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Roche, 918K) in a story titled "Bush's Family Profits From 'No Child' Act" reports, "A company headed by President Bush's brother and partly owned by his parents is benefiting from Republican connections and federal dollars targeted for economically disadvantaged students under the No Child Left Behind Act. With investments from his parents, George H.W. and Barbara Bush, and other backers, Neil Bush's company, Ignite! Learning, has placed its products in 40 U.S. school districts and now plans to market internationally. At least 13 U.S. school districts have used federal funds available through the president's signature education reform, the No Child Left Behind Act of 2001, to buy Ignite's portable learning centers at $3,800 apiece." The Times adds that although NCLB "provides federal funds to help school districts better serve disadvantaged students and improve their performance, especially in reading and math" Ignite "does not offer reading instruction, and its math program will not be available until next year." Neil Bush "said in an e-mail to The Times that Ignite's program had demonstrated success in improving the test scores of economically disadvantaged children. He also said political influence had not played a role in Ignite's rapid growth."

DOJ And FBI Reportedly Investigating AIPAC Lobbying On Behalf Of Harman. Time (10/20, Burger, 4.03M) reported on "an ongoing investigation" by the FBI and DOJ into whether Rep. Jane Harman and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee "may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee. … The sources tell TIME that the investigation…which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf." In response, Harman has "said that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be 'irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous.' On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation." According to Time, "The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin."

Katrina Evacuees Blamed For Spike In Houston Homicides. The AP (10/22) reports that, "Evacuees from Hurricane Katrina have contributed to an increase in Houston's annual murder rate, which could climb this year to its highest level in more than a decade" according to police. The AP notes, "Houston had 316 homicides as of Oct. 16. … an increase of 25 percent from the 252 slayings tallied at this time last year, putting the city on pace to record nearly 400 killings before the end of 2006." According to Capt. Dwayne Ready, "We … recognize that Katrina evacuees continue to have an impact on the murder rate."

School Violence Summit Considered Safety Options. The New York Journal News (10/22, Rae) reports, "President Bush's school security conference this month considered a long list of safety strategies, including emergency planning, metal detectors, student counseling and even God. … 'We call this in education a "teachable moment,"' U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said during the Oct. 10 conference in Maryland, which was organized after the shooting deaths of five Amish girls in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 and two other deadly attacks in Colorado and Wisconsin." The News continues, "The emphasis was on the need for communication and planning. Panelists stressed that most school attacks carried out by students followed some form of warning. They reviewed danger signs, such as a student's sudden changes in behavior, depression and suicidal thoughts. … Security precautions like metal detectors were another strategy under discussion, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed out that one in five school shootings occurred outside a school building. … The conference was criticized for not exploring another angle: the prevalence of guns, a common denominator in the recent attacks."

University Researcher Pleads Guilty To Scientific Misconduct. The New York Times magazine (10/22, Interlandi) reports, "On a rainy afternoon in June, Eric Poehlman stood before a federal judge in the United States District Court in downtown Burlington, Vt. His sentencing hearing had dragged on for more than four hours, and Poehlman…remained silent while the lawyers argued over the appropriate sentence for his transgressions. Now was his chance to speak. A year earlier, in the same courthouse, Poehlman pleaded guilty to lying on a federal grant application and admitted to fabricating more than a decade's worth of scientific data on obesity, menopause and aging, much of it while conducting clinical research as a tenured faculty member at the University of Vermont. He presented fraudulent data in lectures and in published papers, and he used this data to obtain millions of dollars in federal grants from the National Institutes of Health — a crime subject to as many as five years in federal prison. Poehlman's admission of guilt came after more than five years during which he denied the charges against him, lied under oath and tried to discredit his accusers. By the time Poehlman came clean, his case had grown into one of the most expansive cases of scientific fraud in U.S. history." The Times continues, "Before his fall from grace, Poehlman oversaw a lab where nearly a dozen students and postdoctoral researchers carried out his projects. His research earned him recognition among his peers and invitations to speak at conferences around the world. And he made nearly $140,000, one of the top salaries at the University of Vermont. All of that began to change six years ago, when (a colleague) took his concerns about anomalies in Poehlman's data to university officials. The subsequent investigation — a collaboration among the University of Vermont, the Office of Research Integrity (which is within the Department of Health and Human Services) and the United States Department of Justice — uncovered fraudulent research that stretched back through almost half of Poehlman's career. The revelations led to the retraction or correction of 10 scientific papers, and Poehlman was banned forever from receiving public research money. He was only the second scientist in the United States to face criminal prosecution for falsifying research data. … At 50, with his career in ruins and his reputation destroyed, Poehlman could only hope to avoid one final humiliation: becoming the first researcher sentenced to prison for scientific misconduct. … Citing the nearly $200,000 Poehlman had paid in restitution, his attorneys had asked the judge to sentence him to supervised probation."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Birmingham, AL, Involved In School Integration Dispute. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Jarvie) reports, "In Birmingham, Ala., a group of residents and activists opposes a bid to end a court's school desegregation order." The Times continues, "For 35 years under court order, the yellow buses have picked up black children from the city's Oxmoor Valley and carried them up the hill and across city limits to affluent, mostly white suburban public schools. … Rita Jones Turner was one of the first children to be bused to Vestavia Hills after a 1970 federal court order required the district to enroll African Americans from her neighborhood. … Today, her youngest son, a ninth-grader at Vestavia Hills High School, makes the same journey up the hill into a friendlier environment. … But last month, he came home with a letter informing her that the Vestavia Hills school board had filed a motion to end the desegregation order. The district is among a growing number across the nation seeking to have the decades-old orders overturned; this year, dozens have succeeded." The Times adds, "Those fighting to keep the order in place are particularly disappointed that the issue would be revisited in Birmingham, where so much of the civil rights movement's history was made. In the last 15 years, city leaders have built museums and monuments to commemorate the four schoolgirls who died in the 1963 bombing of a black church, and the demonstrators who were met with attack dogs in a march led by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. the same year. … But the district says its request is a matter of economics, not race — that absorbing the children of Oxmoor Valley is an unfair burden on its budget."

ACLU Web Site Defends Attacks On Organizational Leadership. The New York Times (10/22, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "Supporters of the leadership of the American Civil Liberties Union have created a Web site in response to one started last month by critics of that leadership." The critics' "site was started last month by more than 30 longtime supporters of the A.C.L.U. who say that actions taken by the executive director, Anthony D. Romero, and supported by the board have violated the organization's principles." Actions such as "the organization's use of data mining to collect information on donors, a proposal to monitor employees' e-mail messages and efforts to control board members' access to staff members and information."

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield's Premium Standard Buy Faces Antitrust Scrutiny. The Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader (10/22, Dobbs) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has begun an antitrust investigation of Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would combine the nation's two largest hog producers. … Additionally, at the behest of Midwest lawmakers and farmers who worry the deal would hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and allow the merged company to inflate pork prices for consumers, a Senate antitrust committee is planning hearings on the matter. At such hearings, lawmakers often hear testimony from company executives and their critics. .. 'This merger takes place in an industry already witnessing the decline of independent family farmers and rapid consolidation in meat production and packing. If this merger goes through, farmers will have even fewer choices for selling their hogs, and consumers will certainly be affected by the deal,' said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio." The Argus Leader continues, "DeWine chairs the Senate subcommittee that oversees antitrust concerns. He said in a recent statement that he plans to hold hearings on the Smithfield deal in the near future, and lawmakers 'will need to scrutinize this deal very carefully.' … A Justice Department spokeswoman would not confirm the deadline to complete the investigation. Nor has a date been set for the Senate committee hearings, according to Andrew Langworthy, a spokesman for DeWine. … But both could happen before the end of the year because Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, plans to finalize the acquisition in the first quarter of 2007. The company announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock." The Argus Leader notes, "Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, said shortly after the deal was announced that the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers and that he expects the Justice Department will approve the deal. … A national coalition of agriculture and consumer groups - including Dakota Rural Action and Dakota Resource Council - earlier this month lined up behind Sens. Tim Johnson and John Thune, both of South Dakota, and lawmakers from Iowa and Nebraska who called for the antitrust investigation."

ENVIRONMENT:

Critics Say Federal Prosecutors Lax In Pursuing Texas Polluters. The Houston Chronicle (10/22, Rice) reports, "After illegally using a pesticide to kill feral hogs — and in the process killing raccoons, mourning doves and crows — two Fayette County farmers were fined $500 in 2004. … That was the most recent conviction Houston's federal prosecutors have obtained on their own for an environmental crime. The lack of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office is remarkable for a city that has vied with Los Angeles for the title of the nation's smog capital, say environmentalists and some current and former officials. … 'We've got more (pollution) than anyone else in the country and, therefore, we should have a lot of prosecutions,' said Neil Carman, clean-air program director for the Sierra Club." The Chronicle continues, "Carman, who worked for 12 years for the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, noted that the Houston Ship Channel has the largest concentration of petrochemical plants in the nation and that Harris and Brazoria counties rank among the nation's most polluted. … Data from the Transactional Records Access Clearing House show, however, that the number of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas dwindled from 20 in fiscal 1998 to zero in 2005, the last year for which figures are available." The Chronicle adds, "U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, who took office in March, said the figures collected by TRAC, a research group associated with Syracuse University, don't show that his office is involved in 17 cases under investigation or before a grand jury. The only two new prosecutions in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30, were led by a special unit based in Washington, D.C., he said. … The sharp decline worries Sabrina Strawn, executive director of the Galveston-Houston Association for Smog Prevention, which has asked the federal government to take a stronger role."

Energy Industry Considers Caps On Carbon Emissions. The AP (10/22, Foss) reports that many "executives are convinced the United States is likely to join Europe in placing limits on carbon dioxide emissions" which is blamed for causing global warming "perhaps as early as next decade. This rising expectation of mandatory carbon caps is reviving interest in nuclear power, accelerating the use cleaner coal-burning technologies and spurring investment in alternative fuels such as wind and biomass." Some of the US' "biggest power producers are even setting voluntary greenhouse-gas reduction goals now in hopes of gaining a competitive edge down the road." Fearing "an unfair competitive advantage," many U.S. energy executives "vow to fight carbon limits unless the constraints are carried out worldwide." State legislative activity as well as federal tax breaks from last year's energy bill have motivated some utility companies to reduce emissions and has also brought about a renewed interest in nuclear power.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

ATF Cracking Down On Illegal Georgia Gun Sales. The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (10/22, Johnson) reports, "The owner of a Madison County gun shop told a convicted felon that silencers were 'illegal as hell,' but that he had a contact in Florida who could make one." The Banner-Herald continues, "Within nine months, the felon bought two silencers from 46-year-old Michael Curtis Oakley of Athens, in addition to a revolver, three semi-automatic pistols, an assault rifle and boxes of ammunition - all without a background check or filling out the required paperwork. … That's the allegation in a complaint filed this week in U.S. District Court in Athens. An agent with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said that a felon wore a hidden camera and microphone to capture each illegal transaction, as he helped make a case against the owner of Oakley Outdoor Sports in downtown Colbert." The Banner-Herald adds, "The complaint convinced a U.S. magistrate on Monday to authorize police and ATF agents to arrest Oakley for violating federal firearms regulations. The magistrate also signed warrants that led authorities to seize dozens of weapons from Oakley's gun shop and search his house at 356 Oak Meadows Drive, where officials confiscated documents and other evidence. … The agent's complaint purports to show how guns are winding up on the streets and in the wrong hands, even when the source is a federally licensed firearms dealer. … In a similar ATF sting last month, authorities arrested another Athens man and four others for allegedly trafficking in guns at the J&J Flea Market in Jackson County. According to indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Gainesville, the men weren't licensed firearms dealers, but they sold guns to convicted felons, illegal immigrants and an undercover ATF agent posing as an out-of state resident."

TAX:

Hurdles For Advancing Tax Reform Examined. Senior Washington Post reporter Jeffrey Birnbaum, in an article in the Washington Post (10/22, B2, 748K) "Outlook" section, examines how the tax code has become more complex since Congress passed the Tax Reform Act of 1986. Since then "Congress has passed nearly 15,000 changes to the tax law. Many of the loopholes that disappeared two decades ago are back. Now, as then, politicians (including President Bush) are branding the income tax unfair and calling for reform. And now, as then, few expect it to happen." Birnbaum offers five lessons for tax reformers. The first is to choose between making the tax code more fair or more simple as "one goal precludes the other." Birnbaum advises that "Divided government is a boon to reform, not an obstacle" as neither party will want the blame for not passing reform. And he warns tax-reform efforts "will be doomed if lobbying groups are united against it." While the 1986 tax bill was "revenue neutral," today it will "have to increase tax revenue, whether through rejiggering the code or by introducing new taxes -- making reform efforts that much more difficult and unlikely."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Former President Bush Denies Comments Critical Of Rice In Woodward Book. Former President George H. W. Bush, on CNN's Larry King Live (10/21, 9:10 p.m.), was asked about quotes attributed to him that were critical of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Former President Bush said, "If that's a quote, it is a lie. Can't make it any more clearer than that. I couldn't -- I like Condoleezza Rice. She worked for me. I have great respect for Condoleezza Rice. I can't believe Woodward -- I haven't read the book, that he actually said I said that." Larry King responded, "I think someone says you said it. I don't have it in front of me now. But it is quoted saying you didn't think she was equal to the task." Bush replied, "Well, that's crazy. I talked to her yesterday. I guess there were some hurt feelings or day before she went to this trip." He added, "She called me and said there is something in this book," and continued, "She said there is some remarks in there attributed to you, I don't believe it. I said 'well don't. I don't know what they are.'"

Amvets Conference Explores Ideas For Update Of Veterans Benefits System. Under the headline "Newest Vets Fed Up With VA Care," the Chicago Sun-Times (10/22, Toomey) reports, "The first National Symposium for the Needs of Young Veterans drew hundreds of vets to the Hyatt Regency O'Hare during its four-day run, which ended Saturday. They listened to speakers like retired Gen. Tommy Franks and Democratic congressional nominee Tammy Duckworth, and broke into small groups to come up with answers." Thomas C. McGriff, national commander of Amvets: "The goal is to develop an update of the veterans' benefits system. … The system really hasn't been looked at since World War II -- and we now have a new set of young veterans coming from Iraq and Afghanistan." The Sun-Times notes, "The VA had nearly a dozen senior benefits officials at the conference but will wait to see what recommendations Amvets develops before commenting, VA spokesman Ryan Steinback said."

OTHER NEWS:

Stalled Stock Market, Recent Reports Spur Concern Over US Economy. Bloomberg (10/22, Tsang) reports, "A three-week rally in U.S. stocks, which lifted the Dow Jones Industrial Average past 12,000 for the first time, slowed this week as earnings from Caterpillar Inc. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. underscored concern that profit growth has peaked." And recent economic reports "also cast more doubt on the economy's strength. Industrial production in September fell the most in a year, while manufacturing in the Philadelphia area unexpectedly contracted this month. The Conference Board's index of leading indicators…rose less than expected in September."

Newsweek Poll Shows Voters Favor Democrats Over GOP 55% To 32%. Newsweek (10/22, Mabry, 3.12M), in a web exclusive, reports that because of an erosion of support from evangelicals "the Republican base may be cracking." While Democrats have led in other opinion polls, Newsweek's new poll of 1,000 adults conducted October 19-20 (+/-4%) suggests "that a possible Republican loss could turn into a rout." Respondents had "more faith in the Democrats to handle almost every major issue presented in the poll." Yet the poll shows Republicans "seem to be closing the issues gap" after losing support because of the Rep. Foley scandal. And "if Republicans can turn voters' attention to national security, they could hold off, or at least hold down, a Democratic blitz come Nov. 7." But, "Republicans have a lot of work to do" as "a solid majority of Americans want the Democrats to take over Capital Hill, 55 percent, versus 32 percent who want the GOP to retain control -- a 23-point margin." And they "can't count on their biggest name, George W. Bush, to help much. While the new poll shows the president with a two-point bump in his approval rating -- from an all-time low of 33 percent two weeks ago to 35 percent today -- most Americans think Bush is already a lame duck. Fifty-six percent said he won't be able to get much done in his last two years in office. Only 33 percent believe he can be effective."

Bloomberg (10/22, Roland) notes the Newsweek poll shows Democrats lead 55% to 37% among likely voters and former House Majority Leader Richard Armey "said yesterday that Democrats may gain a majority of 10 seats in the House."

Brownstein Contends Bush's Record Is GOP's Top Liability. The Los Angeles Times' Ronald Brownstein (10/22) writes, "That discontent over Bush's performance and decisions, especially concerning Iraq, is the largest factor threatening the GOP hold on the House and Senate. One measure of Bush's impact on the election comes from the Majority Watch project conducted by the polling firms RT Strategies and Constituent Dynamics. Since the summer, the project has conducted nearly 75,000 automated phone surveys in congressional districts around the country. And it has found a close correlation between attitudes about Bush and preferences in November."

Variety Of Issues Across US Hurting GOP Candidates. The Boston Globe (10/22, Milligan, Klein, Bender, 425K) in a 2,423 word article reports, "To the distress of a Republican Party that has held control of the House for the past dozen years, many voters across the country seem to be nodding in angry agreement with" the Democratic slogan "Had enough," according "to interviews with voters in four states and new polls showing a double-digit preference for Democratic control of the House." And "no single issue is motivating voters' disaffection with the GOP -- and some issues, such as the Iraq war, are hurting the Republicans differently in various parts of the country."

Brooks Accuses Conservatives Of Abetting Moderate Republicans' Losses. The New York Times' David Brooks (10/22) writes, "When the next Congress convenes, there will be many fewer RINO's in town. You look at the vulnerable Republicans and it's like a moderate Republican graveyard: Deborah Pryce, a bright and effective member from Ohio; Christopher Shays from Connecticut; Sweeney from New York; Gerlach from Pennsylvania; Reichert from Washington; DeWine from Ohio. … For the past several years, Republican elites have treated the moderates, upon whom their majority depended, as the deformed cousins of their movement. Congressmen from rock-ribbed Republican districts who've never had to confront a dissenting view applaud themselves for their manly courage while scorning the effete wispiness of Northeastern Republicans who go home and battle derision every weekend."

Potential Democratic Control Of Congress Not Seen As Effecting Bush Style. Noah Feldman, adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, in an article in the New York Times Magazine (10/22) writes that "it is doubtful that the midterm elections will significantly alter the Bush administration's way of governing. For one thing," Vice President Cheney "has no intention of running for president himself. With the presidential election two years off, the Bush administration (read: Karl Rove) is very far from anointing a successor, if indeed it ever will." And "the day he leaves office…Bush will no longer be the leader of that party. His own incentives are not necessarily aligned with those of the G.O.P. faithful." Even if Democrats win control of Congress they will be left with congressional oversight, "an idea that right now gets their hearts racing but whose limits will eventually become apparent. … What Congressional Democrats cannot do, however, is change the basic direction of the country. The president has not presided as a flexible man, and many of the problems Congress will confront are at present intractable. Government in the sunshine is a good thing -- but a brightly lit Washington will still, mostly, be George W. Bush's Washington."

Sports Figures Offer Advice To GOP. The Washington Post (10/22, B3, 748K), in a special Outlook feature, asked several sports figures to offer advice to GOP candidates "on what to do when it's fourth and long in the bottom of the ninth -- with the other team set to retake your House. In one example former Redskins quarterback Mark Rypien says, "as far as the election goes, it's not even halftime. You've got to believe that people will come to their senses and rally around the team. Remember, the other team has never been in many winning situations. They don't know how to win. … They don't know what they're doing when the game is in the fourth quarter. You do."

Democrats Said To Have Shifted Focus To Just Three Senate Races. The Washington Post (10/22, A1, Babington, Balz, 748K) reports, "Democrats in the past two weeks have significantly improved their chances of taking control of the Senate, according to polls and independent analysts, with the battle now focused intensely on…Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia." According to the Post, "Strategists see Missouri as perhaps the purest test of whether Republicans can overcome a strong Democratic headwind this year because there are few state-related factors or scandals affecting the contest. Neither Sen. James M. Talent (R) nor the challenger, state auditor Claire McCaskill (D), has been able to gain a clear advantage, and strategists on both sides anticipate a photo finish."

The AP (10/22, Espo) reports the NRSC "has aired television commercials in New Jersey, hoping that Tom Kean Jr. can defeat Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats countered quickly, with four times as much money. Republicans apparently have not abandoned all hope in Michigan, either. President Bush is scheduled to campaign for challenger Mike Bouchard on Thursday. A party-financed television advertising campaign is possible, as well, aimed at toppling Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow. Increasingly, though, officials in both parties said the battle for Senate control probably will come down to close races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia."

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Brownstein, 918K) reports, "Two weeks before election day, odds are increasing that the Senate could turn on the results of close contests in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, three states along the border between the solidly Republican Deep South and Democratic terrain in the Northeast and industrial Midwest. Each of these states presents a distinct political puzzle. But Democrats face the common challenge of attracting right-of-center voters like Foust who helped Bush carry all three states two years ago but have soured on the nation's direction since. … Still, finding enough disenchanted voters remains difficult for Democrats in the three states, largely because of enduring Republican strength in socially conservative small-town and rural communities. If Democrats fall short in their bid to recapture the Senate, these three states may be their Heartbreak Hill."

House Democrats Portrayed As Cautiously Optimistic. The New York Times (10/22, Nagourney, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "There is something unusual bubbling in Democratic political waters these days: optimism. With each new delivery of bad news for Republicans…a party that has become so used to losing is considering, disbelievingly and with the requisite worry, the possibility that it could actually win in November. … For Democrats these days, life is one measure glee, one measure dread and one measure hubris. If they are as confident as they have been in a decade about regaining at least one house of Congress — and they are — it is a confidence tempered by the searing memories of being outmaneuvered, for three elections straight, by superior Republican organizing and financial strength, and by continued wariness about the political skills of President Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove." The Times adds, "Democratic candidates in districts that had been considered long shots are now pleading with" Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, "to send money their way. And some leading Democrats…are urging Mr. Emanuel to seize the moment by expanding the field in which Democrats are competing, saying the party has a chance to cement a big lead in the House in November."

Emanuel Given Credit For Making DCCC More Professional. The Washington Post (10/22, D1, Hendrix, 748K) reports, "As the member of Congress responsible for recruiting candidates for House races, raising money and vetting strategy for dozens of districts," Emanuel has "received raves from campaign connoisseurs in Washington for running a taut committee. Notably, he's nearly closed the perennial cash-on-hand gap between his team -- with $36 million in the bank at the end of September -- and its GOP counterpart. He's fielded credible candidates in districts no one had expected to be in play a year ago. And he's generally been flogging the party like a never-satisfied CEO. … If Democrats do take the House -- they need to gain 15 seats to do so -- Emanuel, in only his second term in Congress, stands to claim considerable credit for ending a 12-year electoral drought."

NRCC Said To Believe Foley Scandal Has Faded From Voters' Minds. The Washington Times (10/22, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Republican House candidates still feel some heat from the revelation that Rep. Mark Foley sent inappropriate and sometimes lurid Internet messages to teenage boys, but party leaders insist they are starting to get their message out again to voters. 'The Foley matter has become absolutely quiet in the vast majority of House races, as voters have been able to separate the actions of one member from his party,' said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC). 'In most races, voters say it will have no impact on their decision.'" The AP (10/22, Espo) reports, "After two weeks of adverse publicity linked to the Mark Foley scandal, public and private polling suggested partial recovery for some endangered Republican incumbents, and senior party officials made a concerted effort to project confidence. 'By many measures, there are strong indications of a right-of-center base that is engaged and committed,' party chairman Ken Mehlman said Friday in a memo written for public consumption."

Foley's Contact With Former Pages Detailed. The Washington Post (10/22, A1, Goldstein, Williamson, 748K) reports on former Rep. Mark Foley's relationships with congressional pages. According to the Post, although "No one interviewed for this article could cite any instance in which Foley had sex with a former page. … Interviews with nearly three dozen former pages suggest that" Foley "befriended a wide circle of teenagers during their stints as House pages. Then, shortly before they left or soon afterward, he singled out certain boys to write to -- including four newly confirmed by The Washington Post, in addition to former page Jordan Edmund and one other whose illicit online conversations with Foley ended the congressman's career. Some of the correspondence was brief and casual. But over months or years, if a boy seemed willing to go along, some conversations grew more sexual."

Military Veteran Candidates Said To Give Democrats Credibility On Iraq. The New York Times (10/22, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "As she campaigns for Congress in the suburbs of Chicago, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat and an Iraq veteran, speaks with chilling conviction about the war. Iraq was a big mistake, Ms. Duckworth says as she walks among voters on two artificial legs. Millions of dollars have been wasted there. … Though Ms. Duckworth is a political novice, her service and sacrifice (she lost her legs when a grenade hit her helicopter) have allowed her to speak her mind in a district once seen as downright hostile toward Democrats, having sent a Republican to Congress for 32 years. Around the nation, a handful of military veterans like Ms. Duckworth have emerged as competitive Democratic candidates for Congress. For a party that has struggled against a perception that Republicans are stronger on matters of terrorism and national security, the veterans have been a powerful antidote: a group that inherently carries credibility with voters on issues like Iraq." According to the Times, "Some 60 former service members are challengers for the House or the Senate as Democrats, including a half-dozen who served in Iraq. The Democrats are not shy about military résumés. Among their promotions is a 'Fighting Dems' Web site bearing the subtitle, 'Back from the front lines, headed to Congress.'"

Duckworth Described As "Struggling" In Bid To Succeed Hyde. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Huffstutter, 918K) reports Duckworth, "has spent $2.5 million on her fierce campaign in a GOP stronghold. … In the highly competitive and closely watched race…it's a Democrat who is doing the struggling. As of the end of September…Duckworth had spent all but $206,000 of the nearly $2.8 million she raised for her campaign in the Republican stronghold of DuPage County. One of the reasons? Trying to one-up her opponent, state Sen. Peter Roskam, in a race that heated up early." Roskam, "backed heavily by the National Republican Campaign Committee, rolled out ads questioning Duckworth's positions on the Iraq war and the military, and slamming her stances on taxes and immigration."

Many GOP House Districts Are Home To Growing Immigrant Communities. The AP (10/22, Ohlemacher) reports, "Of the 50 House districts nationwide with the fastest-growing immigrant communities, 45 are represented by Republicans. All but three of those lawmakers voted for a bill that would make illegal immigrants felons. Overall, GOP districts added about 3 million immigrants from 2000 to 2005, nearly twice the number that settled in districts represented by Democrats, according to an Associated Press analysis of census data. The numbers help explain why illegal immigration is such a big issue in rural Georgia, eastern Pennsylvania and in suburbs throughout the United States." The AP goes on to focus on several Georgia districts, noting, "North Georgia has attracted thousands of Latino immigrants — legal and illegal — to work in carpet mills in Dalton, in poultry plants in Gainesville and on farms that dot the landscape in between. The region exemplifies the struggle — and promise — of Latinos yearning for political power. Hispanics make up about 12.5 percent of the district represented by GOP Rep. Nathan Deal, but less than 2 percent of registered voters."

Webb Said To Have Yet To Master Retail Politics. The Washington Times (10/22, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Since the first day of his U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. has described himself as a nonpolitician. And the self-description rings true in his performance on the hustings. The decorated Vietnam War veteran's stiff and stern style of retail politics has been on display since his announcement in February that he would try to unseat Sen. George Allen, one of the state's most polished politicians. … On the campaign trail, the former Navy secretary is a far cry from former Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who is arguably the state's most personable public figure." Webb "gives firm handshakes, but at times needs a reminder to smile in photographs. He has a catchy belly laugh, but it rarely is heard in public. He thrives on foreign-policy issues, but sometimes loses people accustomed to candidates rattling off sound bites."

Outside Groups' Ads Highlight Steele And Cardin's Positions On Abortion. The Washington Post (10/22, C5, Marimow, 748K) reports, "Religious leaders and abortion foes are pumping more than $140,000 into the final two weeks of the Maryland U.S. Senate contest to motivate 'values voters' by elevating such issues as abortion and same-sex marriage in a campaign that has largely been fought over the Iraq war, the future of Social Security and the candidates' disparate styles. The issue of abortion, though, offers one of the starkest contrasts in the race: Republican Michael S. Steele, a former Catholic seminarian, strongly opposes the practice. Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore congressman, was the keynote speaker at NARAL Pro-Choice Maryland's annual gala last night in Rockville. Although the two major candidates rarely bring up the subject unprompted on the campaign trail, independent groups plan to highlight the issue in radio and television ads, direct mail and fundraising appeals."

Steele Said To Missed Opportunities To Establish His Independence. The Washington Post's Marc Fisher (10/22, C1) writes that Steele's "TV ads have been the talk of the town, not only for their striking style and the lieutenant governor's good humor, but because Steele is bold enough to take some shots at his party's orthodoxy. … Steele has managed to portray himself as someone who understands the average Marylander's frustration with both parties and with all the tired tropes of American politics." However, Fisher concludes, "Steele had a choice in this campaign: Add substance to the aura of independence generated by his TV ads, or hide behind that aura, spending his energy instead on pumping up the imagery. Sadly, he stuck with the sizzle, leaving voters still hungry for meat."

Lamont Gives His Campaign An Additional $2 Million. The AP (10/22, Miga) reports Ned Lamont, "trailing Sen. Joe Lieberman by a double-digit margin, dropped another $2 million into his Senate bid in Connecticut on Saturday." Lamont "has tapped his personal fortune for $12.7 million to fund his campaign. Lamont has about two weeks to catch Lieberman, a three-term incumbent who has pulled to a 17-point lead, according to a recent poll. … The third and final televised debate of the race was scheduled for Monday. Unlike their second debate, which featured all five candidates, only Lieberman, Lamont and Republican Alan Schlesinger will share the stage. That could make it easier for Lamont to engage Lieberman directly."

GOP Candidate Distances Himself From Potentially Libelous NRCC Spot. The AP (10/22) reports, "Both major-party candidates for a congressional seat are decrying an ad sponsored by a national Republican committee that accuses the Democrat of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line. … Arcuri's campaign said an associate mistakenly dialed an 800-number sex line two years ago from Arcuri's New York City hotel room, and released records supporting the claim. The number shares the same last seven digits with the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed the minute after the first call was made. Arcuri, the district attorney in Oneida County, said the ad was 'clearly libelous' and threatened to file a lawsuit. His GOP opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, described it as 'way over the line.' … The ad's sponsor, the National Republican Congressional Committee, stood by the 30-second message. Spokesman Ed Patru insisted it was 'totally true' and said Meier was not consulted."

Shays Vulnerability Attributed To National GOP's Unpopularity. The New York Times' Peter Applebome (10/22) reports, "In the 11th, count 'em, 11th, debate between Representative Christopher R. Shays, the incumbent Republican, and his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, Ms. Farrell began, as she usually does, with a brilliantly concise formulation of why people should oust Mr. Shays after 19 years in Congress. … Shays has an artfully articulated maverick image and is one of the more respected members of the House. Candidates like him lose about as often as Roger Federer loses first-round matches. But in a race starkly defined by the war, both camps say the election, a repeat of the one two years ago that Mr. Shays won with 52 percent of the vote, is close to dead even."

Jefferson Faring Well Despite Looming Federal Indictment. The Washington Post (10/22, A5, Lengel, 748K) reports that as Rep. William Jefferson "campaigns for a ninth term," he "has shed little light on the federal investigation of bribery allegations, other than to insist on his innocence. In a TV ad, he talks about 'the presumption of innocence afforded every person' and says, 'For over 18 months, the federal government has investigated me and has yet to bring a single charge against me.' That message appears to be resonating among voters…and so, despite the constant threat of a federal indictment that sources familiar with the probe say is a foregone conclusion, the 59-year-old congressman is confidently campaigning. Jefferson is showing up at public events, ready to work the crowd and touting a record of passing key legislation and getting funds to help post-Katrina New Orleans. Recently he went on the offensive, publicly accusing two of his 12 opponents of being 'ethically challenged.'"

Wilson Dragged Down By Voters' Opposition To Iraq War. The New York Times (10/22, Alvarez, 1.21M) reports, "In interviews with nearly two dozen people in Bernalillo [NM], a small, mostly Hispanic town on Route 66, and its neighbor, Placitas, which is more affluent and increasingly more Republican, voters expressed their concerns about the state of the nation. Asked what issues will sway their votes in the House race here, almost everyone interviewed said, 'The war and ...' (fill in the blank). For some Republicans here, this one-two punch — the war and the federal deficit, the war and corruption, the war and the House page scandal — is enough to catapult some to the other side. Or at least to get them thinking of voting for the other party, something few of them imagined two years ago, they said. … Representative Heather A. Wilson, who was first elected in this district in 1998, has won each election with a boost from Democrats. Now, though, she is in a dead heat with Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, according to recent polls."

Iraq War Is Main Topic Of Gerlach-Murphy Debate. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22, Walters) reports Rep. Jim Gerlach "accused Democratic challenger Lois Murphy in a debate Saturday of being inconsistent in her support for U.S. troops in Iraq, while Murphy countered that the war has made the nation less safe. The two-term congressman and Murphy are in battling to gain an edge in a race for a seat from the Philadelphia suburbs that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of Congress." Gerlach "charged in the AARP-sponsored debate that Murphy was not prepared to give U.S. troops the funding they need to help a new government succeed in Iraq."

Edwards Expected To Survive Challenge In Bush's Home District. The San Antonio Express News (10/22, Garcia) reports that GOP House candidate Van Taylor, "a Harvard University graduate who enlisted in the Marines and saw combat in Iraq, seems like the perfect Republican candidate for Congress." However, the GOP increasingly thinks him unable to "end the embarrassment of having a Democrat representing President Bush -- his Crawford ranch is in the district -- by knocking off entrenched incumbent Chet Edwards, the hometown congressman since 1991." The Express News writes, "A growing number of signs nationally suggest a Democratic wave may be in the offing Nov. 7," which may be strong enough to protect Edwards.

Candidates Offer Predictable Responses To Iraq WMD Questions. The New York Times' Mark Leibovich (10/22), in a "Week in Review" piece, writes that "it has become a settled expectation of political life that any candidate who supported the Iraq war resolution in 2002 must now answer the dreaded, 'If you knew then what you know now' question. That is, of course, some variant on the 'If you knew then that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, would you still have authorized President Bush to use force in Iraq?' … The variety of responses…can be distilled into a few predictable categories. Herein, a primer." According to Leibovich the "'No, but' Response…is by far the most common refrain among Democrats who supported the use-of-force resolution but who now wish they hadn't. The optimal answer should include a quick 'no,' followed by a swift indictment of the Bush administration's incompetence, dishonesty, stubbornness or some such unpleasant thing. And it never hurts to tack on an homage to the troops." Leibovich notes, "Early supporters of the war -- particularly Republicans -- often dispatch with the question in favor of a general lament about typical Washington nay-saying, second-guessing and defeatism (as practiced by 'Defeatocrats')."

NYTimes Endorses Five Democratic Congressional Candidates. The New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), in its New York Region Opinion section, "endorsed a string of congressional candidates, all of them Democrats challenging Republican incumbents. In New York's 19th Congressional District, the board endorsed the Democratic candidate John Hall over the incumbent, Republican Sue W. Kelly. It also endorsed Linda Stender over Representative Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's Seventh Congressional District, Chris Murphy over Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut's Fifth Congressional District, and Joseph Courtney over Representative Rob Simmons in the state's Second Congressional District.", It also "endorsed David Mejias, a Democratic member of the Nassau County Legislature, against Republican incumbent Peter T. King, who this summer said the decision of The New York Times to publish articles about a secret terrorist-surveillance program was treasonous.'"

Schwarzenegger Blasts GOP Candidate Over "Hate Crime" Mailing. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Martelle, Rosenblatt, 918K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "stepped up the pressure Saturday on an Orange County Republican congressional candidate, telling reporters that Tan Nguyen should withdraw if he knew about his campaign's mailing of letters intended to threaten immigrant voters. Schwarzenegger denounced the mailings traced to Nguyen's campaign to unseat Democratic incumbent Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District and said that 'anyone that knew…has to resign immediately.'" Schwarzenegger "said the mailings 'were illegal; it's a hate crime….There should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) editorializes, "the despicable incident was, sad to say, not new to Orange County: Republicans trying to scare immigrants away from the polls. But the GOP's reaction this time — calling on its candidate to withdraw — was miles away from previous behavior. Nativist immigrant bashing may be alive in the O.C., but it's not well."

Ehrlich Works To Attract To Democratic Voters. The Washington Times (10/22, Ward, 88K) reports Gov. Robert Ehrlich "rallied in Baltimore County with Democratic lawmakers and officials who endorse the Republican's re-election bid, as Democratic leaders urged voters in the city to defeat the governor even if they 'don't care for' the party's candidate to replace him. 'I have represented majority-Democratic districts for all of my entire career,' Mr. Ehrlich said, standing on a truck bed in a Dundalk parking lot before about 100 supporters. 'Many, many Democrats are stepping up ... not leaving their party, just voting for the person they believe will lead the state,' the governor and former congressman from Baltimore County said. An hour earlier, in the city's Remington area, black Democratic leaders attacked Mr. Ehrlich while denigrating his Democratic challenger, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley."

Friedman's Campaign Said To Have Become Somewhat More Serious. The AP (10/22, Arrillaga) describes three days of Richard "Kinky" Friedman's longshot Texas gubernatorial bid. The AP notes, "When Friedman launched his campaign last year in front of the Alamo, calling for the 'unconditional surrender' of [Gov. Rick] Perry with a country swing band by his side, he was far more Jon Stewart than John Kennedy. Then he hired on [Dean] Barkley, who directed [Jesse] Ventura's successful campaign and later replaced the late Paul Wellstone in the U.S. Senate. Friedman's 60-40 ratio of style-to-substance is now 40-60, says Barkley. The joke-laden speeches are sprinkled with Friedman's stance on legalizing casino gambling to help pay for education, decriminalizing marijuana to free up prison space, developing a taxpayer ID card for illegal immigrants to work."

Edwards Comments Regarding Clinton Regarded As "Foreshadowing" 2008 Primary. The Washington Post (10/22, A7, Goldfarb, 748K) reports, "Comments attributed last week to the wife of former North Carolina senator John Edwards (D) provided a faint foreshadowing of the intraparty battle that could arise when Democrats choose their presidential nominee in two years. Elizabeth Edwards said last Thursday that her life has been a happier one than that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), according to the magazine Ladies' Home Journal."

Columnist Says Democrats Need Strong Leadership From Obama. Frank Rich, in his column in the New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), writes that the important question for Democrats "is not whether" Sen. Barack Obama "will seek the presidency, but what kind of candidate he would be." The Democratic Party "needs a major infusion of steadfast leadership. That's the one lesson it should learn from George Bush. Call him arrogant or misguided or foolish, this president has been a leader. He had a controversial agenda -- enacting big tax cuts, privatizing Social Security, waging 'pre-emptive' war, packing the courts with judges who support his elisions of constitutional rights -- and he didn't fudge it. He didn't care if half the country despised him along the way." Rich contrasts Obama's "consistent" opposition to the Iraq War with Sen. Hillary Clinton and says that for Democrats, "one of their best hopes for long-term viability in the post-Bush era is that Barack Obama steps up and changes the party before the party of terminal timidity and equivocation changes him."

Candidates Shift Campaign Strategies To Account For Absentee Voters. The New York Times (10/22, Broder, 1.21M) reports, "For millions of Americans, Election Day is already over. Thirty states now allow no-excuse absentee voting, and most of them also allow voters to cast early ballots in person at county clerks' offices or satellite polling places. In Montana, absentee ballots were mailed Sept. 22. As many as 40 percent of Florida's voters will cast their ballots before Election Day, Nov. 7. Oregon's elections are conducted entirely by mail, and Washington is moving that way. California sent out 3.8 million absentee ballots the week of Oct. 8. Candidates are maneuvering to adapt to a changed political calendar, accelerating their advertising, their mailings and their get-out-the-vote calls. They are figuring out exactly who votes early and are trying to get to them before they cast their ballots. They are raising more money and spending it faster. … Experts estimate that more than 20 percent of voters nationwide will cast their ballots before Election Day by mail or at early-voting locations, a proportion of the electorate that is rising with each election."

California Voters Faced With Ballots As Long As 124 Pages. The Washington Post/AP (10/22, A4, Konrad) reports, "Voter guides are landing with a thud on doorsteps across California as residents are facing an unusually large number of ballot measures and candidates in next month's election. Election officials worry that the state's largest guides -- 192-page books sent to 12 million homes -- will overwhelm and discourage would-be voters. The array of complicated issues on the ballot might also lead to long lines and delays at polling sites if people haven't done their homework. A majority of voters are expected to vote by mail. But the ballots are so big that election officials fear some might be returned for insufficient postage. … The November sample ballot in San Joaquin County is the largest ever -- 100 to 124 pages, depending on the district, or triple the normal size. Many pages are devoted to a proposed tax increase to pay for road and rail projects."

Mining Executive Financing West Virginia GOP Candidates. The New York Times (10/22, Urbina, 1.21M) reports, "Don L. Blankenship is not the governor of West Virginia. But here in coal country some say he may as well be, considering the power he wields. Mr. Blankenship, the chief executive of the state's largest coal producer, Massey Energy, has promised to spend 'whatever it takes' to help win a majority in the State Legislature for the long-beleaguered Republican Party in a state that is a Democratic and labor stronghold. In a state where candidates who win typically spend less than $20,000, Mr. Blankenship has poured more than $6 million into political initiatives and local races over the past three years. Mr. Blankenship has spent at least $700,000 in his current effort to oust Democrats, and the state is awash with lawn signs, highway billboards, radio advertisements and field organizers paid for by him."

Minnesota's Independence Party Works To Broaden Its Reach. The Washington Post (10/22, A8, Defiebre, 748K) reports, "In 12 years as a major political party in Minnesota, the Independence Party has produced one larger-than-life governor, an appointed U.S. senator for 7 1/2 weeks and a smattering of local officials. Now the party of Jesse Ventura is pinning its hopes on eight statewide and federal candidates, none of whom has ever stood for election before, plus a collection of 17 seekers of lesser offices. … In some ways, the Independence Party is a serious political force while in others it's still a struggling newcomer."

Members Of Congress Now Wary Of Appearing On Colbert Report. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Puzzanghera, 918K) reports, "Most politicians are as likely to pass up free TV face time before an election as they would be to refuse a campaign check. Then again, there's a price to be paid for looking stupid. That's what members of Congress have learned recently about 'Better Know a District,' a sarcastic weekly skit that is part of 'The Colbert Report,' a nightly half-hour on Viacom Inc.'s Comedy Central network. … Many lawmakers initially played along with the segments in which Colbert interviews a member of the House of Representatives, with few checks and balances on his proclivity to make fools of them. But after a couple of House members stumbled badly on the show, some incumbents decided that the dumbest thing to do with Colbert's offer of free TV exposure was to take it."

Campaign Funding Analysis Suggests GOP Will Retain Control Of Congress. Barrons (10/22, McTague) reports that its analysis of candidates' finance data suggests that, contrary to conventional wisdom, "the GOP will hang on to both chambers, at least nominally. We expect the Republican majority in the House to fall by eight seats, to 224 of the chamber's 435. At the very worst, our analysis suggests, the party's loss could be as large as 14 seats, leaving a one-seat majority. But that is still a far cry from the 20-seat loss some are predicting. In the Senate, with 100 seats, we see the GOP winding up with 52, down three." The prediction is based "in almost every race on which candidate had the largest campaign war chest, a sign of superior grass-roots support. We ignore the polls." According to Barron's, using campaign funding as an indicator is close to 98% accurate in recent years for House races and 89% accurate for Senate races.

Nation Of Islam Prepares For New Leadership. The Washington Post (10/22, A3, Fears, Harris, 748K) reports that as Louis Farrakhan battles a "life-threatening" illness members of the Nation of Islam's board are "poised to take over the organization." The Post adds, "A change in leadership could allow the Nation to move away from a controversial mythology. Followers are taught that the group's founder, Wallace Fard, was an incarnation of God and that a scientist named Yacub created white people, notions that are dismissed by orthodox Muslims."

Rice Prods Russia On Freedoms, Georgia.

Secretary Rice's trip to Russia received coverage in major newspapers, but the stories focused mainly upon her criticism of Russian domestic freedoms and Georgia policy, devoting little space to North Korea. The New York Times (10/22, Shanker, 1.21M) reports that upon arriving in Russia to discuss the North Korean nuclear crisis, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice criticized shrinking Russian press freedoms, questioned the enforcement of a restrictive new law on foreign private groups here and called for eased tensions between Russia and neighboring Georgia." All this "raised the possibility of a testy atmosphere for the discussions in Moscow." With "a symbolic decision that no doubt will be scrutinized by the Kremlin leadership, Ms. Rice invited senior editors of Novaya Gazeta, a leading independent journal, to a meeting at her hotel" that "included the son of the assassinated journalist Anna Politkovskaya," and "Rice said that the future of a free Russian press and electronic media 'is a major concern' of the United States government.." She also said she "would ask Russian leaders to explain the enforcement of a new law that requires foreign nongovernmental organizations to register with the government," and "planned to urge Moscow to reduce any chance for increasing conflict with neighboring Georgia." She met with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and a dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov, and a senior State Department official "described Ms. Rice's discussions with Mr. Lavrov on Georgia as 'constructive.'" Rice "also intended to discuss efforts to halt not only North Korea's nuclear program, but Iran's."

The Washington Post (10/22, A21, Kessler, 748K) adds, "Rice's high-profile meeting" with the journalists was "scheduled at the request of the State Department," and "her decision to highlight her concern about eroding press freedoms in Russia indicated the delicate balance the Bush administration is trying to strike with Russia." One of Rice's aides said "it was not a poke in the eye but the right thing to do." AFP (10/22, Milikin) describes Rice as delivering "some pointed messages," and the AP (10/22, Gearan) labels it "a symbolic rebuke." The Washington Times/AP (10/22, Gearan) publishes a version of the AP article.

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Holley, 918K) focuses equally on the North Korea issue and Rice's other activities. It quotes Dmitry Muratov, editor of Novaya Gazeta, as saying "I was touched to the soul to see how Condoleezza Rice, both as a person and a politician, found precise, delicate and tactful words to express her deep sorrow and sympathy in front of the slain journalist's son."

In Latest Anti-Expression Incident, Thugs Beat Activist Moscow Art Gallery Owner. The New York Times (10/22, Kishkovsky, 1.21M) reports that in "the latest incident to raise troubling questions about xenophobia and freedom of expression in Russia," a group of men burst into Marat Guelman's contemporary art gallery, "destroying work by an ethnic Georgian artist and beating up the owner." Guelman is "well known both for his display of politically inspired and irreverent art and, most recently, his public attacks on neofascists for their dislike of non-Russians and of Western influence on Russian society." It was not clear if the attack was motivated by his criticism of the Kremlin, his displaying art considered antireligious by Russian Orthodox fundamentalists, his criticism of neofascists and nationalists, or the "anti-Georgian sentiment that has surged this fall."

Anti-Immigrant Mood Intensifies In Russia. The New York Times (10/22, Myers, 1.21M) profiles Aleksandr Belovm, the founder of the Movement Against Illegal Immigration, which "now claims thousands of members in branches across all of Russia." His "views -- unabashedly hostile to foreigners, at times unflinchingly racial in character -- are no longer just tapping a nativistic undercurrent, but moving into the mainstream of the political debate" amidst "a wave of racial violence." President Putin "gave such simmering feelings a public endorsement," on Oct. 5, "denouncing the 'semi-gangs, some of them ethnic' that control Russia's wholesale and retail markets."

Georgia Rules Out Force Against Separatist Regions. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22) reports that in "a rebuttal to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's assertion Friday at a summit with European Union leaders that Georgia was planning to take back South Ossetia and Abkhazia by military means," Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili "ruled out the use of force to establish control over two pro-Russian separatist regions" and "said Tbilisi remained open to dialogue with Moscow to reduce tension that has escalated since the former Soviet republic temporarily detained four purported Russian spies last month."

Russia Opposes Punitive Measures For Iran.

The AP (10/22, Gearan) reports that "even before" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "arrived in the Russian capital, her Russian counterpart said Moscow will not allow the Security Council to be used for punitive measures against Iran."

DOJ_NMG_0084819

Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov did say that "Russia…was ready to discuss ways to pressure Iran into accepting broader international oversight of its nuclear program." AFP (10/22) adds that Lavrov said "Russia would oppose any effort to use the UN Security Council to promote a change of regime in Iran." However, he added that "the Iranian side must finally bow to the constructive proposals that have been made and fully cooperate with the IAEA."

Russia Gives Rice Assurances On North Korea Sanctions. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Holley, 918K) reports, "Rice pressed Russia for a tougher stance against nuclear proliferation." She "mentioned possible U.S.-Russian cooperation in enforcing sanctions against North Korea under the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative."

AFP (10/22, Milikin) adds, "Russia has indicated it would strictly enforce sanctions on North Korea as US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met top leaders in Moscow." A senior State Department official said, "'It seems clear that the Russians take 1718 seriously'…referring to the UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea."

Rice Said To Be Deflecting North Korea Criticism With Optimism On China. In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (10/22, A21, Kessler, 748K) reports, "Many experts regard North Korea's test as a failure of Bush's nonproliferation policy." However, with "her trip to Asia this week," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has come close to saying the test was a net plus for the United States. She has tried to deflect criticism by saying the test was an affirmation, rather than a failure, of the Bush administration's policy of trying to draw China deeper into negotiations on North Korea." Other U.S. officials also "have begun to depict China's increasingly central role in the administration's myriad foreign policy problems as a significant achievement." However, Rice acknowledged that "the shift will not 'happen in one fell swoop,'" and "that it was still unclear how hard the Chinese government would push North Korea."

US Reiterates Nuclear Protection Of South Korea, Using Stronger Language. The AP (10/22, Mann) reports, "The U.S. is pledging 'immediate support' of South Korea as part of a 'firm' commitment to defend its ally under America's nuclear umbrella, stronger language than in last year's version of their long-standing policy statement." At their meeting Friday, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung "disagreed over how explicitly the U.S. should say that South Korea is under that umbrella," as "the South Korean delegation sought to persuade Pentagon officials to issue a public statement saying that if the North attacked the South with nuclear weapons, the U.S. would retaliate as if American territory itself had been attacked by nuclear weapons." However, "U.S. officials resisted, saying that would go beyond what the U.S. normally says publicly about how it would respond with regard to nuclear weapons. For decades, U.S. policy has been deliberately designed to include some ambiguity about the circumstances under which it would use nuclear arms."

South Korea Continues Projects In The North, Which Is Said To "Signal Strength." The AP (10/22, Herman) reports, "South Korea is still sending tourists to a mountain resort in the North and maintaining a joint economic zone, despite pressure to cancel the projects after Pyongyang's nuclear test," as "cutting off the joint projects…would mean Seoul would lose influence in the North, leaving the isolated nation wide open for China — the North's No. 1 trade partner and a key source of aid." However, "the U.S. has scoffed at the tourism venture…saying the project simply hands money to the North Korean government," and "has questioned labor practices in a joint economic zone where North Korean workers provide cheap labor for South Korean firms." Still, "China has made increasing economic inroads in the North in recent years, and South Korea has expressed concern that North Korea could become a de-facto Chinese province." Intensely nationalistic Koreans worry "that China is staging a shadow campaign to maneuver for position after a North Korean collapse." The AP concludes, "Seoul's reluctance to back out of its projects with North Korea could be a way of signaling strength — and ensuring that Koreans will have a land to call their own for centuries more."

UN Diplomats Said To Dread North Korean Ambassador's "Tirades." The Washington Times (10/22, McElroy, 88K), in an article titled, "Envoy's Tirades Elicit Chuckles At U.N.," reports, "Diplomats at the United Nations dread the arrival of North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil-yon at the microphone. Known sarcastically as Dr. Chuckles for his highly-strung manner, he is a master of florid tirades," and one a diplomat said, "We never get anything worthwhile out of him." Pak's "performance has done nothing to salvage the already low reputation of North Korean diplomacy."

In Stopping Trade, China Must Balance Instability Against North Korean Collapse. The New York Times (10/22, Onishi, 1.21M) reports, "North Korea's porous 880-mile border with China is its lifeline to the outside world," and "For China, the bottom line is to erect the right number of fences, as it did along the border city of Dandong recently. Build too few and you invite instability in China. Build too many and North Korea collapses," which "is clearly something Beijing doesn't want," as it "might send more North Koreans into China" or "could also bring reunification of the Korean Peninsula under America's ally South Korea."

Kristof Blames North Korea Nuclear Weapons On Bush Policies, Calls For Engagement. Nicholas D. Kristof writes in his column in the New York Times (10/22, 1.21M) that Bill Clinton "inherited a situation that, if it had continued, would have resulted in North Korea having hundreds of nuclear weapons by now, and producing an additional 50 each year. Instead, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal with North Korea that resulted in it producing not a single ounce of new plutonium in his eight years in office. In contrast, President Bush inherited that North Korean nuclear freeze and, if he had just left it alone, North Korea wouldn't have produced any new plutonium. But Mr. Bush overruled Colin Powell's efforts to continue the engagement — and so North Korea has churned out enough plutonium on Mr. Bush's watch for perhaps eight nuclear weapons."

Journalist Notes North Korea Situation Involves "Old-Fashioned Clash Of Nations." Peter Maass, a contributing writer and former reported from South Korea for The Washington Post, in the New York Times Magazine (10/22) writes, "We can now thank North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, who is credited with directing several movies, for creating a Mexican standoff," one "that involves a) as many as six participants, including b) countries that are threatening one another with c) nuclear weapons." Still, it is the "old-fashioned clash of nations and national interests, exacerbated, as often happens, by the imperatives of regime survival," demonstrating that "new threats, like Islamic extremism, do not replace old ones." This situation, "history shaped by the rivalries, interests and missteps of nations rather than terrorists dashing from hideout to hideout," is "the way the world has been ordered and disordered since the emergence of the nation-state and even before, and it did not vanish on Sept. 11, 2001," just as "certain basic facts — war is an extension of politics, politics are often driven by a need for resources as well as collective feelings of pride or shame — remain much the same in the wake of Sept. 11."

Corruption Said To Be Rampant In China. In a week in review article, the New York Times (10/22, Yardley, 1.21M) reports that "there is the perception, fair or not, that official corruption is everywhere in China," and "To some extent, the ruling Communist Party does not disagree." With "an economic boom gilded with excess and profiteering, official corruption is so widespread, and increasingly so brazen, that it is almost taken for granted." While much malfeasance goes undiscovered or is covered up by the party," that "information that does reach the public domain is stunning." Although "President Hu Jintao and Prime Minister Wen Jiabao have warned that corruption threatens the credibility and legitimacy of Communist Party rule and have vowed to stamp it out," many experts warn "that truly stamping out corruption would involve the type of broad political reform and a full embrace of the rule of law that the party has long resisted," and "would topple…many of his own political allies." Instead, "the government responds largely with propaganda campaigns." Still according to some experts, "to some extent, the corruption problem is not atypical for the country's stage of development,"

Facing Domestic Stress, Egypt Presses US To Resolve Palestine. The New York Times (10/22, Slackman, 1.21M) reports that senior officials say, "Faced with twin political threats — a rising Islamic movement at home and diminished influence throughout the region — Egypt is pressing the United States for an aggressive promotion of Palestinian statehood as a means of strengthening itself and other Arab governments allied with Washington." They "see a major regional peace initiative by Washington as the first necessary step toward stealing momentum from Islamic groups," although "optimism is limited that Washington will put the stated interests of its Arab allies ahead of the perceived interests of Israel." In "evidence of growing concern and frustration here," during her recent visit "Egyptian officials told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice…that the United States should move straight 'to the endgame'" in Palestine.

Abbas Calls On Retired Commander To Curb Hamas In West Bank. The AP (10/22, Federman) reports that "a day after Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas leader, said the Islamic group would beef up its militia in Fatah's West Bank stronghold, Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas brought security commander Ismail Jaber "out of retirement Saturday to block Hamas from building up its forces in the West Bank, the latest sign that the standoff between the Islamic militant group and Fatah could erupt into widespread violence." He "has been tainted by corruption but is respected by thousands of gunmen loyal to Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement." Previously Abbas had "forced Jaber and other senior officials into retirement as part of his efforts to root out corruption." Now, an official close to the Palestinian leader said that he "hopes Jaber will help him curb Hamas' plans in the West Bank."

Veil Debate Said To Represent Shift In Britons' Limits Of Tolerance. The New York Times (10/22, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Rarely has Britain's struggle to define its relationship with a disaffected and diverse Muslim minority seemed so fraught as it was last week, with the debate fixated on where a woman can wear…the niqab, the full-face veil," which, for Britons, "has come to offer an emblem by which Islamic separation may be criticized without challenging the right of 1.6 millions Muslims — fully 3 percent of the population — to practice their faith." The debate "seems to signal a broader shift as non-Muslim Britons set new limits of tolerance, not just for recent immigrants but for a younger, home-grown generation of more assertive British Muslims," and "there is a ginger step toward the notion that the right of the group might trump the right of the individual under more circumstances." Concurrently, "A blame-game question is emerging: Who is responsible for the widening gulf between majority and minority?" For Muslims born and raised in Britain, the "paradox" is that they "are an integral part of the society that seems to reject them. To be accepted, they need to assert their presence, yet in doing so, they fall afoul of pressures to conform to the standards of the non-Muslim majority.

Former Dutch Lawmaker Calls For Reform, Moderate Approach To European Muslims, Immigraiton. Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a former Dutch legislator from Somalia who now lives in the U.S. where she is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) that the worst-case scenario for Europe will be if "the warnings of the" pessimists about immigration are "not be heeded" and the "optimism" immigration's proponents is "abandoned." Then, "the monopoly of force that is now exclusive to states will be challenged by armed subgroups. European societies will be divided along ethnic and religious lines," and "Europeans will come to accept the de facto implementation of Sharia law in certain neighborhoods and even cities." However, if Europeans are cautious but lively, they can create the best case scenario. It begins with "controlled or planned immigration," as the "current system in most European countries is designed to attract the highest number of people with truly heartbreaking stories, not the highest number of people who are willing and able to adapt to the European society."

Schroeder Says Bush's Religiosity Created Reservations. The AP (10/22, Eddy) reports, "Ex-Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose second term was marked by vehement opposition to the war in Iraq, described in an advance copy of his memoirs how he was suspicious of President Bush's constant references to his Christian faith." He "said he could not reconcile himself with the feeling that religion was the driving force behind many of Bush's political decisions," writing, "What bothered me, and in a certain way made me suspicious…was again and again in our discussions how much this president described himself as 'God-fearing.'" Schroeder also "accused some elements in U.S. as being hypocritical when it comes to secularism in government. 'We rightly criticize that in most Islamic states, the role of religion for society and the character of the rule of law are not clearly separated,' Schroeder wrote. 'But we fail to recognize that in the USA, the Christian fundamentalists and their interpretation of the Bible have similar tendencies.'" The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22) runs a shortened versions of the AP story.

Panama Expected To Vote To Expand Canal. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Kraul, 918K) reports, "Voters are likely to approve a $5.2-billion project to expand the Panama Canal today, according to polls, despite warnings of an accumulation of debt, competition, technical miscalculations and possible environmental damage. Only scattered opposition has developed," and they "have been obscured by the well-oiled campaign by the government of President Martin Torrijos to sell the expansion as a competitive necessity." Still the opposition says "the expansion amounts to fixing something that isn't broken, and that the nation is risking its most important asset on dubious engineering and financial assumptions." Also, "skeptics say that cost overruns are inevitable and that they will be shouldered by taxpayers."

US Embargo Blamed For Cuban Market Restrictions. The Washington Post (10/22, A14, Roig-franzia, 748K) reports, "'Por la izquierda ,' or 'on the left;' Cubans use the phrase to describe back-alley deals both large and small. They scheme on the left to cope with chronic shortages and to skirt myriad rules that prohibit most forms of private enterprise and govern the minutiae of their daily lives." The Cuban government says "the restrictions that push so many Cubans to the left are, in some cases, necessitated by the U.S. trade embargo and, in others, a counteroffensive in the nearly half-decade propaganda war between the countries." A Cuban official said, "It's equivalent to genocide." The Post added that "even Cubans who are critical of the Castro government tend to have similarly heated reactions to the embargo. Their trips into the black market unspool as quiet acts of rebellion against both U.S. policy and the restrictions imposed by Castro."

Mexican President-Elect Seeks Help From US In Fighting Drug Lords. The AP (10/22, Weissert) reports, "The drug lords at war in central Mexico are no longer content with simply killing their enemies. They are putting their severed heads on public display." Mexican president-elect Felipe Calderon "wants a new, better trained federal police force to investigate drug smuggling, longer prison terms for drug convicts and more extraditions of kingpins wanted in the U.S. He says Mexico also needs more help from U.S. law enforcement, since Mexican smugglers are serving American drug users. Attorney General Magana denies Calderon's contention that Mexican law enforcement is overwhelmed. But in Villa Madero…the abrupt mass departure of police officers suggests a different picture." A local official said that the local police are afraid of these gangs he described as "very well armed and very dangerous." Subsequently, "since the police officers quit, many in Villa Madero say they are afraid to leave their homes."

Over 10,000 Homeless After Indonesian Mudslide. The Washington Post /AP (10/22, A20, Brummitt) reports, "Four months ago, a torrent of hot mud from deep beneath the surface of Indonesia's seismically charged Java island began surging from a natural gas exploration site following a drilling accident. The 'mud volcano' pours out about 165,000 cubic yards of mud every day -- enough to cover a football field about 75 feet deep. Often spewing out in geyser-like eruptions, the mud has left about 665 acres swamped or abandoned as unsafe, forcing more than 10,000 people from their homes."

New Perspectives Needed In Darfur. Morton Abramowitz, a senior fellow at the Century Foundation and a former assistant secretary of state, in an op-ed in The Washington Post (10/22, B7, 748K) writes that perhaps we "need to consider whether a different message is required to get urgent action from the Bush administration on ending the violence. Specifically: Is it not time to go beyond urging greater pressure on Sudan and using force in the region to seek immediately an effective negotiated peace settlement between Sudan's leader and the rebel groups in Darfur?" Abramowitz criticizes the media's "relentless campaign to persuade Western governments to stop the killing in Darfur, protect and feed its people, and get millions of refugees out of camps and back home." Abramowitz cites the problem of "public pressure for aggressive military measures has sometimes worked in persuading Western democracies to take actions they prefer not to take ... Robust military measures are, unfortunately, simply not acceptable to governments, whatever they may say about 'never again.'"

LATimes Urges Administration To Talk With Syria. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) editorializes that the Bush administration "continues to insist that merely talking to nasty regimes legitimizes and empowers them. This stance is impeding progress on Middle East peace. The U.S. should sit down and talk to Syria -- and encourage Israel to do the same." Instead, the White House "is reportedly pressuring Israel not to negotiate with Damascus, arguing that to do so would undermine U.S. efforts to isolate and punish Syria." The Times adds, "The administration should realize that the mere act of talking to your adversaries is not a sign of weakness." Therefore, "Bush should send former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to Damascus. Baker, a veteran of many rounds of bruising negotiations with Assad's father, has said he favors talking to Damascus. An Israeli-Syrian breakthrough is attainable, and it could jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

HOMELAND RESPONSE:

US Denies Entry To Muslim Scholar. The AP (10/22) reports, "An Islamic scholar from South Africa has been denied entry into the United States, prompting questions from Bay Area Muslims who had invited him to participate in activities marking the end of the holy month of Ramadan. Fazlur Rahman Azmi was detained by officials from U.S. Customs and Border Protection when he arrived at San Francisco International Airport from London on Friday afternoon, according to" CAIR. The scholar, "who made previous visits to the country as recently as April without problems, was questioned for hours before being denied entry and sent on a plane out of the country Saturday, the group said." The AP adds, "About 1,000 people are denied entry into the United States daily." The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) carries an abbreviated version of this story.

Conspiracy Theorist Quits BYU. The AP (10/22) reports, "A Brigham Young University physics professor who suggested the World Trade Center was brought down by explosives has resigned, six weeks after the school placed him on leave." Steven Jones's retirement is effective Jan. 1, 2007." He "recently published theories about U.S. government involvement in the events of Sept. 11, including one suggesting that explosives inside the World Trade Center -- not airplanes striking the twin towers -- brought the complex down." BYU, which had begun investigating his research, "abandoned its review Friday after reaching a retirement agreement with Jones."

More Remains Found At Ground Zero. The AP (10/22) reports, "Workers recovered more human remains Saturday from several manholes as the city began a new search for Sept. 11 victims. The search was ordered after the surprise discovery of dozens of bones in an abandoned manhole this week. ... The active search for the dead ended at the site in 2002 after a massive cleanup of 1.5 million tons of debris." Bereaved relatives "of some Sept. 11 victims called for a federally led new search for remains."

WAR NEWS:

White House Denies Reports That It Is Drafting Iraq Timetable. In a front page story, the New York Times (10/22, A1, Cloud, 1.21M) reports that according to senior American officials, General George Casey and Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad are "drafting a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and assume a larger role in securing the country," which "is to be presented to Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki before the end of the year" when, "for the first time" Iraq likely will be

"asked to agree to a schedule of specific milestones." Senior officials' "willingness to discuss a plan that has not been fully drafted appeared intended at least in part to signal renewed flexibility on the part of the administration, and perhaps also to pre-empt the recommendations of" James Baker's bipartisan Iraq Study Group. It also "moves the administration closer to an idea advocated by many Democrats, who have called for setting a date for beginning phased withdrawals of American troops." Bush also "emphasized that the administration was staying flexible in its planning and would 'make every necessary change to prevail'" in his Saturday radio address. While "White House spokeswoman, Nicole Guillemard, said the Times's account was 'not accurate,'" she "did not specify what officials found to be inaccurate."

And McClatchy Newspapers (10/22, Walcott) report Bush "discussed the plan" for establishing milestones in disarming Iraqi militias "as well as broader strategic and tactical issues in Iraq, with his top military commanders on Saturday, and the officials stressed that any effort to step up the pressure on the Iraqi government would be consistent with the president's longtime strategy." The plan "could take some pressure off Republican candidates in next month's elections at a time when many are finding it increasingly difficult to defend the administration's 'stay the course' rhetoric. It also could blunt Democratic calls for a new direction in Iraq or for a phased withdrawal of American forces."

In contrast, the Washington Post (10/20, A8, Fletcher, 748K) reports, "Bush met with his top advisers and military commanders on Iraq," including Vice President Cheney, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld, Khalilzad and Casey, "in a White House session that, senior officials said, weighed options for forging a way forward amid the surging violence but did not contemplate any major shifts in strategy." The Post also disagrees with the Times in saying "in his Saturday radio address, Bush offered no indications on any major shift." The Post notes the Times story on a timetable, as well as the White House's denial of it. NSC spokesman Frederick Jones said, "The story is not accurate." Still, there is "growing U.S. frustration with the deteriorating state of affairs in Iraq," and "administration officials acknowledge that they have been pressing for months for the Iraqis to take greater responsibility for disarming warring militias and to take other steps to stabilize their country." Dan Bartlett, a top aide to Bush, also said "Benchmarks have been part of the U.S. policy in Iraq for months."

The AP (10/22, Loven) follows the same track as the Washington Post, saying the meeting "indicated little inclination for major changes to an increasingly divisive policy." Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said, "I wouldn't read into this somehow that there is a full-scale push for a major re-evaluation." The AP also acknowledges the New York Times story.

Similarly, the Washington Times (10/22, Curl, 88K) reports, "With leaks from the independent Iraq Study Group (ISG)…swirling around Washington, the White House has rejected a few trial balloons floated in recent weeks. Those include partitioning Iraq into three sections based on ethnicity and religion and withdrawing 5 percent of U.S. troops every two months." The President "sounded more open to alternative tactics. He said the Iraqi prime minister recently met with tribal leaders from Anbar province, 'who told him they are ready to stand up and fight the terrorists.'"

Bloomberg (10/22, Keil, Capaccio) notes, "Colonel Nelson McCouch, a spokesman for General George Casey…said the approach described in the Times article wasn't new. 'We've been doing this all along,' he said. The U.S., McCouch said, has already established milestones that are adjusted according to conditions in Iraq and aren't hard deadlines."

US Diplomat Said To Admit "Arrogance" And "Stupidity" In Handling Iraq. The AP (10/20, Hendawi) reports that "In an interview with Al-Jazeera television aired late Saturday, Alberto Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs at the State Department offered an unusually candid assessment of America's war in Iraq," saying "the United States had shown 'arrogance' and 'stupidity' in Iraq but was now ready to talk with any group except Al-Qaida in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation." He spoke to Al-Jazeera "after a man claiming to speak for Saddam Hussein's outlawed Baath Party told the network the United States was seeking a face-saving exodus from Iraq and that insurgents were ready to negotiate but won't lay down arms." Fernandez called the comments "very removed from reality."

However, a separate AP (10/22, Loven) article notes, "A senior Bush administration official questioned whether the remarks had been translated correctly," saying, "Those comments obviously don't reflect our position." Fernandez "disputes the description of his comments." State Department spokesman Sean McCormack said "he says…that is not an accurate reflection of what he said," and when asked if "the Bush administration believes that history will show a record of arrogance or stupidity in Iraq, McCormack replied, 'No.'"

Three Washington Post Columnists Criticize Administration Iraq Policy. The Washington Post op-ed section has several pieces devoted to Iraq. In the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), George Will writes critically of the administration's conduct of the war, "Today the policy of 'staying the course' means Americans dying to prevent Shiites and Sunnis from killing each other." In 1986 Reagan was advised "that his presidency could not be revived without the removal of Don Regan as White House chief of staff.

Regan was removed. The Study Group almost certainly will, like the Tower Commission, refrain from making personnel recommendations. But is it plausible that the Bush presidency can pivot without changing senior Defense Department personnel?"

David Broder, in his column in the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), describes what Sens. Carl Levin and Jack Reed would do if Democrats regained the Senate. Both Levin and Reed would, with conditions, favor "engag[ing] directly in talks with representatives of" North Korea. Concerning Iraq, "the two Democrats harked back to the amendment that 39 senators supported during a debate earlier this year -- an amendment that called for a start on U.S. troop withdrawals within six months but set no numbers and specified no target date for ending the U.S. military presence." They argue that the US needs "to force the politicians in Iraq to realize we're not there as their security blanket," in Levin's words. However, they "quickly ruled out" cutting off "funds for the war," saying that change in control of even one chamber of Congress "would have a major impact, a huge motivating force on the president to change course," according to Levin.

James Hoagland, in his column in the Washington Post (10/22, 748K), criticizes the administration's conduct of the war, writing, "The bloody chaos of Iraq under U.S. occupation is shaking Western governments into sobering reassessments of that conflict and of war itself. More urgently, some of these governments have launched tightly held contingency planning for the consequences of a possible American failure in Iraq." Hoagland concludes, "The extent to which U.S. forces were unprepared for insurgency and sectarian warfare in Iraq has become painfully apparent. The lessons they are learning -- which have become prohibitively costly for Americans and Iraqis -- must never again be forgotten."

WPost Calls For Bush To Change Iraq Strategy. The Washington Post (10/22, B6, 748K), in an editorial titled "Change Course In Iraq," writes, "A revised U.S. strategy must aim to jump-start political accord and militia disarmament. But it must also provide for the possibility that decisive progress will not be achievable soon. It should position the United States to defend its interests during a protracted conflict, with levels of troops and other resources that will be sustainable. It should reach out to Iraq's neighbors and other governments with an interest in stabilizing the country. This calls for diplomacy far more deft and aggressive than the administration thus far has engaged in." The US "should abandon attempts to pacify Baghdad or other areas with its own forces. It should adopt a strategy of supporting the Iraqi government and army in a long-term effort to win the war. … Meanwhile, the U.S. and Iraqi governments should formally agree on a plan for turning the fighting over to Iraqi troops, province by province; Mr. Maliki himself has said he wants that transition to occur by the end of next year."

NYTimes Accuses Bush Of Using Iraq War For Political Gain. The New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), in an editorial, accuses President Bush of "finally" consulting with "his generals to consider a change in tactics in Iraq" because of the upcoming elections." The Times states, "For far too long, the White House has looked upon the war as a tactical puzzle for campaign strategists. The early notion of combining Iraq and the war on terror as an argument for re-electing Republicans robbed the nation of any serious chance for a bipartisan discussion of these life-and-death issues." The Times concludes, "There is probably no worse time to begin a serious discussion about Iraq policy than two weeks before a close, bitter election. But now that the discussion has begun, it must continue, as honestly and openly as possible. It is time for the American people to confront all the things that the president never had the guts to tell them about for three and a half years."

Iraqi Policemen Found To Be Part Of The Problem Of Baghdad Violence. In a front page article, the New York Times (10/22, Gordon, 1.21M) reports that "the American command acknowledged that the Baghdad security plan had yet to stem the escalating bloodshed in the city," and a "major reason" is that "After spending billions on building up Iraqi forces, and making withdrawal contingent on that buildup, the Americans have discovered that many of the Iraqi security forces are still not ready to handle security on their own. Throughout much of the city many Iraqis do not trust their own police forces." Iraqi forces "who were supposed to help the Americans keep the lid on the sectarian strife in Baya had stoked old animosities." Furthermore, "American officials say it is clear that the Iraqi forces vitally depend on the Americans for backup." Now "American troops have been sorting the good policemen from the bad the hard way: on the streets of Baghdad, as they try to stop the spiraling sectarian killings."

UK Minister Says Iraqi Army Is "Coming Along." The AP (10/21, Lawless) reports that Foreign Office Minister Kim Howells said that "Iraqi police and military should be ready to take on much of the work being done by U.S.-led forces within a year." Labour Party member Doug Henderson, a former defense minister, though, "said ... that Iraq would probably break into at least three countries -- Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish -- once allied troops have withdrawn." The Washington Times (10/22, Curl, 88K) cites his remarks in passing.

Despite Amara Cease-Fire, Worries Continue About Spread Of Violence. The New York Times (10/22, A14, Burns, 1.21M) reports, "Iraqi troops patrolled a tense cease-fire in the southeastern city of Amara on Saturday, but scattered clashes between rival Shiite militias farther north raised new concerns about the potential for a widening of the chaos that shook the city the day before," and "there were other indications that the Amara crisis was far from over." This "concern appeared to be shared by coalition military commanders, who moved a 600-man British battle group to the outskirts of Amara." However, according to government officials Moktada al-Sadr, the political master of one of the militias, "played a crucial role in calming Friday's violence, and that Mr. Sadr's representatives in the city were cooperating in talks aimed at avoiding a resumption." Also, "a government spokesman said senior officials dispatched from Baghdad were investigating the Friday upheaval and were working with tribal leaders and representatives of the rival militia groups on ways of reinforcing the truce, including steps to address the grievances that had caused the clashes."

Mortar Attack Kills 32. The Washington Post (10/22, Knickmeyer, 748K) reports, "Mortar rounds fired by suspected Sunni Arab insurgents rained on a market crowded with shoppers Saturday, killing 32 Iraqis in a predominantly Shiite city south of Baghdad, hospital officials said. Three Marines were killed in attacks in the western province of Anbar, making October the deadliest month for U.S. forces in a year. Seventy-eight American troops have died this month in Iraq, the highest monthly toll since 84 U.S. troops were killed in November 2005." "Several" Mahdi Army members were among the dead in the market; "Sunni families hid in their homes after the attack, fearing retaliation."

October Becomes Deadliest Month Of 2006 In Iraq For US. The AP (10/22, Bodeen) reports the death toll in the market as 18 but repeats the Post's statement that October had become "the deadliest month for American forces this year." The UN "has said at least 100 Iraqis are now killed daily." The San Francisco Chronicle/AP (10/21, Salaheddin) also gives the toll of the marketplace bombing as a "confirmed" 18 dead. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Daragahi, 918K) reports, "Anti-American insurgents have launched a bombing and shooting campaign that has in part coincided with Ramadan, the Muslim holy month of fasting and atonement, as well as the midterm U.S. election and a more active American military presence in Baghdad and other areas."

Village Sheik Mediates Conflicts In Southern Iraq. In a front page, 2,226-word article, the Washington Post (10/22, Shadid, 748K) reports on Sheik Adnan Aidani of Yusufan who "has an unenviable task in his warren of mud brick, cinder block and concrete: keeping order in a land without it, where society is fracturing, crumbling, even disintegrating. The brutality of today's Iraq has washed over his largely Shiite village of 4,000: In the past few months, 10 people have been killed in Yusufan." The sheik "tries to draw on centuries-old traditions honed by Bedouins in the desert, rules built on honor, respect and reciprocity. ... But in the end, the threat of punishment secures respect for Aidani. That same threat gives power to militias, gangs and criminals who now hold sway even in the streets of a village like Yusufan." The Post relates several instances of conflict mediation by the sheik. Residents "estimate there are about 19 Islamic parties in the region around Basra, each with armed followers."

Iraqi Group Buries Unclaimed Dead. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Salman, Smith, 918K) reports on "a word-of-mouth burial society for the unclaimed dead, formed during the 1980s war with Iran, starting small and growing with the need. Today, about 500 men -- laborers, professionals, clerics and tribal leaders -- are members of the legation of the dead in this country where deep piety and terrible brutality have repeatedly intertwined." The group has a heavy workload as on "an average trip [to the cemetery], there will be 70 to 100 bodies, victims of the sectarian bloodletting that has gripped Iraq."

Professor Calculates War Has Cost Iraqis 40% Of National Income. The New York Times (10/22, Bernasek, 1.21M) in an "Economic View" article in its business section asks "What has been the cost of the Iraq war for Iraq? As it turns out, it's not easy to find an economist who can provide an answer. … Colin Rowat, has made some preliminary calculations using the best sources available. ... His calculations are a work in progress, but what he has found so far is sobering: the cost amounts to a cut of at least 40 percent in Iraq's national income."

State Department Poll Shows Iraqi Youth Want US To Leave. The AP (10/22, Shrader) reports, "Majorities of Iraqi youth in Arab regions of the country believe security would improve and violence decrease if the U.S.-led forces left immediately, according to a State Department poll that provides a window into the grim warnings provided to policymakers." The poll is "unclassified, but marked 'For Official Government Use Only.'" In it, "strong majorities of 15- to 29-year-olds in two Arab Sunni areas - Mosul and Tikrit-Baquba -- would oppose joining the Iraqi army or police," bespeaking "the difficulty that the U.S.-backed Iraqi government faces as it tries to add ethnic diversity to its security institutions."

Some Afghanis Upset With Government Turn To Taliban. In a 10,052-word article for the New York Times Magazine (10/22), contributing writer Elisabeth Rubin writes part I of her two-part article about the Taliban, in which she explains its resurgence and the reasons that the Pakistani ISI may have had for wanting a Taliban revival: "It is not at all clear that Afghans want the return of a Taliban government. But even sophisticated Kabulis told me that they are fed up with the corruption. And in the Pashtun regions, which make up about half the country, Afghans are fed up with five years of having their homes searched and the young men of their villages rounded up in the name of counterinsurgency." In Helmand province, where the Taliban had once suppressed opium, it now "agreed to protect it"; in addition, the US-backed warlords lost support because of their abuses.

Returnees And Families Brace For Next Tour In Iraq. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Perry, 918K) reports on the stress of families waiting for troops to return from Iraq: "But amid the kisses and tears of relief there was the reality that Joyner and other members of the 3rd Marine Aircraft Wing will probably return to Iraq, maybe next year. For families, another deployment means another prolonged period of constant worry in which every knock on the door carries the potential of the worst possible news." Relatives of several troops who have had three or four tours of duty are quoted.

Seamen Increasingly Become Part Of Ground Force. The Norfolk Virginian Pilot (10/22, Hansen) reports, "The military calls them 'IAs,' shorthand for individual augmentees. They're the 46,000 men and women who have been picked from Navy units to serve, often facing danger, with soldiers and Marines in Afghanistan and Iraq. Once considered a short-term program, the Navy and defense experts acknowledge these sailors are now a permanent part of today's ground force." To reflect the permanence of the change, "The Navy this month created the Expeditionary Combat Readiness Center at Little Creek to track and assist those sailors uprooted from their ships and shore commands." Lexington Institute researcher Dan Goure "said the Navy should expect to fill its support role for a long time. Army and Marine units have been overstretched, deploying three and four times since the Iraq war began."

Debt Keeps Some Troops From Overseas Deployment. The New York Times/AP (10/22) reports, "Thousands of American troops are being barred from overseas duty because they are so deep in debt that they are considered security risks, according to a review of military records by The Associated Press. The number of troops held back has climbed sharply in the past few years. And while it appears to represent a small percentage of all military personnel, the increase is occurring at a time when the armed forces are stretched thin by wars in Iraq and Afghanistan. ... The problem is attributed to several factors, including a lack of financial acumen among young recruits; reckless spending among those exhilarated to make it home from a tour of duty; and the profusion of so-called payday lenders."

Hemet High School Loses Three To Iraq War. In the Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K), columnist Steve Lopez visits Hemet, California, whose high school has had three graduates die in the war. Lopez visits the school, the Army recruiting office, and the family of "Cpl. Kenny F. Stanton Jr., 20, [who] was killed in Baghdad on Oct. 13." He observes, "Driving away, I find that I'm disturbed by the quiet acceptance of sacrifice to what has been a dubious mission from the beginning. I can't help but remind myself that the architects of the war have risked no personal loss, staying the course with someone else's children."

Doonesbury Creator Incorporates Iraq War Into Strip. In an 8,437-word article for the Washington Post Magazine (10/22, 748K), staff writer Gene Weingarten writes about Garry Trudeau's incorporation of the Iraq war into the Doonesbury comic strip. Weingarten reports, "Trudeau has been talking to injured vets for a couple of years now. It's partly compassionate support for people he has a genuine regard for, and it's part journalism -- the damnedest sort of reporting, for a professional cartoonist....you can't help but hear faint, soul-rattling echoes of Vietnam, which he escaped, like many sons of privilege, by gaming the system." When Trudeau decided to have a character injured in Iraq, he "got a call from the Pentagon. The brass was offering to help him figure out where to go next." Trudeau has won acceptance from former critic Sen. John McCain and a "standing ovation" from a Vietnam veterans' convention, at which he said, "I, like so many of our countrymen, must walk this strange line between hating the war but honoring the warrior."

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

Skilling Bears Burden Of Enron Collapse In Monday Sentencing. The AP (10/22, Lozano) reports, "Ken Lay's death wiped away his convictions. Andrew Fastow got a reduced six-year sentence. That leaves former CEO Jeffrey Skilling as the sole top Enron Corp. executive who could be given at least 20 years in prison when he is sentenced Monday for helping orchestrate the biggest corporate scandal in U.S. history." The AP continues, "In addition to the legal consequences of his actions, the burden of lost jobs, worthless pension plans and ruined lives that resulted from Enron's 2001 collapse has now shifted solely onto Skilling's shoulders. … Lay's death and the lighter than expected sentence handed last month to Fastow, Enron's former chief financial officer, will work against Skilling when he faces sentencing, former federal prosecutor Robert Mintz said." The AP adds, "Skilling was convicted in May of 19 counts of fraud, conspiracy, insider trading and lying to auditors. Lay, Enron's founder, was convicted of 10 counts of fraud, conspiracy and lying to banks in two separate cases. His death in July vacated those convictions. … Both men repeatedly lied about Enron's financial health when they knew an illusion of success was propped up by accounting maneuvers that hid debt and inflated profits. … 'In theory, the death of Ken Lay should have no impact on the sentence that Mr. Skilling receives. But it's hard to ignore the reality that Jeff Skilling is now standing alone as the figurehead who orchestrated Enron's demise,' Mintz said. 'There will certainly be pressure to make an example of Jeff Skilling and send a message with his sentence.'"

New UnitedHealth Board Chair Faces Difficult Rebuilding Task. The Minneapolis Star Tribune (10/22, Phelps) reports, "To fix a board gone bad, UnitedHealth Group Inc. turned to the guy who started the company's big push for profits 30 years ago." The Tribune continues, "Richard Burke, the new chairman of UnitedHealth Group, has a long history in Minnesota health care. In the 1980s, Burke ran a small company, then called UnitedHealthcare, that managed one of Minnesota's first HMOs, Physicians Health Plan (PHP). PHP eventually became Medica while UnitedHealth grew under William McGuire into the country's second-biggest health insurer. … Now, after McGuire's ouster a week ago in a stock-option scandal, Burke, 62, is presiding over a company with a badly wounded reputation and a board whose future is in doubt." The Tribune adds, "More than a dozen shareholder lawsuits await the company in federal court. The Internal Revenue Service, Securities and Exchange Commission, Justice Department and the Minnesota attorney general's office are sifting through corporate documents looking for legal violations."

Senate Probes SEC's Handling Of Allegations Against "Major" Bush Fund-Raiser. The New York Times (10/22, Bogdanich, Morgenson, 1.21M) reports, "By the evening of June 20, 2005, the government's investigation of possible insider trading by Pequot Capital Management, a prominent hedge fund, had reached a critical stage. Throughout the day, Robert Hanson, a branch chief in the Washington office of the Securities and Exchange Commission, had been questioning his lead investigator in the case about taking the testimony of John J. Mack, an influential Wall Street executive. The investigator, Gary J. Aguirre, was trying to find out if Mr. Mack had obtained inside information about a merger and passed it to his friend, Pequot's founder, Arthur J. Samberg. … But three days later, the investigation abruptly changed course. Mr. Aguirre later told a Senate committee that after news broke that Mr. Mack was being considered to run Morgan Stanley, his supervisor said he could not interview the executive because of his political power. Mr. Aguirre protested and was eventually fired." The Times adds, "Now, it is the S.E.C. that is under scrutiny. Two Senate committees — Finance and Judiciary — are investigating how diligently the S.E.C. pursued its Pequot inquiry, whether Mr. Aguirre's firing was an attempt to silence him, and whether senior S.E.C. officials gave special treatment to Mr. Mack by not taking his testimony when Mr. Aguirre wanted to. Mr. Mack, a major fund-raiser for President Bush's 2004 campaign, was eventually interviewed last August, after Congress began asking questions."

Ruling On Election Of Directors Puts Pressure On SEC Chairman. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Peterson, 918K) reports, "In his first year as chairman of the Securities and Exchange Commission, Christopher Cox is widely credited with bringing accord to a panel that was bitterly divided over how aggressive it should be in policing corporate wrongdoing in the wake of Enron and other scandals." Cox "has shepherded a handful of reform-oriented measures without controversy, steering clear of proposals on which the odds of finding common ground appeared slim. Now, however, a federal appeals court decision has tossed a grenade-like issue into the SEC's chambers — putting Cox's diplomatic and leadership skills to their toughest test. The court decision is forcing the agency to again confront demands to give shareholders a bigger say in the nomination of corporate directors. … Although the panel's makeup has changed, it is not clear that the group of three Republicans and two Democrats can take more than a cautious step to open up elections before exposing its own ideological differences. Nor is it clear that Cox is prepared to follow his predecessor in bringing up matters that force him to cast contentious, tie-breaking votes."

CRIMINAL LAW:

DOJ Reaches Settlement With Columnist Over NCLB Promotion. The Washington Times (10/22, Debose, 88K) reports, "The Justice Department has reached a settlement with conservative commentator Armstrong Williams, closing a yearlong investigation into his promotion of Bush administration education reforms. The final eight-page agreement among Mr. Williams, the Education Department and its subcontractor, Ketchum Communications, was reached Thursday. The carefully worded settlement papers…state that Mr. Williams is not guilty of any criminal violations, but must repay a portion of his fee to the federal government. According to the documents, Mr. Williams will have to pay $34,000 to settle the case."

Districts Use NCLB Funds To Purchase Products From Neil Bush's Company. The Los Angeles Times

DOJ And FBI Reportedly Investigating AIPAC Lobbying On Behalf Of Harman. Time (10/20, Burger, 4.03M) reported on "an ongoing investigation" by the FBI and DOJ into whether Rep. Jane Harman and the American Israel Public Affairs Committee "may have violated the law in a scheme to get Harman reappointed as the top Democrat on the House intelligence committee. … The sources tell TIME that the investigation…which has simmered out of sight since about the middle of last year, is examining whether Harman and AIPAC arranged for wealthy supporters to lobby House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi on Harman's behalf." In response, Harman has "said that any investigation of — or allegation of improper conduct by — her would be 'irresponsible, laughable and scurrilous.' On Friday, Washington GOP super lawyer Ted Olson left voicemail messages underscoring that Harman has no knowledge of any investigation." According to Time, "The case is a spin-off of a probe that has already led to charges under the Espionage Act against two AIPAC lobbyists, whose case is still pending, and to a 12-and-a-half-year prison sentence for former Defense Intelligence Agency official Lawrence A. Franklin."

Katrina Evacuees Blamed For Spike In Houston Homicides. The AP (10/22) reports that, "Evacuees from Hurricane Katrina have contributed to an increase in Houston's annual murder rate, which could climb this year to its highest level in more than a decade" according to police. The AP notes, "Houston had 316 homicides as of Oct. 16. … an increase of 25 percent from the 252 slayings tallied at this time last year, putting the city on pace to record nearly 400 killings before the end of 2006." According to Capt. Dwayne Ready, "We … recognize that Katrina evacuees continue to have an impact on the murder rate."

School Violence Summit Considered Safety Options. The New York Journal News (10/22, Rae) reports, "President Bush's school security conference this month considered a long list of safety strategies, including emergency planning, metal detectors, student counseling and even God. … 'We call this in education a "teachable moment,"' U.S. Education Secretary Margaret Spellings said during the Oct. 10 conference in Maryland, which was organized after the shooting deaths of five Amish girls in Pennsylvania on Oct. 2 and two other deadly attacks in Colorado and Wisconsin." The News continues, "The emphasis was on the need for communication and planning. Panelists stressed that most school attacks carried out by students followed some form of warning. They reviewed danger signs, such as a student's sudden changes in behavior, depression and suicidal thoughts. … Security precautions like metal detectors were another strategy under discussion, but Attorney General Alberto Gonzales pointed out that one in five school shootings occurred outside a school building. … The conference was criticized for not exploring another angle: the prevalence of guns, a common denominator in the recent attacks."

University Researcher Pleads Guilty To Scientific Misconduct. The New York Times magazine (10/22, Interlandi) reports, "On a rainy afternoon in June, Eric Poehlman stood before a federal judge in the United States District Court in downtown Burlington, Vt. His sentencing hearing had dragged on for more than four hours, and Poehlman…remained silent while the lawyers argued over the appropriate sentence for his transgressions. Now was his chance to speak. A year earlier, in the same courthouse, Poehlman pleaded guilty to lying on a federal grant application and admitted to fabricating more than a decade's worth of scientific data on obesity, menopause and aging, much of it while conducting clinical research as a tenured faculty member at the University of Vermont. He presented fraudulent data in lectures and in published papers, and he used this data to obtain millions of dollars in federal grants from the National Institutes of Health — a crime subject to as many as five years in federal prison. Poehlman's admission of guilt came after more than five years during which he denied the charges against him, lied under oath and tried to discredit his accusers. By the time Poehlman came clean, his case had grown into one of the most expansive cases of scientific fraud in U.S. history." The Times continues, "Before his fall from grace, Poehlman oversaw a lab where nearly a dozen students and postdoctoral researchers carried out his projects. His research earned him recognition among his peers and invitations to speak at conferences around the world. And he made nearly $140,000, one of the top salaries at the University of Vermont. All of that began to change six years ago, when (a colleague) took his concerns about anomalies in Poehlman's data to university officials. The subsequent investigation — a collaboration among the University of Vermont, the Office of Research Integrity (which is within the Department of Health and Human Services) and the United States Department of Justice — uncovered fraudulent research that stretched back through almost half of Poehlman's career. The revelations led to the retraction or correction of 10 scientific papers, and Poehlman was banned forever from receiving public research money. He was only the second scientist in the United States to face criminal prosecution for falsifying research data. … At 50, with his career in ruins and his reputation destroyed, Poehlman could only hope to avoid one final humiliation: becoming the first researcher sentenced to prison for scientific misconduct. … Citing the nearly $200,000 Poehlman had paid in restitution, his attorneys had asked the judge to sentence him to supervised probation."

CIVIL RIGHTS:

Birmingham, AL, Involved In School Integration Dispute. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Jarvie) reports, "In Birmingham, Ala., a group of residents and activists opposes a bid to end a court's school desegregation order." The Times continues, "For 35 years under court order, the yellow buses have picked up black children from the city's Oxmoor Valley and carried them up the hill and across city limits to affluent, mostly white suburban public schools. … Rita Jones Turner was one of the first children to be bused to Vestavia Hills after a 1970 federal court order required the district to enroll African Americans from her neighborhood. … Today, her youngest son, a ninth-grader at Vestavia Hills High School, makes the same journey up the hill into a friendlier environment. … But last month, he came home with a letter informing her that the Vestavia Hills school board had filed a motion to end the desegregation order. The district is among a growing number across the nation seeking to have the decades-old orders overturned; this year, dozens have succeeded." The Times adds, "Those fighting to keep the order in place are particularly disappointed that the issue would be revisited in Birmingham, where so much of the civil rights movement's history was made. In the last 15 years, city leaders have built museums and monuments to commemorate the four schoolgirls who died in the 1963 bombing of a black church, and the demonstrators who were met with attack dogs in a march led by the Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. the same year. … But the district says its request is a matter of economics, not race — that absorbing the children of Oxmoor Valley is an unfair burden on its budget."

ACLU Web Site Defends Attacks On Organizational Leadership. The New York Times (10/22, Strom, 1.21M) reports, "Supporters of the leadership of the American Civil Liberties Union have created a Web site in response to one started last month by critics of that leadership." The critics' "site was started last month by more than 30 longtime supporters of the A.C.L.U. who say that actions taken by the executive director, Anthony D. Romero, and supported by the board have violated the organization's principles." Actions such as "the organization's use of data mining to collect information on donors, a proposal to monitor employees' e-mail messages and efforts to control board members' access to staff members and information."

ANTITRUST:

Smithfield's Premium Standard Buy Faces Antitrust Scrutiny. The Sioux Falls (SD) Argus Leader (10/22, Dobbs) reports, "The U.S. Justice Department has begun an antitrust investigation of Smithfield Foods' plan to buy rival Premium Standard Farms of Missouri, a deal that would combine the nation's two largest hog producers. … Additionally, at the behest of Midwest lawmakers and farmers who worry the deal would hasten the consolidation of livestock markets and allow the merged company to inflate pork prices for consumers, a Senate antitrust committee is planning hearings on the matter. At such hearings, lawmakers often hear testimony from company executives and their critics. .. 'This merger takes place in an industry already witnessing the decline of independent family farmers and rapid consolidation in meat production and packing. If this merger goes through, farmers will have even fewer choices for selling their hogs, and consumers will certainly be affected by the deal,' said Sen. Mike DeWine, R-Ohio." The Argus Leader continues, "DeWine chairs the Senate subcommittee that oversees antitrust concerns. He said in a recent statement that he plans to hold hearings on the Smithfield deal in the near future, and lawmakers 'will need to scrutinize this deal very carefully.' … A Justice Department spokeswoman would not confirm the deadline to complete the investigation. Nor has a date been set for the Senate committee hearings, according to Andrew Langworthy, a spokesman for DeWine. … But both could happen before the end of the year because Virginia-based Smithfield, which owns the John Morrell & Co. meatpacking plant in Sioux Falls, plans to finalize the acquisition in the first quarter of 2007. The company announced in September it would buy its rival for about $650 million in cash and stock." The Argus Leader notes, "Dennis Treacy, Smithfield vice president of government affairs, said shortly after the deal was announced that the merged companies will continue to work closely with independent producers and that he expects the Justice Department will approve the deal. … A national coalition of agriculture and consumer groups - including Dakota Rural Action and Dakota Resource Council - earlier this month lined up behind Sens. Tim Johnson and John Thune, both of South Dakota, and lawmakers from Iowa and Nebraska who called for the antitrust investigation."

Critics Say Federal Prosecutors Lax In Pursuing Texas Polluters. The Houston Chronicle (10/22, Rice) reports, "After illegally using a pesticide to kill feral hogs — and in the process killing raccoons, mourning doves and crows — two Fayette County farmers were fined $500 in 2004. … That was the most recent conviction Houston's federal prosecutors have obtained on their own for an environmental crime. The lack of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office is remarkable for a city that has vied with Los Angeles for the title of the nation's smog capital, say environmentalists and some current and former officials. … 'We've got more (pollution) than anyone else in the country and, therefore, we should have a lot of prosecutions,' said Neil Carman, clean-air program director for the Sierra Club." The Chronicle continues, "Carman, who worked for 12 years for the Texas Commission on Environmental Quality, noted that the Houston Ship Channel has the largest concentration of petrochemical plants in the nation and that Harris and Brazoria counties rank among the nation's most polluted. … Data from the Transactional Records Access Clearing House show, however, that the number of new environmental prosecutions by the U.S. Attorney's Office for the Southern District of Texas dwindled from 20 in fiscal 1998 to zero in 2005, the last year for which figures are available." The Chronicle adds, "U.S. Attorney Don DeGabrielle, who took office in March, said the figures collected by TRAC, a research group associated with Syracuse University, don't show that his office is involved in 17 cases under investigation or before a grand jury. The only two new prosecutions in fiscal 2006, which ended Sept. 30, were led by a special unit based in Washington, D.C., he said. … The sharp decline worries Sabrina Strawn, executive director of the Galveston-Houston Association for Smog Prevention, which has asked the federal government to take a stronger role."

Energy Industry Considers Caps On Carbon Emissions. The AP (10/22, Foss) reports that many "executives are convinced the United States is likely to join Europe in placing limits on carbon dioxide emissions" which is blamed for causing global warming "perhaps as early as next decade. This rising expectation of mandatory carbon caps is reviving interest in nuclear power, accelerating the use cleaner coal-burning technologies and spurring investment in alternative fuels such as wind and biomass." Some of the US' "biggest power producers are even setting voluntary greenhouse-gas reduction goals now in hopes of gaining a competitive edge down the road." Fearing "an unfair competitive advantage," many U.S. energy executives "vow to fight carbon limits unless the constraints are carried out worldwide." State legislative activity as well as federal tax breaks from last year's energy bill have motivated some utility companies to reduce emissions and has also brought about a renewed interest in nuclear power.

ATF Cracking Down On Illegal Georgia Gun Sales. The Athens (GA) Banner-Herald (10/22, Johnson) reports, "The owner of a Madison County gun shop told a convicted felon that silencers were 'illegal as hell,' but that he had a contact in Florida who could make one." The Banner-Herald continues, "Within nine months, the felon bought two silencers from 46-year-old Michael Curtis Oakley of Athens, in addition to a revolver, three semi-automatic pistols, an assault rifle and boxes of ammunition - all without a background check or filling out the required paperwork. … That's the allegation in a complaint filed this week in U.S. District Court in Athens. An agent with the U.S. Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, Firearms and Explosives said that a felon wore a hidden camera and microphone to capture each illegal transaction, as he helped make a case against the owner of Oakley Outdoor Sports in downtown Colbert." The Banner-Herald adds, "The complaint convinced a U.S. magistrate on Monday to authorize police and ATF agents to arrest Oakley for violating federal firearms regulations. The magistrate also signed warrants that led authorities to seize dozens of weapons from Oakley's gun shop and search his house at 356 Oak Meadows Drive, where officials confiscated documents and other evidence. … The agent's complaint purports to show how guns are winding up on the streets and in the wrong hands, even when the source is a federally licensed firearms dealer. … In a similar ATF sting last month, authorities arrested another Athens man and four others for allegedly trafficking in guns at the J&J Flea Market in Jackson County. According to indictments filed in U.S. District Court in Gainesville, the men weren't licensed firearms dealers, but they sold guns to convicted felons, illegal immigrants and an undercover ATF agent posing as an out-of state resident."

Hurdles For Advancing Tax Reform Examined. Senior Washington Post reporter Jeffrey Birnbaum, in an article in the Washington Post (10/22, B2, 748K) "Outlook" section, examines how the tax code has become more complex since Congress passed the Tax Reform Act of 1986. Since then "Congress has passed nearly 15,000 changes to the tax law. Many of the loopholes that disappeared two decades ago are back. Now, as then, politicians (including President Bush) are branding the income tax unfair and calling for reform. And now, as then, few expect it to happen." Birnbaum offers five lessons for tax reformers. The first is to choose between making the tax code more fair or more simple as "one goal precludes the other." Birnbaum advises that "Divided government is a boon to reform, not an obstacle" as neither party will want the blame for not passing reform. And he warns tax-reform efforts "will be doomed if lobbying groups are united against it." While the 1986 tax bill was "revenue neutral," today it will "have to increase tax revenue, whether through rejiggering the code or by introducing new taxes -- making reform efforts that much more difficult and unlikely."

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Former President Bush Denies Comments Critical Of Rice In Woodward Book. Former President George H. W. Bush, on CNN's Larry King Live (10/21, 9:10 p.m.), was asked about quotes attributed to him that were critical of Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. Former President Bush said, "If that's a quote, it is a lie. Can't make it any more clearer than that. I couldn't -- I like Condoleezza Rice. She worked for me. I have great respect for Condoleezza Rice. I can't believe Woodward -- I haven't read the book, that he actually said I said that." Larry King responded, "I think someone says you said it. I don't have it in front of me now. But it is quoted saying you didn't think she was equal to the task." Bush replied, "Well, that's crazy. I talked to her yesterday. I guess there were some hurt feelings or day before she went to this trip." He added, "She called me and said there is something in this book," and continued, "She said there is some remarks in there attributed to you, I don't believe it. I said 'well don't. I don't know what they are.'"

Amvets Conference Explores Ideas For Update Of Veterans Benefits System. Under the headline "Newest Vets Fed Up With VA Care," the Chicago Sun-Times (10/22, Toomey) reports, "The first National Symposium for the Needs of Young Veterans drew hundreds of vets to the Hyatt Regency O'Hare during its four-day run, which ended Saturday. They listened to speakers like retired Gen. Tommy Franks and Democratic congressional nominee Tammy Duckworth, and broke into small groups to come up with answers." Thomas C. McGriff, national commander of Amvets: "The goal is to develop an update of the veterans' benefits system. … The system really hasn't been looked at since World War II -- and we now have a new set of young veterans coming from Iraq and Afghanistan." The Sun-Times notes, "The VA had nearly a dozen senior benefits officials at the conference but will wait to see what recommendations Amvets develops before commenting, VA spokesman Ryan Steinback said."

OTHER NEWS:

Stalled Stock Market, Recent Reports Spur Concern Over US Economy. Bloomberg (10/22, Tsang) reports, "A three-week rally in U.S. stocks, which lifted the Dow Jones Industrial Average past 12,000 for the first time, slowed this week as earnings from Caterpillar Inc. and JPMorgan Chase & Co. underscored concern that profit growth has peaked." And recent economic reports "also cast more doubt on the economy's strength. Industrial production in September fell the most in a year, while manufacturing in the Philadelphia area unexpectedly contracted this month. The Conference Board's index of leading indicators…rose less than expected in September."

Newsweek Poll Shows Voters Favor Democrats Over GOP 55% To 32%. Newsweek (10/22, Mabry, 3.12M), in a web exclusive, reports that because of an erosion of support from evangelicals "the Republican base may be cracking." While Democrats have led in other opinion polls, Newsweek's new poll of 1,000 adults conducted October 19-20 (+/-4%) suggests "that a possible Republican loss could turn into a rout." Respondents had "more faith in the Democrats to handle almost every major issue presented in the poll." Yet the poll shows Republicans "seem to be closing the issues gap" after losing support because of the Rep. Foley scandal. And "if Republicans can turn voters' attention to national security, they could hold off, or at least hold down, a Democratic blitz come Nov. 7." But, "Republicans have a lot of work to do" as "a solid majority of Americans want the Democrats to take over Capital Hill, 55 percent, versus 32 percent who want the GOP to retain control -- a 23-point margin." And they "can't count on their biggest name, George W. Bush, to help much. While the new poll shows the president with a two-point bump in his approval rating -- from an all-time low of 33 percent two weeks ago to 35 percent today -- most Americans think Bush is already a lame duck. Fifty-six percent said he won't be able to get much done in his last two years in office. Only 33 percent believe he can be effective."

Bloomberg (10/22, Roland) notes the Newsweek poll shows Democrats lead 55% to 37% among likely voters and former House Majority Leader Richard Armey "said yesterday that Democrats may gain a majority of 10 seats in the House."

Brownstein Contends Bush's Record Is GOP's Top Liability. The Los Angeles Times' Ronald Brownstein (10/22) writes, "That discontent over Bush's performance and decisions, especially concerning Iraq, is the largest factor threatening the GOP hold on the House and Senate. One measure of Bush's impact on the election comes from the Majority Watch project conducted by the polling firms RT Strategies and Constituent Dynamics. Since the summer, the project has conducted nearly 75,000 automated phone surveys in congressional districts around the country. And it has found a close correlation between attitudes about Bush and preferences in November."

Variety Of Issues Across US Hurting GOP Candidates. The Boston Globe (10/22, Milligan, Klein, Bender, 425K) in a 2,423 word article reports, "To the distress of a Republican Party that has held control of the House for the past dozen years, many voters across the country seem to be nodding in angry agreement with" the Democratic slogan "Had enough," according "to interviews with voters in four states and new polls showing a double-digit preference for Democratic control of the House." And "no single issue is motivating voters' disaffection with the GOP -- and some issues, such as the Iraq war, are hurting the Republicans differently in various parts of the country."

Brooks Accuses Conservatives Of Abetting Moderate Republicans' Losses. The New York Times' David Brooks (10/22) writes, "When the next Congress convenes, there will be many fewer RINO's in town. You look at the vulnerable Republicans and it's like a moderate Republican graveyard: Deborah Pryce, a bright and effective member from Ohio; Christopher Shays from Connecticut; Sweeney from New York; Gerlach from Pennsylvania; Reichert from Washington; DeWine from Ohio. … For the past several years, Republican elites have treated the moderates, upon whom their majority depended, as the deformed cousins of their movement. Congressmen from rock-ribbed Republican districts who've never had to confront a dissenting view applaud themselves for their manly courage while scorning the effete wispiness of Northeastern Republicans who go home and battle derision every weekend."

Potential Democratic Control Of Congress Not Seen As Effecting Bush Style. Noah Feldman, adjunct senior fellow at the Council on Foreign Relations, in an article in the New York Times Magazine (10/22) writes that "it is doubtful that the midterm elections will significantly alter the Bush administration's way of governing. For one thing," Vice President Cheney "has no intention of running for president himself. With the presidential election two years off, the Bush administration (read: Karl Rove) is very far from anointing a successor, if indeed it ever will." And "the day he leaves office…Bush will no longer be the leader of that party. His own incentives are not necessarily aligned with those of the G.O.P. faithful." Even if Democrats win control of Congress they will be left with congressional oversight, "an idea that right now gets their hearts racing but whose limits will eventually become apparent. … What Congressional Democrats cannot do, however, is change the basic direction of the country. The president has not presided as a flexible man, and many of the problems Congress will confront are at present intractable. Government in the sunshine is a good thing -- but a brightly lit Washington will still, mostly, be George W. Bush's Washington."

Sports Figures Offer Advice To GOP. The Washington Post (10/22, B3, 748K), in a special Outlook feature, asked several sports figures to offer advice to GOP candidates "on what to do when it's fourth and long in the bottom of the ninth -- with the other team set to retake your House. In one example former Redskins quarterback Mark Rypien says, "as far as the election goes, it's not even halftime. You've got to believe that people will come to their senses and rally around the team. Remember, the other team has never been in many winning situations. They don't know how to win. … They don't know what they're doing when the game is in the fourth quarter. You do."

Democrats Said To Have Shifted Focus To Just Three Senate Races. The Washington Post (10/22, A1, Babington, Balz, 748K) reports, "Democrats in the past two weeks have significantly improved their chances of taking control of the Senate, according to polls and independent analysts, with the battle now focused intensely on…Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia." According to the Post, "Strategists see Missouri as perhaps the purest test of whether Republicans can overcome a strong Democratic headwind this year because there are few state-related factors or scandals affecting the contest. Neither Sen. James M. Talent (R) nor the challenger, state auditor Claire McCaskill (D), has been able to gain a clear advantage, and strategists on both sides anticipate a photo finish."

The AP (10/22, Espo) reports the NRSC "has aired television commercials in New Jersey, hoping that Tom Kean Jr. can defeat Sen. Bob Menendez. Democrats countered quickly, with four times as much money. Republicans apparently have not abandoned all hope in Michigan, either. President Bush is scheduled to campaign for challenger Mike Bouchard on Thursday. A party-financed television advertising campaign is possible, as well, aimed at toppling Democratic Sen. Debbie Stabenow. Increasingly, though, officials in both parties said the battle for Senate control probably will come down to close races in Missouri, Tennessee and Virginia."

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Brownstein, 918K) reports, "Two weeks before election day, odds are increasing that the Senate could turn on the results of close contests in Tennessee, Virginia and Missouri, three states along the border between the solidly Republican Deep South and Democratic terrain in the Northeast and industrial Midwest. Each of these states presents a distinct political puzzle. But Democrats face the common challenge of attracting right-of-center voters like Foust who helped Bush carry all three states two years ago but have soured on the nation's direction since. … Still, finding enough disenchanted voters remains difficult for Democrats in the three states, largely because of enduring Republican strength in socially conservative small-town and rural communities. If Democrats fall short in their bid to recapture the Senate, these three states may be their Heartbreak Hill."

House Democrats Portrayed As Cautiously Optimistic. The New York Times (10/22, Nagourney, Toner, 1.21M) reports, "There is something unusual bubbling in Democratic political waters these days: optimism. With each new delivery of bad news for Republicans…a party that has become so used to losing is considering, disbelievingly and with the requisite worry, the possibility that it could actually win in November. … For Democrats these days, life is one measure glee, one measure dread and one measure hubris. If they are as confident as they have been in a decade about regaining at least one house of Congress — and they are — it is a confidence tempered by the searing memories of being outmaneuvered, for three elections straight, by superior Republican organizing and financial strength, and by continued wariness about the political skills of President Bush's senior adviser, Karl Rove." The Times adds, "Democratic candidates in districts that had been considered long shots are now pleading with" Rep. Rahm Emanuel, chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, "to send money their way. And some leading Democrats…are urging Mr. Emanuel to seize the moment by expanding the field in which Democrats are competing, saying the party has a chance to cement a big lead in the House in November."

Emanuel Given Credit For Making DCCC More Professional. The Washington Post (10/22, D1, Hendrix, 748K) reports, "As the member of Congress responsible for recruiting candidates for House races, raising money and vetting strategy for dozens of districts," Emanuel has "received raves from campaign connoisseurs in Washington for running a taut committee. Notably, he's nearly closed the perennial cash-on-hand gap between his team -- with $36 million in the bank at the end of September -- and its GOP counterpart. He's fielded credible candidates in districts no one had expected to be in play a year ago. And he's generally been flogging the party like a never-satisfied CEO. … If Democrats do take the House -- they need to gain 15 seats to do so -- Emanuel, in only his second term in Congress, stands to claim considerable credit for ending a 12-year electoral drought."

NRCC Said To Believe Foley Scandal Has Faded From Voters' Minds. The Washington Times (10/22, Fagan, 88K) reports, "Republican House candidates still feel some heat from the revelation that Rep. Mark Foley sent inappropriate and sometimes lurid Internet messages to teenage boys, but party leaders insist they are starting to get their message out again to voters. 'The Foley matter has become absolutely quiet in the vast majority of House races, as voters have been able to separate the actions of one member from his party,' said Jonathan Collegio of the National Republican Congressional Committee (NRCC). 'In most races, voters say it will have no impact on their decision.'" The AP (10/22, Espo) reports, "After two weeks of adverse publicity linked to the Mark Foley scandal, public and private polling suggested partial recovery for some endangered Republican incumbents, and senior party officials made a concerted effort to project confidence. 'By many measures, there are strong indications of a right-of-center base that is engaged and committed,' party chairman Ken Mehlman said Friday in a memo written for public consumption."

Foley's Contact With Former Pages Detailed. The Washington Post (10/22, A1, Goldstein, Williamson, 748K) reports on former Rep. Mark Foley's relationships with congressional pages. According to the Post, although "No one interviewed for this article could cite any instance in which Foley had sex with a former page. … Interviews with nearly three dozen former pages suggest that" Foley "befriended a wide circle of teenagers during their stints as House pages. Then, shortly before they left or soon afterward, he singled out certain boys to write to -- including four newly confirmed by The Washington Post, in addition to former page Jordan Edmund and one other whose illicit online conversations with Foley ended the congressman's career. Some of the correspondence was brief and casual. But over months or years, if a boy seemed willing to go along, some conversations grew more sexual."

Military Veteran Candidates Said To Give Democrats Credibility On Iraq. The New York Times (10/22, Davey, 1.21M) reports, "As she campaigns for Congress in the suburbs of Chicago, Tammy Duckworth, a Democrat and an Iraq veteran, speaks with chilling conviction about the war. Iraq was a big mistake, Ms. Duckworth says as she walks among voters on two artificial legs. Millions of dollars have been wasted there. … Though Ms. Duckworth is a political novice, her service and sacrifice (she lost her legs when a grenade hit her helicopter) have allowed her to speak her mind in a district once seen as downright hostile toward Democrats, having sent a Republican to Congress for 32 years. Around the nation, a handful of military veterans like Ms. Duckworth have emerged as competitive Democratic candidates for Congress. For a party that has struggled against a perception that Republicans are stronger on matters of terrorism and national security, the veterans have been a powerful antidote: a group that inherently carries credibility with voters on issues like Iraq." According to the Times, "Some 60 former service members are challengers for the House or the Senate as Democrats, including a half-dozen who served in Iraq. The Democrats are not shy about military résumés. Among their promotions is a 'Fighting Dems' Web site bearing the subtitle, 'Back from the front lines, headed to Congress.'"

Duckworth Described As "Struggling" In Bid To Succeed Hyde. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Huffstutter, 918K) reports Duckworth, "has spent $2.5 million on her fierce campaign in a GOP stronghold. … In the highly competitive and closely watched race…it's a Democrat who is doing the struggling. As of the end of September…Duckworth had spent all but $206,000 of the nearly $2.8 million she raised for her campaign in the Republican stronghold of DuPage County. One of the reasons? Trying to one-up her opponent, state Sen. Peter Roskam, in a race that heated up early." Roskam, "backed heavily by the National Republican Campaign Committee, rolled out ads questioning Duckworth's positions on the Iraq war and the military, and slamming her stances on taxes and immigration."

Many GOP House Districts Are Home To Growing Immigrant Communities. The AP (10/22, Ohlemacher) reports, "Of the 50 House districts nationwide with the fastest-growing immigrant communities, 45 are represented by Republicans. All but three of those lawmakers voted for a bill that would make illegal immigrants felons. Overall, GOP districts added about 3 million immigrants from 2000 to 2005, nearly twice the number that settled in districts represented by Democrats, according to an Associated Press analysis of census data. The numbers help explain why illegal immigration is such a big issue in rural Georgia, eastern Pennsylvania and in suburbs throughout the United States." The AP goes on to focus on several Georgia districts, noting, "North Georgia has attracted thousands of Latino immigrants — legal and illegal — to work in carpet mills in Dalton, in poultry plants in Gainesville and on farms that dot the landscape in between. The region exemplifies the struggle — and promise — of Latinos yearning for political power. Hispanics make up about 12.5 percent of the district represented by GOP Rep. Nathan Deal, but less than 2 percent of registered voters."

Webb Said To Have Yet To Master Retail Politics. The Washington Times (10/22, McLaughlin, 88K) reports, "Since the first day of his U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia, Democrat James H. Webb Jr. has described himself as a nonpolitician. And the self-description rings true in his performance on the hustings. The decorated Vietnam War veteran's stiff and stern style of retail politics has been on display since his announcement in February that he would try to unseat Sen. George Allen, one of the state's most polished politicians. … On the campaign trail, the former Navy secretary is a far cry from former Gov. Mark Warner, a Democrat who is arguably the state's most personable public figure." Webb "gives firm handshakes, but at times needs a reminder to smile in photographs. He has a catchy belly laugh, but it rarely is heard in public. He thrives on foreign-policy issues, but sometimes loses people accustomed to candidates rattling off sound bites."

Outside Groups' Ads Highlight Steele And Cardin's Positions On Abortion. The Washington Post (10/22, C5, Marimow, 748K) reports, "Religious leaders and abortion foes are pumping more than $140,000 into the final two weeks of the Maryland U.S. Senate contest to motivate 'values voters' by elevating such issues as abortion and same-sex marriage in a campaign that has largely been fought over the Iraq war, the future of Social Security and the candidates' disparate styles. The issue of abortion, though, offers one of the starkest contrasts in the race: Republican Michael S. Steele, a former Catholic seminarian, strongly opposes the practice. Democrat Benjamin L. Cardin, a Baltimore congressman, was the keynote speaker at NARAL Pro-Choice Maryland's annual gala last night in Rockville. Although the two major candidates rarely bring up the subject unprompted on the campaign trail, independent groups plan to highlight the issue in radio and television ads, direct mail and fundraising appeals."

Steele Said To Missed Opportunities To Establish His Independence. The Washington Post's Marc Fisher (10/22, C1) writes that Steele's "TV ads have been the talk of the town, not only for their striking style and the lieutenant governor's good humor, but because Steele is bold enough to take some shots at his party's orthodoxy. … Steele has managed to portray himself as someone who understands the average Marylander's frustration with both parties and with all the tired tropes of American politics." However, Fisher concludes, "Steele had a choice in this campaign: Add substance to the aura of independence generated by his TV ads, or hide behind that aura, spending his energy instead on pumping up the imagery. Sadly, he stuck with the sizzle, leaving voters still hungry for meat."

Lamont Gives His Campaign An Additional $2 Million. The AP (10/22, Miga) reports Ned Lamont, "trailing Sen. Joe Lieberman by a double-digit margin, dropped another $2 million into his Senate bid in Connecticut on Saturday." Lamont "has tapped his personal fortune for $12.7 million to fund his campaign. Lamont has about two weeks to catch Lieberman, a three-term incumbent who has pulled to a 17-point lead, according to a recent poll. … The third and final televised debate of the race was scheduled for Monday. Unlike their second debate, which featured all five candidates, only Lieberman, Lamont and Republican Alan Schlesinger will share the stage. That could make it easier for Lamont to engage Lieberman directly."

GOP Candidate Distances Himself From Potentially Libelous NRCC Spot. The AP (10/22) reports, "Both major-party candidates for a congressional seat are decrying an ad sponsored by a national Republican committee that accuses the Democrat of billing taxpayers for a call to a phone-sex line. … Arcuri's campaign said an associate mistakenly dialed an 800-number sex line two years ago from Arcuri's New York City hotel room, and released records supporting the claim. The number shares the same last seven digits with the number for the state Department of Criminal Justice Services, which was dialed the minute after the first call was made. Arcuri, the district attorney in Oneida County, said the ad was 'clearly libelous' and threatened to file a lawsuit. His GOP opponent, state Sen. Ray Meier, described it as 'way over the line.' … The ad's sponsor, the National Republican Congressional Committee, stood by the 30-second message. Spokesman Ed Patru insisted it was 'totally true' and said Meier was not consulted."

Shays Vulnerability Attributed To National GOP's Unpopularity. The New York Times' Peter Applebome (10/22) reports, "In the 11th, count 'em, 11th, debate between Representative Christopher R. Shays, the incumbent Republican, and his Democratic challenger, Diane Farrell, Ms. Farrell began, as she usually does, with a brilliantly concise formulation of why people should oust Mr. Shays after 19 years in Congress. … Shays has an artfully articulated maverick image and is one of the more respected members of the House. Candidates like him lose about as often as Roger Federer loses first-round matches. But in a race starkly defined by the war, both camps say the election, a repeat of the one two years ago that Mr. Shays won with 52 percent of the vote, is close to dead even."

Jefferson Faring Well Despite Looming Federal Indictment. The Washington Post (10/22, A5, Lengel, 748K) reports that as Rep. William Jefferson "campaigns for a ninth term," he "has shed little light on the federal investigation of bribery allegations, other than to insist on his innocence. In a TV ad, he talks about 'the presumption of innocence afforded every person' and says, 'For over 18 months, the federal government has investigated me and has yet to bring a single charge against me.' That message appears to be resonating among voters…and so, despite the constant threat of a federal indictment that sources familiar with the probe say is a foregone conclusion, the 59-year-old congressman is confidently campaigning. Jefferson is showing up at public events, ready to work the crowd and touting a record of passing key legislation and getting funds to help post-Katrina New Orleans. Recently he went on the offensive, publicly accusing two of his 12 opponents of being 'ethically challenged.'"

Wilson Dragged Down By Voters' Opposition To Iraq War. The New York Times (10/22, Alvarez, 1.21M) reports, "In interviews with nearly two dozen people in Bernalillo [NM], a small, mostly Hispanic town on Route 66, and its neighbor, Placitas, which is more affluent and increasingly more Republican, voters expressed their concerns about the state of the nation. Asked what issues will sway their votes in the House race here, almost everyone interviewed said, 'The war and ...' (fill in the blank). For some Republicans here, this one-two punch — the war and the federal deficit, the war and corruption, the war and the House page scandal — is enough to catapult some to the other side. Or at least to get them thinking of voting for the other party, something few of them imagined two years ago, they said. … Representative Heather A. Wilson, who was first elected in this district in 1998, has won each election with a boost from Democrats. Now, though, she is in a dead heat with Patricia Madrid, the Democratic attorney general, according to recent polls."

Iraq War Is Main Topic Of Gerlach-Murphy Debate. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22, Walters) reports Rep. Jim Gerlach "accused Democratic challenger Lois Murphy in a debate Saturday of being inconsistent in her support for U.S. troops in Iraq, while Murphy countered that the war has made the nation less safe. The two-term congressman and Murphy are in battling to gain an edge in a race for a seat from the Philadelphia suburbs that could help determine whether Democrats gain control of Congress." Gerlach "charged in the AARP-sponsored debate that

Murphy was not prepared to give U.S. troops the funding they need to help a new government succeed in Iraq."

Edwards Expected To Survive Challenge In Bush's Home District. The San Antonio Express News (10/22, Garcia) reports that GOP House candidate Van Taylor, "a Harvard University graduate who enlisted in the Marines and saw combat in Iraq, seems like the perfect Republican candidate for Congress." However, the GOP increasingly thinks him unable to "end the embarrassment of having a Democrat representing President Bush -- his Crawford ranch is in the district -- by knocking off entrenched incumbent Chet Edwards, the hometown congressman since 1991." The Express News writes, "A growing number of signs nationally suggest a Democratic wave may be in the offing Nov. 7," which may be strong enough to protect Edwards.

Candidates Offer Predictable Responses To Iraq WMD Questions. The New York Times' Mark Leibovich (10/22), in a "Week in Review" piece, writes that "it has become a settled expectation of political life that any candidate who supported the Iraq war resolution in 2002 must now answer the dreaded, 'If you knew then what you know now' question. That is, of course, some variant on the 'If you knew then that Saddam Hussein did not have weapons of mass destruction, would you still have authorized President Bush to use force in Iraq?' … The variety of responses…can be distilled into a few predictable categories. Herein, a primer." According to Leibovich the "'No, but' Response…is by far the most common refrain among Democrats who supported the use-of-force resolution but who now wish they hadn't. The optimal answer should include a quick 'no,' followed by a swift indictment of the Bush administration's incompetence, dishonesty, stubbornness or some such unpleasant thing. And it never hurts to tack on an homage to the troops." Leibovich notes, "Early supporters of the war -- particularly Republicans -- often dispatch with the question in favor of a general lament about typical Washington nay-saying, second-guessing and defeatism (as practiced by 'Defeatocrats')."

NYTimes Endorses Five Democratic Congressional Candidates. The New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), in its New York Region Opinion section, "endorsed a string of congressional candidates, all of them Democrats challenging Republican incumbents. In New York's 19th Congressional District, the board endorsed the Democratic candidate John Hall over the incumbent, Republican Sue W. Kelly. It also endorsed Linda Stender over Representative Mike Ferguson in New Jersey's Seventh Congressional District, Chris Murphy over Representative Nancy L. Johnson in Connecticut's Fifth Congressional District, and Joseph Courtney over Representative Rob Simmons in the state's Second Congressional District.", It also "endorsed David Mejias, a Democratic member of the Nassau County Legislature, against Republican incumbent Peter T. King, who this summer said the decision of The New York Times to publish articles about a secret terrorist-surveillance program was treasonous.'"

Schwarzenegger Blasts GOP Candidate Over "Hate Crime" Mailing. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Martelle, Rosenblatt, 918K) reports Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger "stepped up the pressure Saturday on an Orange County Republican congressional candidate, telling reporters that Tan Nguyen should withdraw if he knew about his campaign's mailing of letters intended to threaten immigrant voters. Schwarzenegger denounced the mailings traced to Nguyen's campaign to unseat Democratic incumbent Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District and said that 'anyone that knew…has to resign immediately.'" Schwarzenegger "said the mailings 'were illegal; it's a hate crime….There should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior.'"

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) editorializes, "the despicable incident was, sad to say, not new to Orange County: Republicans trying to scare immigrants away from the polls. But the GOP's reaction this time — calling on its candidate to withdraw — was miles away from previous behavior. Nativist immigrant bashing may be alive in the O.C., but it's not well."

Ehrlich Works To Attract To Democratic Voters. The Washington Times (10/22, Ward, 88K) reports Gov. Robert Ehrlich "rallied in Baltimore County with Democratic lawmakers and officials who endorse the Republican's re-election bid, as Democratic leaders urged voters in the city to defeat the governor even if they 'don't care for' the party's candidate to replace him. 'I have represented majority-Democratic districts for all of my entire career,' Mr. Ehrlich said, standing on a truck bed in a Dundalk parking lot before about 100 supporters. 'Many, many Democrats are stepping up ... not leaving their party, just voting for the person they believe will lead the state,' the governor and former congressman from Baltimore County said. An hour earlier, in the city's Remington area, black Democratic leaders attacked Mr. Ehrlich while denigrating his Democratic challenger, Baltimore Mayor Martin O'Malley."

Friedman's Campaign Said To Have Become Somewhat More Serious. The AP (10/22, Arrillaga) describes three days of Richard "Kinky" Friedman's longshot Texas gubernatorial bid. The AP notes, "When Friedman launched his campaign last year in front of the Alamo, calling for the 'unconditional surrender' of [Gov. Rick] Perry with a country swing band by his side, he was far more Jon Stewart than John Kennedy. Then he hired on [Dean] Barkley, who directed [Jesse] Ventura's successful campaign and later replaced the late Paul Wellstone in the U.S. Senate. Friedman's 60-40 ratio of style-to-substance is now 40-60, says Barkley. The joke-laden speeches are sprinkled with Friedman's stance on legalizing casino gambling to help pay for education, decriminalizing marijuana to free up prison space, developing a taxpayer ID card for illegal immigrants to work."

Edwards Comments Regarding Clinton Regarded As "Foreshadowing" 2008 Primary. The Washington Post (10/22, A7, Goldfarb, 748K) reports, "Comments attributed last week to the wife of former North Carolina senator John Edwards (D) provided a faint foreshadowing of the intraparty battle that could arise when Democrats choose their presidential nominee in two years. Elizabeth Edwards said last Thursday that her life has been a happier one than that of Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), according to the magazine Ladies' Home Journal."

Columnist Says Democrats Need Strong Leadership From Obama. Frank Rich, in his column in the New York Times (10/22, 1.21M), writes that the important question for Democrats "is not whether" Sen. Barack Obama "will seek the presidency, but what kind of candidate he would be." The Democratic Party "needs a major infusion of steadfast leadership. That's the one lesson it should learn from George Bush. Call him arrogant or misguided or foolish, this president has been a leader. He had a controversial agenda -- enacting big tax cuts, privatizing Social Security, waging 'pre-emptive' war, packing the courts with judges who support his elisions of constitutional rights -- and he didn't fudge it. He didn't care if half the country despised him along the way." Rich contrasts Obama's "consistent" opposition to the Iraq War with Sen. Hillary Clinton and says that for Democrats, "one of their best hopes for long-term viability in the post-Bush era is that Barack Obama steps up and changes the party before the party of terminal timidity and equivocation changes him."

Candidates Shift Campaign Strategies To Account For Absentee Voters. The New York Times (10/22, Broder, 1.21M) reports, "For millions of Americans, Election Day is already over. Thirty states now allow no-excuse absentee voting, and most of them also allow voters to cast early ballots in person at county clerks' offices or satellite polling places. In Montana, absentee ballots were mailed Sept. 22. As many as 40 percent of Florida's voters will cast their ballots before Election Day, Nov. 7. Oregon's elections are conducted entirely by mail, and Washington is moving that way. California sent out 3.8 million absentee ballots the week of Oct. 8. Candidates are maneuvering to adapt to a changed political calendar, accelerating their advertising, their mailings and their get-out-the-vote calls. They are figuring out exactly who votes early and are trying to get to them before they cast their ballots. They are raising more money and spending it faster. … Experts estimate that more than 20 percent of voters nationwide will cast their ballots before Election Day by mail or at early-voting locations, a proportion of the electorate that is rising with each election."

California Voters Faced With Ballots As Long As 124 Pages. The Washington Post/AP (10/22, A4, Konrad) reports, "Voter guides are landing with a thud on doorsteps across California as residents are facing an unusually large number of ballot measures and candidates in next month's election. Election officials worry that the state's largest guides -- 192-page books sent to 12 million homes -- will overwhelm and discourage would-be voters. The array of complicated issues on the ballot might also lead to long lines and delays at polling sites if people haven't done their homework. A majority of voters are expected to vote by mail. But the ballots are so big that election officials fear some might be returned for insufficient postage. … The November sample ballot in San Joaquin County is the largest ever -- 100 to 124 pages, depending on the district, or triple the normal size. Many pages are devoted to a proposed tax increase to pay for road and rail projects."

Mining Executive Financing West Virginia GOP Candidates. The New York Times (10/22, Urbina, 1.21M) reports, "Don L. Blankenship is not the governor of West Virginia. But here in coal country some say he may as well be, considering the power he wields. Mr. Blankenship, the chief executive of the state's largest coal producer, Massey Energy, has promised to spend 'whatever it takes' to help win a majority in the State Legislature for the long-beleaguered Republican Party in a state that is a Democratic and labor stronghold. In a state where candidates who win typically spend less than $20,000, Mr. Blankenship has poured more than $6 million into political initiatives and local races over the past three years. Mr. Blankenship has spent at least $700,000 in his current effort to oust Democrats, and the state is awash with lawn signs, highway billboards, radio advertisements and field organizers paid for by him."

Minnesota's Independence Party Works To Broaden Its Reach. The Washington Post (10/22, A8, Defiebre, 748K) reports, "In 12 years as a major political party in Minnesota, the Independence Party has produced one larger-than-life governor, an appointed U.S. senator for 7 1/2 weeks and a smattering of local officials. Now the party of Jesse Ventura is pinning its hopes on eight statewide and federal candidates, none of whom has ever stood for election before, plus a collection of 17 seekers of lesser offices. … In some ways, the Independence Party is a serious political force while in others it's still a struggling newcomer."

Members Of Congress Now Wary Of Appearing On Colbert Report. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Puzzanghera, 918K) reports, "Most politicians are as likely to pass up free TV face time before an election as they would be to refuse a campaign check. Then again, there's a price to be paid for looking stupid. That's what members of Congress have learned recently about 'Better Know a District,' a sarcastic weekly skit that is part of 'The Colbert Report,' a nightly half-hour on Viacom Inc.'s Comedy Central network. … Many lawmakers initially played along with the segments in which Colbert interviews a member of the House of Representatives, with few checks and balances on his proclivity to make fools of them. But after a couple of House members stumbled badly on the show, some incumbents decided that the dumbest thing to do with Colbert's offer of free TV exposure was to take it."

Campaign Funding Analysis Suggests GOP Will Retain Control Of Congress. Barrons (10/22, McTague) reports that its analysis of candidates' finance data suggests that, contrary to conventional wisdom, "the GOP will hang on to both chambers, at least nominally. We expect the Republican majority in the House to fall by eight seats, to 224 of the chamber's 435. At the very worst, our analysis suggests, the party's loss could be as large as 14 seats, leaving a one-seat majority. But that is still a far cry from the 20-seat loss some are predicting. In the Senate, with 100 seats, we see the GOP winding up with 52, down three." The prediction is based "in almost every race on which candidate had the largest campaign war chest, a sign of superior grass-roots support. We ignore the polls." According to Barron's, using campaign funding as an indicator is close to 98% accurate in recent years for House races and 89% accurate for Senate races.

Nation Of Islam Prepares For New Leadership. The Washington Post (10/22, A3, Fears, Harris, 748K) reports that as Louis Farrakhan battles a "life-threatening" illness members of the Nation of Islam's board are "poised to take over the organization." The Post adds, "A change in leadership could allow the Nation to move away from a controversial mythology. Followers are taught that the group's founder, Wallace Fard, was an incarnation of God and that a scientist named Yacub created white people, notions that are dismissed by orthodox Muslims."

Rice Prods Russia On Freedoms, Georgia. Secretary Rice's trip to Russia received coverage in major newspapers, but the stories focused mainly upon her criticism of Russian domestic freedoms and Georgia policy, devoting little space to North Korea. The New York Times (10/22, Shanker, 1.21M) reports that upon arriving in Russia to discuss the North Korean nuclear crisis, "Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice criticized shrinking Russian press freedoms, questioned the enforcement of a restrictive new law on foreign private groups here and called for eased tensions between Russia and neighboring Georgia." All this "raised the possibility of a testy atmosphere for the discussions in Moscow." With "a symbolic decision that no doubt will be scrutinized by the Kremlin leadership, Ms. Rice invited senior editors of Novaya Gazeta, a leading independent journal, to a meeting at her hotel" that "included the son of the assassinated journalist Anna Politkovskaya," and "Rice said that the future of a free Russian press and electronic media 'is a major concern' of the United States government.." She also said she "would ask Russian leaders to explain the enforcement of a new law that requires foreign nongovernmental organizations to register with the government," and "planned to urge Moscow to reduce any chance for increasing conflict with neighboring Georgia." She met with Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov and a dinner with Defense Minister Sergei B. Ivanov, and a senior State Department official "described Ms. Rice's discussions with Mr. Lavrov on Georgia as 'constructive.'" Rice "also intended to discuss efforts to halt not only North Korea's nuclear program, but Iran's."

The Washington Post (10/22, A21, Kessler, 748K) adds, "Rice's high-profile meeting" with the journalists was "scheduled at the request of the State Department," and "her decision to highlight her concern about eroding press freedoms in Russia indicated the delicate balance the Bush administration is trying to strike with Russia." One of Rice's aides said "it was not a poke in the eye but the right thing to do." AFP (10/22, Milikin) describes Rice as delivering "some pointed messages," and the AP (10/22, Gearan) labels it "a symbolic rebuke." The Washington Times/AP (10/22, Gearan) publishes a version of the AP article.

The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Holley, 918K) focuses equally on the North Korea issue and Rice's other activities. It quotes Dmitry Muratov, editor of Novaya Gazeta, as saying "I was touched to the soul to see how Condoleezza Rice, both as a person and a politician, found precise, delicate and tactful words to express her deep sorrow and sympathy in front of the slain journalist's son."

In Latest Anti-Expression Incident, Thugs Beat Activist Moscow Art Gallery Owner. The New York Times (10/22, Kishkovsky, 1.21M) reports that in "the latest incident to raise troubling questions about xenophobia and freedom of expression in Russia," a group of men burst into Marat Guelman's contemporary art gallery, "destroying work by an ethnic Georgian artist and beating up the owner." Guelman is "well known both for his display of politically inspired and irreverent art and, most recently, his public attacks on neofascists for their dislike of non-Russians and of Western influence on Russian society." It was not clear if the attack was motivated by his criticism of the Kremlin, his displaying art considered antireligious by Russian Orthodox fundamentalists, his criticism of neofascists and nationalists, or the "anti-Georgian sentiment that has surged this fall."

Anti-Immigrant Mood Intensifies In Russia. The New York Times (10/22, Myers, 1.21M) profiles Aleksandr Belovm, the founder of the Movement Against Illegal Immigration, which "now claims thousands of members in branches across all of Russia." His "views -- unabashedly hostile to foreigners, at times unflinchingly racial in character -- are no longer just tapping a nativistic undercurrent, but moving into the mainstream of the political debate" amidst "a wave of racial violence." President Putin "gave such simmering feelings a public endorsement," on Oct. 5, "denouncing the 'semi-gangs, some of them ethnic' that control Russia's wholesale and retail markets."

Georgia Rules Out Force Against Separatist Regions. The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22) reports that in "a rebuttal to Russian President Vladimir V. Putin's assertion Friday at a summit with European Union leaders that Georgia was planning to take back South Ossetia and Abkhazia by military means," Georgian President Mikhail Saakashvili "ruled out the use of force to establish control over two pro-Russian separatist regions" and "said Tbilisi remained open to dialogue with Moscow to reduce tension that has escalated since the former Soviet republic temporarily detained four purported Russian spies last month."

Russia Opposes Punitive Measures For Iran. The AP (10/22, Gearan) reports that "even before" Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "arrived in the Russian capital, her Russian counterpart said Moscow will not allow the Security Council to be used for punitive measures against Iran." Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov did say that "Russia…was ready to discuss ways to pressure Iran into accepting broader international oversight of its nuclear program." AFP (10/22) adds that Lavrov said "Russia would oppose any effort to use the UN Security Council to promote a change of regime in Iran." However, he added that "the Iranian side must finally bow to the constructive proposals that have been made and fully cooperate with the IAEA."

Russia Gives Rice Assurances On North Korea Sanctions. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Holley, 918K) reports, "Rice pressed Russia for a tougher stance against nuclear proliferation." She "mentioned possible U.S.-Russian cooperation in enforcing sanctions against North Korea under the 2003 U.S.-led Proliferation Security Initiative."

AFP (10/22, Milikin) adds, "Russia has indicated it would strictly enforce sanctions on North Korea as US Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice met top leaders in Moscow." A senior State Department official said, "'It seems clear that the Russians take 1718 seriously'…referring to the UN Security Council resolution imposing sanctions on North Korea."

Rice Said To Be Deflecting North Korea Criticism With Optimism On China. In an analysis piece, the Washington Post (10/22, A21, Kessler, 748K) reports, "Many experts regard North Korea's test as a failure of Bush's nonproliferation policy." However, with "her trip to Asia this week," Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice "has come close to saying the test was a net plus for the United States. She has tried to deflect criticism by saying the test was an affirmation, rather than a failure, of the Bush administration's policy of trying to draw China deeper into negotiations on North Korea." Other U.S. officials also "have begun to depict China's increasingly central role in the administration's myriad foreign policy problems as a significant achievement." However, Rice acknowledged that "the shift will not 'happen in one fell swoop,'" and "that it was still unclear how hard the Chinese government would push North Korea."

US Reiterates Nuclear Protection Of South Korea, Using Stronger Language. The AP (10/22, Mann) reports, "The U.S. is pledging 'immediate support' of South Korea as part of a 'firm' commitment to defend its ally under America's nuclear umbrella, stronger language than in last year's version of their long-standing policy statement." At their meeting Friday, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and South Korean Defense Minister Yoon Kwang-ung "disagreed over how explicitly the U.S. should say that South Korea is under that umbrella," as "the South Korean delegation sought to persuade Pentagon officials to issue a public statement saying that if the North attacked the South with nuclear weapons, the U.S. would retaliate as if American territory itself had been attacked by nuclear weapons." However, "U.S. officials resisted, saying that would go beyond what the U.S. normally says publicly about how it would respond with regard to nuclear weapons. For decades, U.S. policy has been deliberately designed to include some ambiguity about the circumstances under which it would use nuclear arms."

South Korea Continues Projects In The North, Which Is Said To "Signal Strength." The AP (10/22, Herman) reports, "South Korea is still sending tourists to a mountain resort in the North and maintaining a joint economic zone, despite pressure to cancel the projects after Pyongyang's nuclear test," as "cutting off the joint projects…would mean Seoul would lose influence in the North, leaving the isolated nation wide open for China — the North's No. 1 trade partner and a key source of aid." However, "the U.S. has scoffed at the tourism venture…saying the project simply hands money to the North Korean government," and "has questioned labor practices in a joint economic zone where North Korean workers provide cheap labor for South Korean firms." Still, "China has made increasing economic inroads in the North in recent years, and South Korea has expressed concern that North Korea could become a de-facto Chinese province." Intensely nationalistic Koreans worry "that China is staging a shadow campaign to maneuver for position after a North Korean collapse." The AP concludes, "Seoul's reluctance to back out of its projects with North Korea could be a way of signaling strength — and ensuring that Koreans will have a land to call their own for centuries more."

UN Diplomats Said To Dread North Korean Ambassador's "Tirades." The Washington Times (10/22, McElroy, 88K), in an article titled, "Envoy's Tirades Elicit Chuckles At U.N.," reports, "Diplomats at the United Nations dread the arrival of North Korean Ambassador Pak Gil-yon at the microphone. Known sarcastically as Dr. Chuckles for his highly-strung manner, he is a master of florid tirades," and one a diplomat said, "We never get anything worthwhile out of him." Pak's "performance has done nothing to salvage the already low reputation of North Korean diplomacy."

In Stopping Trade, China Must Balance Instability Against North Korean Collapse. The New York Times (10/22, Onishi, 1.21M) reports, "North Korea's porous 880-mile border with China is its lifeline to the outside world," and "For China, the bottom line is to erect the right number of fences, as it did along the border city of Dandong recently. Build too few and you invite instability in China. Build too many and North Korea collapses," which "is clearly something Beijing doesn't want," as it "might send more North Koreans into China" or "could also bring reunification of the Korean Peninsula under America's ally South Korea."

Kristof Blames North Korea Nuclear Weapons On Bush Policies, Calls For Engagement. Nicholas D. Kristof writes in his column in the New York Times (10/22, 1.21M) that Bill Clinton "inherited a situation that, if it had continued, would have resulted in North Korea having hundreds of nuclear weapons by now, and producing an additional 50 each year. Instead, Mr. Clinton negotiated a deal with North Korea that resulted in it producing not a single ounce of new plutonium in his eight years in office. In contrast, President Bush inherited that North Korean nuclear freeze and, if he had just left it alone, North Korea wouldn't have produced any new plutonium. But Mr. Bush overruled Colin Powell's efforts to continue the engagement — and so North Korea has churned out enough plutonium on Mr. Bush's watch for perhaps eight nuclear weapons."

Journalist Notes North Korea Situation Involves "Old-Fashioned Clash Of Nations." Peter Maass, a contributing writer and former reported from South Korea for The Washington Post, in the New York Times Magazine (10/22) writes, "We can now thank North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, who is credited with directing several movies, for creating a Mexican standoff," one "that involves a) as many as six participants, including b) countries that are threatening one another with c) nuclear weapons." Still, it is the "old-fashioned clash of nations and national interests, exacerbated, as often happens, by the imperatives of regime survival," demonstrating that "new threats, like Islamic extremism, do not replace old ones." This situation, "history shaped by the rivalries, interests and missteps of nations rather than terrorists dashing from hideout to hideout," is "the way the world has been ordered and disordered since the emergence of the nation-state and even before, and it did not vanish on Sept. 11, 2001," just as "certain basic facts — war is an extension of politics, politics are often driven by a need for resources as well as collective feelings of pride or shame — remain much the same in the wake of Sept. 11."

Corruption Said To Be Rampant In China. In a week in review article, the New York Times (10/22, Yardley, 1.21M) reports that "there is the perception, fair or not, that official corruption is everywhere in China," and "To some extent, the ruling Communist Party does not disagree." With "an economic boom gilded with excess and profiteering, official corruption is so widespread, and increasingly so brazen, that it is almost taken for granted." While much malfeasance goes undiscovered or is covered up by the party," that "information that does reach the public domain is stunning." Although "President Hu Jintao and Prime Minister Wen Jiabao have warned that corruption threatens the credibility and legitimacy of Communist Party rule and have vowed to stamp it out," many experts warn "that truly stamping out corruption would involve the type of broad political reform and a full embrace of the rule of law that the party has long resisted," and "would topple…many of his own political allies." Instead, "the government responds largely with propaganda campaigns." Still according to some experts, "to some extent, the corruption problem is not atypical for the country's stage of development,"

Facing Domestic Stress, Egypt Presses US To Resolve Palestine. The New York Times (10/22, Slackman, 1.21M) reports that senior officials say, "Faced with twin political threats — a rising Islamic movement at home and diminished influence throughout the region — Egypt is pressing the United States for an aggressive promotion of Palestinian statehood as a means of strengthening itself and other Arab governments allied with Washington." They "see a major regional peace initiative by Washington as the first necessary step toward stealing momentum from Islamic groups," although "optimism is limited that Washington will put the stated interests of its Arab allies ahead of the perceived interests of Israel." In "evidence of growing concern and frustration here," during her recent visit "Egyptian officials told Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice…that the United States should move straight 'to the endgame'" in Palestine.

Abbas Calls On Retired Commander To Curb Hamas In West Bank. The AP (10/22, Federman) reports that "a day after Palestinian Foreign Minister Mahmoud Zahar, a top Hamas leader, said the Islamic group would beef up its militia in Fatah's West Bank stronghold, Palestinian president Mahmoud Abbas brought security commander Ismail Jaber "out of retirement Saturday to block Hamas from building up its forces in the West Bank, the latest sign that the standoff between the Islamic militant group and Fatah could erupt into widespread violence." He "has been tainted by corruption but is respected by thousands of gunmen loyal to Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah movement." Previously Abbas had "forced Jaber and other senior officials into retirement as part of his efforts to root out corruption." Now, an official close to the Palestinian leader said that he "hopes Jaber will help him curb Hamas' plans in the West Bank."

Veil Debate Said To Represent Shift In Britons' Limits Of Tolerance. The New York Times (10/22, Cowell, 1.21M) reports, "Rarely has Britain's struggle to define its relationship with a disaffected and diverse Muslim minority seemed so fraught as it was last week, with the debate fixated on where a woman can wear…the niqab, the full-face veil," which, for Britons, "has come to offer an emblem by which Islamic separation may be criticized without challenging the right of 1.6 millions Muslims — fully 3 percent of the population — to practice their faith." The debate "seems to signal a broader shift as non-Muslim Britons set new limits of tolerance, not just for recent immigrants but for a younger, home-grown generation of more assertive British Muslims," and "there is a ginger step toward the notion that the right of the group might trump the right of the individual under more circumstances." Concurrently, "A blame-game question is emerging: Who is responsible for the widening gulf between majority and minority?" For Muslims born and raised in Britain, the "paradox" is that they "are an integral part of the society that seems to reject them. To be accepted, they need to assert their presence, yet in doing so, they fall afoul of pressures to conform to the standards of the non-Muslim majority.

Former Dutch Lawmaker Calls For Reform, Moderate Approach To European Muslims, Immigraiton. Ayaan Hirsi Ali, a former Dutch legislator from Somalia who now lives in the U.S. where she is a fellow at the American Enterprise Institute, writes in the Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) that the worst-case scenario for Europe will be if "the warnings of the" pessimists about immigration are "not be heeded" and the "optimism" immigration's proponents is "abandoned." Then, "the monopoly of force that is now exclusive to states will be challenged by armed subgroups. European societies will be divided along ethnic and religious lines," and "Europeans will come to accept the de facto implementation of Sharia law in certain neighborhoods and even cities." However, if Europeans are cautious but lively, they can create the best case scenario. It begins with "controlled or planned immigration," as the "current system in most European countries is designed to attract the highest number of people with truly heartbreaking stories, not the highest number of people who are willing and able to adapt to the European society."

Schroeder Says Bush's Religiosity Created Reservations. The AP (10/22, Eddy) reports, "Ex-Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder, whose second term was marked by vehement opposition to the war in Iraq, described in an advance copy of his memoirs how he was suspicious of President Bush's constant references to his Christian faith." He "said he could not reconcile himself with the feeling that religion was the driving force behind many of Bush's political decisions," writing, "What bothered me, and in a certain way made me suspicious…was again and again in our discussions how much this president described himself as 'God-fearing.'" Schroeder also "accused some elements in U.S. as being hypocritical when it comes to secularism in government. 'We rightly criticize that in most Islamic states, the role of religion for society and the character of the rule of law are not clearly separated,' Schroeder wrote. 'But we fail to recognize that in the USA, the Christian fundamentalists and their interpretation of the Bible have similar tendencies.'" The Los Angeles Times/AP (10/22) runs a shortened versions of the AP story.

Panama Expected To Vote To Expand Canal. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, Kraul, 918K) reports, "Voters are likely to approve a $5.2-billion project to expand the Panama Canal today, according to polls, despite warnings of an accumulation of debt, competition, technical miscalculations and possible environmental damage. Only scattered opposition has developed," and they "have been obscured by the well-oiled campaign by the government of President Martin Torrijos to sell the expansion as a competitive necessity." Still the opposition says "the expansion amounts to fixing something that isn't broken, and that the nation is risking its most important asset on dubious engineering and financial assumptions." Also, "skeptics say that cost overruns are inevitable and that they will be shouldered by taxpayers."

US Embargo Blamed For Cuban Market Restrictions. The Washington Post (10/22, A14, Roig-franzia, 748K) reports, "'Por la izquierda ,' or 'on the left;' Cubans use the phrase to describe back-alley deals both large and small. They scheme on the left to cope with chronic shortages and to skirt myriad rules that prohibit most forms of private enterprise and govern the minutiae of their daily lives." The Cuban government says "the restrictions that push so many Cubans to the left are, in some cases, necessitated by the U.S. trade embargo and, in others, a counteroffensive in the nearly half-decade propaganda war between the countries." A Cuban official said, "It's equivalent to genocide." The Post added that "even Cubans who are critical of the Castro government tend to have similarly heated reactions to the embargo. Their trips into the black market unspool as quiet acts of rebellion against both U.S. policy and the restrictions imposed by Castro."

Mexican President-Elect Seeks Help From US In Fighting Drug Lords. The AP (10/22, Weissert) reports, "The drug lords at war in central Mexico are no longer content with simply killing their enemies. They are putting their severed heads on public display." Mexican president-elect Felipe Calderon "wants a new, better trained federal police force to investigate drug smuggling, longer prison terms for drug convicts and more extraditions of kingpins wanted in the U.S. He says Mexico also needs more help from U.S. law enforcement, since Mexican smugglers are serving American drug users. Attorney General Magana denies Calderon's contention that Mexican law enforcement is overwhelmed. But in Villa Madero…the abrupt mass departure of police officers suggests a different picture." A local official said that the local police are afraid of these gangs he described as "very well armed and very dangerous." Subsequently, "since the police officers quit, many in Villa Madero say they are afraid to leave their homes."

Over 10,000 Homeless After Indonesian Mudslide. The Washington Post /AP (10/22, A20, Brummitt) reports, "Four months ago, a torrent of hot mud from deep beneath the surface of Indonesia's seismically charged Java island began surging from a natural gas exploration site following a drilling accident. The 'mud volcano' pours out about 165,000 cubic yards of mud every day -- enough to cover a football field about 75 feet deep. Often spewing out in geyser-like eruptions, the mud has left about 665 acres swamped or abandoned as unsafe, forcing more than 10,000 people from their homes."

New Perspectives Needed In Darfur. Morton Abramowitz, a senior fellow at the Century Foundation and a former assistant secretary of state, in an op-ed in The Washington Post (10/22, B7, 748K) writes that perhaps we "need to consider whether a different message is required to get urgent action from the Bush administration on ending the violence. Specifically: Is it not time to go beyond urging greater pressure on Sudan and using force in the region to seek immediately an effective negotiated peace settlement between Sudan's leader and the rebel groups in Darfur?" Abramowitz criticizes the media's "relentless campaign to persuade Western governments to stop the killing in Darfur, protect and feed its people, and get millions of refugees out of camps and back home." Abramowitz cites the problem of "public pressure for aggressive military measures has sometimes worked in persuading Western democracies to take actions they prefer not to take ... Robust military measures are, unfortunately, simply not acceptable to governments, whatever they may say about 'never again.'"

LATimes Urges Administration To Talk With Syria. The Los Angeles Times (10/22, 918K) editorializes that the Bush administration "continues to insist that merely talking to nasty regimes legitimizes and empowers them. This stance is impeding progress on Middle East peace. The U.S. should sit down and talk to Syria -- and encourage Israel to do the same." Instead, the White House "is reportedly pressuring Israel not to negotiate with Damascus, arguing that to do so would undermine U.S. efforts to isolate and punish Syria." The Times adds, "The administration should realize that the mere act of talking to your adversaries is not a sign of weakness." Therefore, "Bush should send former Secretary of State James A. Baker III to Damascus. Baker, a veteran of many rounds of bruising negotiations with Assad's father, has said he favors talking to Damascus. An Israeli-Syrian breakthrough is attainable, and it could jump-start the Israeli-Palestinian peace process."

TERRORISM NEWS:

Radical Islam Finds US 'Sterile Ground' (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, October 23, 2006

NEW YORK

The Islamist radicalism that inspired young Muslims to attack their own countries - in London, Madrid, and Bali - has not yielded similar incidents in the United States, at least so far.

"Home-grown" terror cells remain a concern of US law officers, who cite several disrupted plots since 9/11. But the suspects' unsophisticated planning and tiny numbers have led some security analysts to conclude that America, for all its imperfections, is not fertile ground for producing jihadist terrorists.

To understand why, experts point to people like Omar Jaber, an AmeriCorps volunteer; Tarek Radwan, a human rights advocate; and Hala Kotb, a consultant on Middle East affairs. They are the face of young Muslim-Americans today - educated, motivated, and integrated into society - and their voices help explain how the nation's history of inclusion has helped to defuse sparks of Islamist extremism.

"American society is more into the whole assimilation aspect of it," says New York-born Mr. Jaber. "In America, it's a lot easier to practice our religion without complications."

In a nation where mosques have sprung up alongside churches and synagogues, where Muslim women are free to wear the hijab (or not), and where education and job opportunities range from decent to good, the resentments that can breed extremism do not seem very evident in the Muslim community. Since 9/11, however, concern is rising among Muslim-Americans that they are becoming targets of bias and suspicion - by law enforcement as well as fellow citizens. It's a disquieting trend, say the young Muslims - one that might eventually help radicalism to grow.

It's impossible to pinpoint the factors that produce home-grown terrorists, analysts say. But it's also impossible to ignore the stark contrast between the lives of Muslims in European countries where bombings have occurred and those of Muslims in America.

"What we have here among Muslim-Americans is a very conservative success ethic," says John Zogby, president of Zogby International in Utica, N.Y., whose polling firm has surveyed the Muslim-American community. "People come to this country and they like it. They don't view it as the belly of the beast. With very few exceptions, you don't see the bitter enclaves that you have in Europe." Life in America vs. life in Europe

Part of what so shocked Spain about the Madrid train bombers, and then Britain after the London subway and bus bombings in July 2005, was that most of the perpetrators were native sons. In each case, the young men, allegedly inspired by Al Qaeda ideology, came from poorer neighborhoods heavy on immigrants. (By contrast, a plot foiled in August to blow up airplanes over the Atlantic involved suspects from leafy, middle- and upper-middle-class neighborhoods in Britain.)

America, too, has poorer neighborhoods with large Muslim concentrations, but they tend to be interspersed with other ethnic groups and better assimilated into society. Another difference, some suggest, is the general profile of Muslims who have come to the US and raised their families here.

Most Muslim immigrants came to America for educational or business opportunities and from educated, middle-class families in their home countries, according to an analysis by Peter Skerry of Boston College and the Brookings Institution. In Europe, the majority came to work in factory jobs and often from poorer areas at home.

European Muslims today live primarily in isolated, low-income enclaves where opportunities for good jobs and a good education are limited. In the US, 95 percent of Muslim-Americans are high school graduates, according to "Muslims in the Public Square," a Zogby International survey in 2004. Almost 60 percent are college graduates, and Muslims are thriving economically around the country. Sixty-nine percent of adults make more than $35,000 a year, and one-third earn more than $75,000, the survey showed.

In Britain, by contrast, two-thirds of Muslims live in low-income households, according to British census data. Three-quarters of those households are overcrowded. British Muslims' jobless rate is 15 percent - three times higher than in the general population. For young Muslims between 16 and 24, the jobless rate is higher: 17.5 percent.

"The culture is qualitatively different [in the American Muslim community] from what we've seen from public information from Europe, and that actually says very positive things about our society," says Jonathan Winer, a terrorism expert in Washington. "We don't have large populations of immigrants with a generation sitting around semi-employed and deeply frustrated. That's a gigantic difference."

Jaber, the AmeriCorps volunteer, who is studying to become a medical doctor, says he has not experienced anti-Muslim bias. In part, he says, that may be because he doesn't have an accent or look particularly Middle Eastern - his father is Palestinian and his mother Filipino. But he also credits America's melting-pot mentality, as does Ms. Kotb, the Middle East consultant.

"We weren't isolated growing up. We were part of the culture," says Kotb, who grew up outside Washington in a family that inculcated a success ethic. "Religion was important, but not so much that you'd have to cover your head or if you don't pray five times a day, that's it - nothing like that. There were a lot more progressive attitudes" within her local Muslim community.

In mosques in America, it's fairly common for imams to preach assimilation, says Mr. Zogby. That's not as true in Europe, particularly in poorer neighborhoods where sermons can be laced with extremism.

"The success of ... Saudi-inspired religious zealotry in Europe was in large part because the Saudis put up the money to build mosques and pay for imams," says Ian Cuthbertson, a counterterrorism expert at the World Policy Institute at the New School for Social Research. "The American Muslim community was rich enough not to require Saudi money to build its mosques."

In Europe, it's estimated that millions of second- and third-generation Muslims have not been well assimilated in their adopted countries, so have little or no fealty to either the European country they live in or the one their parents were born in. "They are much more susceptible to the Internet, returning jihadist fighters, and extremist imams," says Thomas Sanderson of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "There's no doubt that Europe has an incubator environment and we have a somewhat sterile environment for radicalism."

To be sure, the United States has brought charges in several terrorism-related cases involving American Muslims. Some have resulted in convictions, notably the 2002 case of six Yemeni-Americans from Lackawanna, N.Y. Other cases are pending. (See chart on Page 2.)

DOJ_NMG_0084853

Identifying and tracking home-grown terrorists is a complicated task - one that risks alienating or even infuriating the general Muslim-American citizenry if tactics are seen as unfair. Feeling a chill

The young Muslims interviewed for this story chose their words carefully, but their inference is clear: They worry that suspicion toward Muslims has been building since 9/11, and they suggest that US intervention in Iraq and its support for Israel cause angst among many Arab-Americans.

US foreign policies "in the long term are going to hurt the US," says Mr. Radwan, the human rights activist, who works in Washington. "They, along with the crackdown on Muslim-Americans [by law enforcement], feed a feeling of resentment and the perception that the US acts on the basis of a double standard."

Indeed, America's Muslim community would wage the war on terror differently. According to the 2004 Zogby survey, three-quarters say the best way is for the US to change its foreign policy in the Middle East by recognizing a Palestinian state and being less supportive of Israel.

A newer concern for America's Muslims is their standing in post-9/11 society. Many sense that the ground under their feet is shifting - and young people like Florida-born Radwan, in particular, feel it. A 2001 graduate of Texas A&M University, Radwan wanted to become a doctor and began working as a medical researcher. One month after the 9/11 attacks, he was let go - at the end of a three-month probationary period. Afterward, he says, he couldn't get even an interview for a job that used his biochemistry degree or research skills. Eventually he abandoned his hopes of a medical career and shifted to human rights work.

That experience leads him to suggest another reason the US hasn't seen European-style homegrown terror cells: the intense scrutiny the FBI has focused on Muslim-Americans. "That is good in the short term, but bad in the long term," he says. "The Bush administration policies feed resentment that ... will stay in the Arab- American psyche for a long time."

The FBI says it doesn't target any community, neighborhood, or religion. Agents simply go where the leads take them, says John Miller, the FBI's assistant director of public affairs. But he adds: "We have put a growing effort into community outreach because we understand the discomfort the amount of pressure our attention can bring to a community." The 'home-grown' threat: Is it overstated?

A small but growing number of analysts believe that some US officials have overstated the threat of homegrown Islamist radicalism in the United States. While Al Qaeda and foreign terrorists remain determined to attack in America, they say, the focus on potential American cells may be leading the US to misdirect its antiterror efforts.

"My theory as to why we haven't found any [homegrown Islamist terrorist cells] is because there aren't very many of them.... They aren't the diabolical, capable, and inventive people envisioned by most politicians and people in the terrorism industry," says John Mueller, a political scientist at Ohio State University. "The danger is that we've wasted an enormous amount of money with all of the wiretaps [and] investigations, and diverted two-thirds of the FBI from criminal work to terrorism work."

The FBI calls such conclusions "uninformed," citing alleged plots by radicalized US citizens. The most notable was the case of the Lackawanna Six, so named for the six Yemeni-Americans from Lackawanna, N.Y., who went to Al Qaeda training camps in the spring of 2001.

"The people who make these claims [about threats being exaggerated] are never the ones responsible for preventing these attacks," says John Miller, the FBI's assistant director of public affairs. "The point is that if you're the dead guy, or you're a family member of one of those guys, all you know is that you wanted someone to develop the intelligence and take the actions to prevent it."

Still, a lack of public evidence pointing to extensive Islamist extremism in the US is leading a small but growing number of experts to agree with Professor Meuller's assessment. Like Meuller, though, they add a cautionary note.

"There's not zero threat in any community, but it is good news and we have to hope that reflects an underlying reality that [homegrown extremist cells] don't exist here," says Jonathan Winer, a terrorism expert in Washington. "You've always got lone nuts in every imaginable ethnic group grabbing every imaginable ideology to justify terrorism."

Singing For Your Sleep (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084854

Sgt. Ben Allbright knows something about sleep deprivation. During the first six months of the Iraq war, his job was to guard prisoners in Al Qaim, a makeshift base near the Syrian border where U.S. troops conducted aggressive hunts for Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Every day, soldiers hauled in about 20 new detainees for questioning by military interrogators or CIA operatives. To "get them out of their comfort zone" before the interrogation, Allbright told NEWSWEEK recently, the drill was to keep the Iraqis awake for 24 hours or longer. The guards would stand the prisoners up in old shipping containers, their hands tied behind their backs and their faces blindfolded and facing the wall. "After a while you'd see their knees buckling, or you'd see one of them lean forward and put his forehead against the wall to try to sleep." When that happened, Allbright would holler into the container or bang on the metal side with a stone or a club.

Is that inhumane? Is it legal? President George W. Bush signed the Military Commissions Act into law last week, laying down guidelines for Guantánamo prisoner tribunals and addressing the issue of interrogation tactics. Before the law was passed, the president had stressed the need to give CIA interrogators clear guidelines for questioning suspects. Most legal experts believe the new law criminalizes the harshest techniques used by the CIA since the attacks of September 11, including the mock drowning measure known as waterboarding. But the bill also creates a broad gray area in which some of the less dramatic methods—sleep deprivation, along with forced standing, hooding and stress positions—might still be part of the interrogation package. Neither the Pentagon nor the CIA would comment on their techniques, but the wiggle room bothers critics. "It seems pretty clear that they want to keep a gray area so that tactics can continue to be used that fall into that area," says Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, a prominent military defense lawyer.

Many experts question whether such methods are even effective. Sleep deprivation in particular has been used as an interrogation tool in different places around the globe throughout the past century, with questionable results. In America's Prohibition era, cops in the Chicago Police Department were known to sleep-deprive suspected criminals to extract confessions, many of which turned out to be false. In Northern Ireland, British troops used it in crackdowns on the IRA until a European court ruled in a minority opinion that it constitutes torture. When the CIA studied the utility of various interrogation methods in a broad 1960s survey known as Kubark, the agency concluded sleep deprivation made suspects more apathetic under questioning, not necessarily more compliant. Yet by 2001, the measure was being used on Afghan guerrillas in secret CIA detention centers, according to the testimony of both prisoners and soldiers.

Part of the problem is that sleeplessness inhibits clear thinking and can trigger hallucinations. "It's a little like getting drunk," says Mark Mahowald, a neurologist who heads the Minnesota Regional Sleep Disorder Center. While little is known about why humans need sleep, Mahowald says, the effects of deprivation have been widely studied. Within 24 hours, parts of the brain that control higher-level tasks—judgment, reasoning, self-monitoring—become impaired. Beyond a day, the subject actually slips into a state of semiconsciousness—something akin to a sleepwalker who can perform physical activities but has limited cognitive power. "Those kinds of changes might help an interrogator get someone to talk," Mahowald said. "But the things he says should not be counted on as reliable." What happens when sleep is deprived for longer stretches? Researchers have never subjected humans to more than a few days of sleeplessness. But when the University of Chicago deprived rats of sleep in a seminal study in the 1990s, the rodents survived three weeks without a wink, then died.

In CIA prisons, the record for sleep deprivation is shorter—but apparently not by much. Human Rights Watch, which interviewed the lawyers of 20 detainees held in a secret prison in Afghanistan as late as 2004, says some of them were sleep-deprived for up to two weeks, though sometimes allowed short naps. The facility, known among detainees as "the dark prison," was among the harshest run by the United States since the start of the war on terror.

Not everyone dismisses the effectiveness of sleep deprivation. The Israelis think it can help to pry valuable information from reluctant captives. Though Israel's Supreme Court banned torture in a 1999 ruling, interrogators regularly use sleep deprivation against Palestinians. Avi Dichter, Israel's minister of Public Security and the former head of Shabak, Israel's FBI, defends the technique: "When you're tired, is it easier to question you? I think yes. And I think we're all built the same, including terrorists."

Allbright, the sergeant who served in Afghanistan, has doubts. By the time questioning of sleep-deprived prisoners began, he recalls, they were so desperate to nod off they'd provide whatever answers the interrogators wanted to hear. Confessions included details about WMD that didn't exist. Allbright, a reservist who now studies law at the University of Arkansas, Little Rock, also believes sleep deprivation leads to a slippery slope. In sessions he says he witnessed, when interrogators couldn't wrench information from tired suspects, they'd resort to threats and in some cases to physical abuse. Allbright had read the Geneva accords on his breaks from guard duty, and complained to superiors about the breach of conduct. "They'd either laugh it off or they'd tell me it's above my pay grade," he says. (The Pentagon had no comment on Allbright's allegations.) Eventually, he was transferred to another base and given a different job. That was in late 2003, when the war in Iraq was still fresh and the procedures often vague. With a new law now in place, only some of them are clearer.

WAR NEWS:

Lawmakers To Bush: Push Iraq On Militias (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 23, 2006

Republicans and Democrats urged the White House on Sunday to increase the pressure on Iraq's prime minister to crush militias blamed for the rising bloodshed.

President Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Nouri al-Maliki's ability to come to grips with the sectarian violence. Yet continued instability and rising casualties have led to calls, growing louder as the Nov. 7 elections near, for Bush to overhaul his war plan.

"I don't believe that a shift in tactics ought to wait until after the election," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "There are too many casualties there. If we have a better course, we ought to adopt it sooner rather than later."

Two U.S. troops were killed in fighting, the military said Sunday, raising the death toll in October to 80, the highest of any month this year. The overall U.S. death toll has surpassed 2,780

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the Bush administration's Iraq policy was failure. "What we have is a situation where this government over the last few months is deteriorating," said Reed, D-R.I.

While agreeing al-Maliki is the best leader to support in Iraq right now, lawmakers from both parties said he must do more to find a political solution between warring Shiite and Sunni sects, or peace will remain out of reach.

Bush said in his judgment, "Maliki has got what it takes to lead a unity government." But the president noted the urgency the new government faces to stop the killing. "I'm patient. I'm not patient forever, and I'm not patient with dawdling," Bush said. "But I recognize the degree of difficulty of the task, and therefore, say to the American people, we won't cut and run."

He added it would be a sign of surrender "if you pull the troops out before the job is done. Absolutely."

Sen. John Kerry, Bush's opponent in the 2004 presidential race, said a political rather than military solution is needed.

"Either they resolve the political differences within this year because they want to or they don't want to. If they don't want to, there's nothing American troops can do," said Kerry, D-Mass.

Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said setting a withdrawal timetable could leave a security vacuum that terrorists would fill. But Warner, R-Va., has said a change in course may be necessary if the security situation does not improve soon.

He urged the Iraqi prime minister to give the Iraqi army more authority to improve security. "It is their job, not the U.S. coalition forces' to subdue and get rid of these private militias," Warner said.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the administration must pressure the Iraqis to make political compromises on power and oil resources.

"If they don't want to do that, if they're going to have a civil war, we have to tell them, `You're going to do that without us,'" said Levin, who wants to see U.S. troops begin to leave Iraq by the end of the year.

The White House took issue with a report in Sunday's New York Times that said the head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq were working on a plan that probably would — for the first time — outline milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. The newspaper said the blueprint to be presented to al-Maliki by the end of this year would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

DOJ_NMG_0084856

The White House said the article was not accurate. It said the administration was constantly developing new tactics to help the new Iraqi government sustain, defend and govern itself.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday that U.S. officials are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they can take over various areas of responsibility so the Iraqis do not grow dependent on U.S. troops.

Democrats say it's past time for a change. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the administration was hinting at doing so because Democrats were threatening to capture control of Congress in the upcoming election.

"Let's hope that at long last we'll have a true change of policy by the administration and not just a political feint to get by in a tight election," Kennedy said.

To Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, "It's immoral to have the lives of young Americans being put on the line, waiting for an election day event or strategy. If you've got a better strategy, Mr. President, we deserve to have it now."

Bush and Kerry appeared on ABC's "This Week." Reed and Specter were on CNN's "Late Edition," while Warner and Levin spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

Troops To Remain In Iraq, Bush Says (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

President Bush implicitly acknowledged yesterday that the war in Iraq will continue for several years, saying he could not see any way that U.S. forces could be withdrawn from the country while he is president.

In a taped interview with ABC's "This Week," moderator George Stephanopoulos asked Mr. Bush, "Can you imagine any circumstances where U.S. troops are going to leave Iraq before you leave the presidency?"

"No. I cannot," Mr. Bush said. "You mean every single troop out? No."

The president's interview aired in the wake of widespread reports last week, based on leaks from a U.S. task force headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, that the Bush administration is preparing for a "course correction" in Iraq in the coming months, with some of the options being the partition of Iraq and a military coup against Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Administration spokesmen already had played down those reports, but Mr. Bush yesterday noted that Mr. al-Maliki has only been in office four months and expressed his support, while noting that it wouldn't last forever.

"I'm patient. I'm not patient forever. And I'm not patient with dawdling. But I recognize the degree of difficulty of the task, and therefore say to the American people: We won't cut and run."

In an appearance yesterday on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said the Iraqi military needed to crack down harder on the private militias that have fought a low-grade civil war, with daily body counts in the dozens. Yesterday, the militias killed more than 40 Iraqis, with the bloodiest attacks coming against police recruits and holiday shoppers. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of a Marine and two soldiers, raising the October death toll to 81.

"It is their job, not the U.S. coalition forces' to subdue and get rid of these private militias," said Mr. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, adding that a change in course may be necessary if the security situation does not improve soon and that "I think the administration is constantly revising and looking forward."

For his part, Sen. Richard G. Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told Fox News that criticism of Mr. al-Maliki is not the solution.

"We're talking about putting pressure on Maliki, but he doesn't have much clout," the Indiana Republican said. "Now, we probably need to think through how we, the United States, can give this prime minister more clout."

However, in his own "Fox News Sunday" appearance, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said a more drastic approach is necessary.

"The truth of the matter is, there's a need for radical change in policy. There's a need for a political solution in Iraq and a bipartisan solution here at home," the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee said. "Without those two things happening, there is no possibility, in my view, we succeed in Iraq."

Mr. Bush rejected the notion that he has been unwilling to adjust U.S. strategy in Iraq.

DOJ_NMG_0084857

"Well, listen, we've never been 'Stay the course.' We have been -- 'We will complete the mission, we will do our job and help achieve the goal.' But we're constantly adjusting the tactics, constantly."

In recent campaign appearances, Mr. Bush has described the Democrats as wanting to "wave the white flag of surrender" in the war on terror. When asked whether he could name any Democrats who have uttered such a phrase, Mr. Bush referenced Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, his opponent in the 2004 presidential election.

"I can name a Democrat who said there ought to be a date certain from which to withdraw from Iraq, whether or not we've achieved a victory or not," Mr. Bush said.

"That's reprehensible. It's a lie," Mr. Kerry said during his own appearance on "This Week," when asked about Mr. Bush's surrender comments. "The administration has lied in the walkup to the war. They've lied in the conduct of the war. And they have made America less safe. And the president just misled America again in that interview."

When asked whether Iraqi insurgents are trying to affect the midterm elections, Mr. Bush said, "My gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we'd leave. And the leaders of al Qaeda have made that very clear. ... They believe that if they can create enough chaos, the American people will grow sick and tired of the Iraqi effort and will cause [the U.S.] government to withdraw."

Deepening Disarray Over US Policy In Iraq (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 23, 2006

Leading Republicans and the Bush administration on Sunday projected a deepening sense of disarray over Iraq, as they argued with each other over the current state of affairs and the way forward.

Several senators took issue with the administration's policies in Iraq, distancing themselves from the White House in the run-up to next month's mid-term elections to Congress.

Spokesmen scrambled to deny media reports that ran contrary to the official line.

Senator John Warner, chairman of the armed services committee, who had described Iraq as "slipping sideways", on Fox News declared the situation to be worsening as Shia turned on Shia, Sunni on Sunni and al-Qaeda moved into the western Anbar province.

Mr Warner congratulated US military commanders for acknowledging that the Baghdad security plan was not working. But he did stand by the administration in rejecting calls for a timetable of withdrawal.

Senator Arlen Specter, head of the judiciary committee, said a New York Times report on Sunday – denied by the White House – had all the hallmarks of accuracy. According to the report, the administration is preparing a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and take on a larger security role.

Mr Specter said that was the right approach and the government of Nouri al-Maliki had to be told the US would not be there for ever.

"We have to face the facts," he said, declaring Iraq to be in a civil war, at odds with official pronouncements.

Senator Richard Lugar, who chairs the foreign affairs committee, said Mr Maliki lacked "clout" but was "probably the best horse to ride on in the situation".

A Nadir Of U.S. Power (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

It's not exactly morning in America.

In Iraq, things get ever uglier, and the old remedy of extra troops now seems tragically futile. The Bush team has recently tried putting thousands of additional soldiers into Baghdad, and the result after two months is that violence there has increased.

Iraq is often seen as a special Rumsfeldian screw-up. But in Afghanistan, the Bush team quickly handed off to a model pro-Western leader backed by a broad NATO coalition. And what are the results there? The government is wobbling, warlords run drugs and the pro-al-Qaeda Taliban have 4,000 to 5,000 active fighters in the country.

It's not just military efforts that are faltering. Five years ago, President Bush launched an experiment in tough-talk diplomacy, warning foreign leaders that they must be with us or against us in the war on terrorism. At first this yielded at least one achievement: Pakistan sent troops for the first time into its wild border regions to root out Taliban and al-Qaeda fighters. But that success has now gone into reverse. Pakistan recently withdrew its soldiers, in effect ceding the border territory to the radicals.

It would be nice if this merely proved that tough talk can backfire. But traditional diplomacy is faring no better. In North Korea and Iran, the United States has tried every diplomatic trick to prevent nuclear proliferation, making common cause with Western Europe, Russia, China and Japan, and wielding both sticks and carrots. The result is failure: North Korea has tested a nuke and Iran still presses on with its enrichment program.

A few years ago, the collapse of Russia's currency triggered a furious debate in Washington over who lost Russia. Now Russia's pro-Western voices are being snuffed out, and Americans are so inured to the limits of their power that they don't even pose that question. A crusading journalist has been killed, and on Thursday Vladimir Putin silenced Human Rights, Amnesty International and more than 90 other foreign organizations. Everyone accepts that there's not much the West can do about this.

In Somalia, a Taliban-style group of Islamic militants has seized part of the country. One of its commanders is said to be sheltering terrorists who blew up the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania: A brand-new terrorist haven may be emerging. Again, it is assumed that the world's sole superpower can't do much but watch.

Three long years ago, the Bush administration described the killing in Darfur as genocide. You might think that an impoverished African state that can't control its own territory would be a pushover. But the Bush administration has tried sanctions, peace talks and United Nations resolutions. Sudan's tin-pot dictator thumbs his nose at Uncle Sam and dispatches more death squads.

When historians analyze the decline of empires, they tend to point to economic frailties that undercut military vigor. Well, the United States has several economic frailties and can't seem to address any of them.

Every honest politician knows that entitlement spending on retirees is going to bust the budget. But since the failure of Bush's proposed Social Security overhaul last year, nobody is doing anything about it.

Every honest politician knows that we need to quit gobbling carbon. But higher gas taxes are seen as a political non-starter on both sides of the political spectrum.

Every honest politician knows that support for globalization is fraying because of rising inequality at home. But how many of them stand up for policies that could reduce inequality without harming growth -- most obviously, tax reform? You don't hear anybody on the left or right denouncing the absurdity that more than half the tax breaks for homeownership flow to the richest 12 percent of households.

In fact, it's hard to name a single creative policy that has political legs in Washington. Is anyone serious about tackling the crazy tort system, which consumes more than a dollar in administrative and legal costs for every dollar it transfers to the victims of malpractice? Nope. Is there any prospect of allowing the millions of immigrants who come here to do so legally? To be honest, not much.

Instead, the right and left are pushing policies that are marginal to the country's problems. The right wants to make its tax cuts "permanent," even though the boomers' retirement ensures that taxes will have to go up. The left wants to raise the minimum wage, even though this can only help a minority of workers.

I'm not predicting the end of the American era, not by a long shot. The U.S. business culture is as pragmatic and effective as its political culture is dysfunctional. But has there been a worse moment for American power since Ronald Reagan celebrated morning in America almost a quarter of a century ago? I can't think of one.

To Stand Or Fall In Baghdad: Capital Is Key To Mission (NYT)

By Michael R. Gordon

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 22 — After three years of trying to thwart a potent insurgency and tamp down the deadly violence in Iraq, the American military is playing its last hand: the Baghdad security plan.

DOJ_NMG_0084859

The plan will be tweaked, adjusted and modified in the weeks ahead, as American commanders try to reverse the dismaying increase in murders, drive-by shootings and bombings.

But military commanders here see no plausible alternative to their bedrock strategy to clear violence-ridden neighborhoods of militias, insurgents and arms caches, hold them with Iraqi and American security forces, and then try to win over the population with reconstruction projects, underwritten mainly by the Iraqi government. There is no fall-back plan that the generals are holding in their hip pocket. This is it.

The Iraqi capital, as the generals like to say, is the center of gravity for the larger American mission in Iraq. Their assessment is that if Baghdad is overwhelmed by sectarian strife, the cause of fostering a more stable Iraq will be lost. Conversely, if Baghdad can be improved, the effects will eventually be felt elsewhere in Iraq. In invading Iraq, American forces started from outside the country and fought their way in. The current strategy is essentially to work from the inside out.

"As Baghdad goes, so goes Iraq," observed Lt. Gen. Peter W. Chiarelli, who commands American forces throughout Iraq.

Many ideas — new and not so new — are being discussed in Washington, like a sectarian division of Iraq (which the current government and many Iraqis oppose); and starting talks with Iraq's neighbor, Iran (which the Iraqi government is already doing, but the United States is not). Some of these ideas look appealing simply because they have not been put to the test.

However the broader strategy may be amended, nothing can work if Baghdad becomes a war-torn Beirut. Baghdad security may not be a sufficient condition for a more stable Iraq, but it is a necessary condition for any alternative plan that does not simply abandon the Iraqis to their fate.

It is hard to see how any Iraq plan can work if the capital's citizens cannot be protected.

The current operation is called Together Forward II, the second phase of an effort begun in July to reduce violence in Baghdad. The name reflects the core assumption that the Iraqi government is to be an equal partner in regaining control of its capital. Necessarily, the security plan requires an integrated political and military approach, since its goal is not to vanquish an enemy on a foreign battlefield but to bring order to a militia-and-insurgent-plagued city.

But the early returns have raised searching questions as to whether the government of Prime Minister Nuri Kamal al-Maliki is truly prepared to tackle the mission.

"It is a decisive period," said Maj. Gen. J. D. Thurman, the commander of the Fourth Infantry Division and the senior commander of the American forces in Baghdad.

"They either seize the opportunity or they don't," he said. "If they don't, then our government is going to have to readjust what we are going to do, and that is not my call."

Since it would take several months to secure and begin reconstruction in the dozen or so strife-ridden neighborhoods that are the focus of the plan, American commanders said the viability of the strategy could not be properly assessed before the year's end. So far, however, the plan has been short on resources as well as results. The Iraqi Defense Ministry has supplied only two of the six Iraqi Army battalions that General Thurman has requested.

That is not just a question of numbers. Some American military officers say they believe the Iraqi Army may be more effective than the Iraq police, and more trusted by local citizens. Yet several Iraqi battalions have deserted rather than follow orders to go to Baghdad, according to American military officials. In the case of these units, summoning them to the Iraqi capital was tantamount to demobilizing them.

Some of the Iraqi police forces the Americans must work with have been infiltrated by militias. One Iraqi National Police unit has already been withdrawn from the streets and a training program has been instituted to improve the others. The Americans are carefully monitoring a number of police stations that they say have made common cause with some of the militias and intend to report them to the Iraqi government.

The original concept behind the plan was that American forces were to hold cleared areas for 60 to 90 days, during which the process of economic reconstruction would begin. Then American forces would turn the sectors over to Iraqi police and army units, freeing up American troops to tackle security challenges elsewhere in the city. Without sufficient Iraqi forces, however, this process has been hampered and it has been more difficult to prevent militias and insurgents from sneaking back into cleared areas.

"What takes the combat power is the holding piece," said General Thurman. "We can do the clearing. But once you clear if you don't leave somebody in there and build civil capacity in there then it is the old mud-hole approach. You know the water runs out of the mud hole when you drive through the mud hole and then it runs back in it."

Delays in Iraqi government programs to improve electrical, sewage, water and health facilities has also hampered the effort. It had been expected that such Iraqi programs would begin before Ramadan, the monthlong holiday that is about to end. But the programs are now projected to start in November. In the absence of large-scale Iraqi programs, the Americans have sponsored some smaller efforts to improve sanitation and repair services, programs that have generated jobs and helped lower the unemployment rate in the city.

While the sectarian violence would be far worse if not for the American efforts, the number of murders in the Baghdad area has not decreased as hoped. Fifty-two bodies were found in General Thurman's sector, which includes Baghdad and large swaths of territory north and south of the city, during the first week of August, when the security operations began. During the week that ended Oct. 14, the body count was 176. For the week that ended Oct. 21, the body count was 143, a noteworthy decline but still more than at the start of the operation.

There are a number of ideas being discussed in private to fix the plan. Americans still hope to receive additional Iraqi Army forces next month. They also hope to persuade the Iraqi government to purge police stations infiltrated by militias. Iraqi deployment areas may also be realigned.

American forces have already shifted some forces to new high-violence sectors and may make further adjustments. Shrinking the military zone controlled by the American Baghdad-based division, which now extends south to the cities of Najaf and Karbala, has also been discussed as a way to increase the density of American troops in the capital.

Erecting more barricades to section off parts of the city has been proposed by some officers. So has legitimizing some neighborhood watch organizations. That idea cuts against the policy to abolish militias but has been advocated by some military officials as a useful expedient.

Keeping the Army's Fourth Division in place in Baghdad instead of rotating it home when it is to be replaced by the First Cavalry Division would substantially increase the number of American troops in the city. But there have been no indications that such an idea is under serious consideration.

In the final analysis, American officers say, much is in Iraqi hands. The American military is looking toward the Maliki government to finally disband the militias and reintegrate them into Iraqi society. It is not clear if the Iraqi government will follow through on such a step since some senior Iraqi officials have said the militias cannot be broken up until the Sunni-based insurgency is brought to heel.

American officials also say that the Iraqi government needs to more strictly enforce bans on the possession of illicit weapons and accelerate its reconstruction and job creation programs.

"Part of our problem is that we want this more than they do," General Thurman said, alluding to the effort to get the Iraqis to put aside sectarian differences and build a unified Iraq. "We need to get people to stop worrying about self and start worrying about Iraq. And that is going to take national unity."

"Until we get that settled I think we are going to struggle," he added.

U.S. Forces Caught In Crossfire On Streets Of 'capital Of Death' (USAT)

By Rick Jervis And Jim Michaels

USA Today, October 23, 2006

BAGHDAD — Before the U.S.-led invasion in 2003, it was one of the nightmare scenarios: a slugfest in Iraq's capital, a sprawl of narrow streets, markets and blind alleys that is home to 6 million people.

More than three years later, the close-quarters fight the United States wanted to avoid is a reality. Rather than fighting Saddam Hussein's army, however, U.S. troops are caught in the crossfire alongside Iraqi forces as both try to take back the city from religion-based militias and death squads, as well as insurgents.

"This is the toughest thing I hope I ever do: fighting a counterinsurgency atop a sectarian conflict," said Col. James Pasquarette, commander of the Army's 1st Brigade Combat Team, positioned northwest of Baghdad.

DOJ_NMG_0084861

The raging battle for Baghdad is looking more like a civil war, even if the U.S. and Iraqi governments avoid using the term. And it is prompting tough questions: Is the Iraqi government up to the job of restoring order? Does the U.S. military need to fundamentally change course to prevail?

President Bush held a videoconference over the weekend with key advisers, including Gen. John Abizaid, head of Central Command; Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld; and Vice President Cheney. The president characterized the meeting as part of an ongoing process.

Bush said the United States is constantly reassessing tactics but won't alter its objective of remaining in Iraq until the country has a stable government capable of maintaining its own security. "Our goal is victory," he said Saturday in his weekly radio address. "What is changing are the tactics we use to achieve that goal."

The administration is being urged to crank up pressure on the government of Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, which has been unable to reach political agreements with warring factions.

Sen. John Warner of Virginia, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, said Sunday that the Iraqi government should support its military in defeating militias. "It is their job — not the U.S. coalition forces' — to subdue and get rid of these private militias," he said on Fox News Sunday. Warner had earlier urged a change in course if Iraq's government can't restore order soon.

The joint U.S.-Iraqi security operation in Baghdad, underway since June, has brought a recent spike in U.S. casualties. On Sunday, the military announced the deaths of four U.S. soldiers, bringing the October total to 83, on pace to be one of the deadliest months of the war. Last week, Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the top U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, acknowledged that the Baghdad offensive was not meeting its objectives of a sustained reduction in violence.

The administration calls the battle for Baghdad the key to Iraq's future. The main obstacles to progress in that fight, according to experts and U.S. officers:

•The lack of a political deal to disarm militias has allowed religious violence to grow.

•Urban warfare neutralizes the American military's edge in technology and firepower.

•Iraqi security forces vary in quality and loyalty and may not be ready for a battle of this intensity.

The battle for the capital is a fight the United States cannot afford to lose. "If you don't win in Baghdad, you can't win in the rest of the country," said Thomas X. Hammes, author of The Sling and the Stone: On War in the 21st Century.

The U.S. government has pushed al-Maliki, a Shiite Muslim, to strike political agreements to disarm the militias, many of which are Shiite forces with ties to him and others in government. That would reduce the amount of violence American soldiers face and isolate any remaining militants.

"You will never have enough troops to secure a city this big" without reaching a political deal, said Anthony Cordesman, an analyst with the Washington-based Center for Strategic and International Studies.

Al-Maliki told USA TODAY in a recent interview that he needs more time to reach agreement with militia groups. Some Iraqi commanders, however, say the government has interfered with security operations to protect its friends.

Maj. Hussein al-Qaisi, a battalion commander with the 1st Brigade, 6th Iraqi Army Division, says he often gets phone calls from government officials when he arrests suspected high-ranking militia leaders, both Sunni and Shiite.

"Sometimes they'll back them up no matter what," said al-Qaisi, whose unit is in northwest Baghdad. "We have to let them go."

Military action has stopped the violence in some pockets but won't bring a sustained peace, said U.S. Army Lt. Col. David Thompson, a commander based near Baghdad. "We have a political situation that needs decisive action."

U.S.-led raids often must be approved in advance by Iraqi leaders. This month, a unit in Baghdad got a tip about a torture chamber for Shiite death squads, but a planned raid needed clearance from the Iraqi side, said Capt. Kevin Salge, a company commander whose unit received the tip.

Several days passed before approval came through. By the time U.S. troops conducted a nighttime raid on the two-story building, it was largely abandoned, he said.

The absence of a political settlement between Shiites and Sunnis forces U.S. officers to negotiate with the warring factions.

DOJ_NMG_0084862

Thompson spends much of his time traveling in armored convoys from one tribal sheik to the next, urging them to put a stop to the sectarian killings.

One recent morning, he met with leaders of the Sunni Marawi tribe, whose members he believes are lobbing mortars into Shiite areas. Later that afternoon, he met with a leader of the Tamimi tribe, which he suspects has members in Shiite death squads.

Brig. Gen. David Halverson, deputy commander of U.S. forces in and around Baghdad, said there are signs of progress. In the week ending Oct. 19, there were 519 attacks in the city, down from 624 the previous week.

This month, Iraqi and U.S. forces detained 600 suspects and killed or wounded 100 in fighting with insurgents or militias.

"We're taking these people down," Halverson said.

There are nearly 60,000 U.S. and allied forces in Baghdad. That includes 15,400 American troops, 9,500 Iraqi soldiers and 34,600 national and local police.

The loyalty and skills of the Iraqi forces in Baghdad vary. Some army units are dependable, but police, who often live in the areas they patrol, can be reluctant to take on local militias.

Getting local police to respond aggressively against militias has been a challenge, Pasquarette said. He has ordered that letters, in Arabic, be sent to every police officer and official in his area, warning: If you don't combat militias, you'll be fired. If you're found to be supporting them, you'll be detained.

"To fight these extrajudicial killings effectively, we need to be embedded, almost one to one, with the Iraqi security forces," said Sgt. 1st Class Jeff Nelson, an intelligence analyst with the U.S. Army's 1st Battalion, 23rd Infantry Regiment, based in Baghdad. "We need to watch their every move."

In Hurriyah, a neighborhood in northwestern Baghdad, sectarian violence has been hard to fight because the area is controlled by the Mahdi Army, a Shiite militia loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr.

Members of al-Sadr's militia have targeted prominent families — Sunnis and Shiites — and taken over their businesses and offices, Nelson said. Mahdi Army members have also infiltrated the local police.

"They've infiltrated every branch of public service and every political office they could get their hands on," Nelson said. "As soon as the U.S. leaves, they'll be able to dominate the area with key citizens, key positions, key offices. They'll pretty much have the lay of the land."

The Mahdi Army is brutal in pursuit of its goals, Nelson said. Large red X's are painted on the sides of houses the militia wants vacated, he said. Residents know they have a few days to leave before their houses are firebombed.

The Mahdi Army has used the tactic to clear entire clans from neighborhoods and to empty the neighborhoods of rivals, he said.

Riyad al-Nouri, a member of al-Sadr's political organization, denied involvement by al-Sadr loyalists in such strong-arm tactics and said the cleric has denounced religious killings. "These accusations are false and aimed at ruining this great movement," he said.

Shiite attacks are countered by Sunni groups. The mutilated bodies of their victims are usually discovered in the area's trash-strewn soccer field, Nelson said.

The bodies often show signs of torture, he said. Some bodies are booby-trapped. Few have ID.

Without the ability to identify victims, it's difficult for investigators to piece crimes together. When U.S. forces get intelligence on a death squad or killing, plans for raids are often shared with Iraq's security forces, leading to leaks and blown operations, Nelson said.

Nelson said his battalion investigated 40 sectarian killings and collected 57 bodies in a recent week. None led to an arrest, he said. "Sometimes we have a feeling of complete hopelessness," he said.

Capt. Alan Renazco, a fire support officer for another unit, said troops are often asked to hunt down death squads and insurgents — but avoid being overly aggressive — to gather evidence to later a convict a suspect. "We're not trained in this. We're not cops," he said. "We just want them to settle down long enough to get out of here."

City fighting is among the toughest combat. "The urban environment gives (insurgents) an advantage," said Conrad Crane, co-author of the Army's new counterinsurgency manual. "It negates some of our technological advantages."

"You can go out to some of these neighborhoods, and there will be kids out there running around, there will be hundreds of people on the street, there will be shops open," said Col. Michael Beech, commander of the 4th Brigade Combat Team in Baghdad. "Then you'll turn the corner, and a IED will go off," he said, referring to an improvised explosive device, or roadside bomb.

It's difficult to target an enemy mixed in with civilians. "We are very concerned about collateral damage," said Lt. Col. Steve Stover, spokesman for U.S. forces in Baghdad. "That could turn the mood of the city against us.... We're in the enemy's backyard."

It's a close-combat fight in which American and Iraqi forces can rarely rely on artillery or air attacks. Over the weekend, coalition forces captured a sniper operating with a high-powered scope. He had a hole in the trunk of his car so he could target U.S. and Iraqi troops without being spotted. He had a video camera mounted in the back window of the vehicle, Halverson said.

Halverson said coalition forces have recently deployed counter-sniper teams. They are trained to search for enemy marksmen who have their pick of hiding places in neighborhoods they know well.

Civilians caught in the middle say violence has been brought closer to them than anytime since the collapse of Saddam's regime.

Farah al-Beady, a 32-year-old government employee, said he and his family go out only when necessary and stay close to home. "I have not seen my 69-year-old mother in months," he said.

"The civil war that everyone was afraid of is getting started," said Hammes, a retired Marine colonel.

Hussein Kari, 36, said he spends much of his free time in front of the computer. "The Internet keeps me connected with the outside world," he said. "Baghdad has become the capital of death."

On Duty At The Alamo (NSWK)

By Christian Caryl

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Officially its name is Forward Operating Base Hope, but the 25 Americans who are stationed there call it something else: "the Alamo." Just south of their fortress is Sadr City, the immense Baghdad slum controlled by Moqtada al-Sadr and his private Mahdi Army. Although the firebrand Shiite cleric has denied any involvement in violence against the Sunnis, his stronghold has become a sanctuary for sectarian death squads. If the neighborhood boils over—as it has twice before, in 2004—millions of furious Iraqis will be standing between the Alamo's residents and the nearest U.S. reinforcements, five miles across town. The base's U.S. commander, Capt. David Baer, says he's not worried. "The militants in Sadr City don't want to fight," he says. "They'd get wiped out."

Even if he's right, how long can the truce last? In an effort to stop the death squads, American units have been struggling to assert control over key Shiite neighborhoods around Baghdad. U.S. casualties have jumped accordingly. In the past few weeks, Americans throughout Iraq have been dying at rates not seen since the battles of Najaf and Fallujah in 2004. Meanwhile the sectarian carnage keeps deepening in and around the capital. "We're obviously very concerned about what we're seeing in the city," Maj. Gen. William Caldwell, the senior U.S. military spokesman in Iraq, acknowledged last week. "We're taking a lot of time to go back and look at the whole Baghdad security plan."

The review may prove useless. Even as they create new study groups and ask what has gone wrong, senior officers at the Pentagon say privately that they have already tried every possible strategy. Two years ago, when there were 150,000 U.S. troops in Iraq and effectively zero Iraqi forces, the expectation was that once the Iraqis were trained up, security would improve. Now there are 140,000 Americans and 130,000 Iraqi troops, and parts of the country—Baghdad among them—are worse off than ever. No one knows what to do about it. "There is no plan B," says one senior Pentagon official, not wanting his name on such a gloomy assessment. U.S. military leaders are increasingly worried that their troops' sacrifices are only enabling Iraq's politicians to duck the tough calls necessary to save Iraq from civil war.

U.S. forces at the Alamo share that frustration. They're supposed to be training a group of 750 Iraqi Army recruits and their officers, but Americans throughout the training system are forced to devote much of their energy and attention to weeding out the bad ones rather than grooming the good ones. About three quarters of the Alamo's Iraqi recruits and officers are natives of Sadr

City—meaning they're closely tied, through family and friendship, to the same Shiite militias that are spreading terror and death across much of the capital. A few weeks ago the Americans discovered that someone with a mobile phone had placed a direct call from inside the base to al-Sadr's headquarters. Now the Americans are collecting the Iraqis' phones at the Alamo's gates.

Unauthorized calls are the least of it. Two weeks ago U.S. and Iraqi troops detained one of the Alamo trainees' senior Iraqi officers for an apparent case of ethnic cleansing in Baghdad's upscale Mansour district. The officer had allegedly "borrowed" two Humvees and seven U.S.-trained Iraqi troops for the task, which he claimed had been ordered by a senior government official. "Everything we've worked for to give people freedoms is being rolled back by the militias," says Lt. Zeroy Lawson, the Alamo's intelligence officer.

The Americans' problems would be bad enough if the militias' tentacles stopped there. Last week U.S. troops captured Sheik Mazen al-Saedi, a senior member of al-Sadr's political organization, on suspicion of fomenting sectarian killings. They freed him the next day on the direct orders of Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki. Al-Sadr and his organization are among the pillars of Maliki's government—the government U.S. troops are trying to protect. "We're operating as guests in this country," General Caldwell explained. "Any kind of ... limits that the prime minister wants to impose upon us, we need to abide by. I mean, this is his nation, after all. It's not ours."

Another core U.S. mission—winning Iraqi hearts and minds—is imperiled by a new threat: snipers. Some of the deadliest of the bunch are operating in the Shiite-dominated areas east of the Tigris River, where the Mahdi Army has been broadening its control. Since late August, American forces have repeatedly found themselves under sudden attack from unseen gunmen armed with high-powered Russian-made sniper rifles. The shooters fire a single shot at long range and melt away into the cityscape before they can be caught. In at least one incident, the sniper used a silencer. "Now it's on everyone's mind," says Capt. Jason Meisel, an intel officer with a unit patrolling directly adjacent to Sadr City. "It's on my mind when I leave the wire. Snipers create fear. That's the whole point of snipers. It's about stopping us from talking to the people."

The tactic is showing results. U.S. units in Baghdad have begun patrolling in heavily armored Bradley fighting vehicles instead of Humvees, and soldiers have learned to jog, not walk, in open areas, constantly scanning the rooftops. It's no way to inspire confidence among the locals, who are desperate for protection. If the Americans can't promise them security, the militias are glad to step in. Iraq's security forces are just as fearful. "My cousins, my neighbors, they're in the militia," says an Iraqi soldier at FOB Hope, declining to be named. "If they find out I'm working here, they'll kill me." If this is hope, God save us from despair.

5 Ways To Prevent Iraq From Getting Even Worse (TIME)

By Aparisim Ghosh

Time, October 23, 2006

It's a grim signÂ of the chaosÂ engulfing Iraq today that trying to save your family can put them in even more danger. That's what happened to Ammar Jawad, a Shi'ite in Baghdad, who this month moved his wife and two children to Balad, an hour's drive north of the violence-racked capital. He figured his family would be safer in Balad, a Shi'ite-majority town--until the war went there too. A week after Jawad's family arrived in Balad, a couple of Sunnis were killed in a suburb. Sunnis in a neighboring town retaliated by killing a dozen Shi'ite laborers. The Shi'ites then called in militias from Baghdad, and they went on a rampage in and around Balad. By the time U.S. troops finally stanched the bloodbath last week, nearly 100 people had died. Now Iraqis like Jawad, whose real name has been changed to protect his identity, are wondering if there's anywhere to go. "Even if I can get them out of Balad, where can I hope to send them next?" he asks. "What is the use in making any plans?"

There are no good options left in Iraq. To those who have lived through the daily carnage wrought by organized criminals, sectarian militias and jihadist terrorists, the idea that the U.S. can prevent a full-scale civil war--let alone transform Iraq into a stable democracy--has been dead for months. The main question is, How long will it take for military officials in Iraq and policymakers in Washington to concede that the whole enterprise is closer to failure than success? Midway through what is already one of the deadliest months this year, the U.S. military's spokesman in Baghdad, Major General William B. Caldwell IV, last week called the persistence of sectarian violence in Baghdad "disheartening" and acknowledged that the three-month-old U.S. campaign to take back the city has gone nowhere. That verdict added to rising clamor for an overhaul of the U.S.'s strategy in Iraq. In recent weeks, senior Republicans, like Virginia Senator John Warner, chairman of the Armed Services Committee, have said the Bush Administration should insist that the Iraqi government demonstrate progress by the end of the year or face a change of course by the U.S. Foreign policy hands in both parties are hoping that the Iraq Study Group, co-chaired by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III and Lee H. Hamilton, a former Democratic Representative from Indiana, will provide the White House with the political cover to abandon its now quixotic goals of creating democracy in Iraq in favor of a more limited focus on establishing enough stability to allow U.S. troops to leave without catastrophic consequences. "You can't sugarcoat that. The Iraq situation's not winnable in any meaningful sense of the word. What the U.S. needs to do now is look for a way to limit the losses and the costs," Richard Haass, president of the Council on Foreign Relations and a former member of the Administration's foreign policy team, said last week. The question, Haass added, is "how poorly it's going to end up."

It's not just the politicians who are reassessing the U.S.'s options in Iraq. General Peter Pace, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, has ordered a group of young officers to review the military's strategy in Iraq and ask tough questions. Pace is pursuing the underlying riddle: Why are there almost as many U.S. troops in Iraq now as there were two years ago when, in the interim, more than 300,000 Iraqi security forces have been recruited and trained? Pace, according to an officer familiar with the process, wants to know, What's wrong with this picture?

So what can still be done? Despite the consensus of gloom--Bush told ABC News last week that the violence in Baghdad "could be" compared to the Tet offensive in Vietnam in 1968-69, which helped turn many Americans against that war--few Iraqi or U.S. officials believe an immediate withdrawal is wise or likely. But paralysis could be worse. So the focus is on finding ways to bring violence down to a sustainable level, after which the U.S. can begin to extricate itself from the mess. At this late date, there's nothing the U.S. or the Iraqi government can do to stop the bleeding altogether. Iraq's most pressing problems may still take years to resolve. But quick and decisive action in a few key areas could at least help slow the inexorable descent into anarchy. Here are five of them:

I

CLEAN OUT THE ROGUES

The Bush Administration's strategy has hinged on standing up credible Iraqi security forces to take over responsibility for the country's security. So far there are 311,000 U.S.-trained Iraqi soldiers and police, of varying capabilities. While that's close to the goal of 325,000, the real problem is less about quantity than loyalty. To anybody paying attention, it's clear that the security forces, broadly divided between the police under the Interior Ministry and the army under the Defense Ministry, are the main vectors of the widening civil war. The bureaucracies and the fighters have been infiltrated by militias, notably the Mahdi Army of Shi'ite radical cleric Muqtada al-Sadr and the Iran-backed Badr Organization, affiliated with the dominant party in the Shi'ite coalition that controls parliament. Many policemen and soldiers are more loyal to their sect leaders and militia bosses than to the Iraqi government. In Baghdad, for instance, many police vehicles and Interior Ministry offices bear stickers and posters of al-Sadr. Sunni victims of sectarian violence routinely accuse the police and army of looking the other way when the militias unleash havoc--or worse, joining in the killing.

Until recently, the government has ignored such allegations, suggesting that the victims were deceived by insurgents masquerading as cops or soldiers. But in the past few weeks, Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki's government has acknowledged that some elements of the security forces have gone rogue. An entire police brigade was suspended this month on grounds that officers were indulging in sectarian or criminal activities, and the Interior Ministry claimed it fired some 3,000 employees and removed from their posts two top police generals.

But that doesn't go far enough. Al-Maliki says the security forces will continue to recruit from the ranks of the militias--leaving ordinary Iraqis feeling that one set of bad cops and soldiers will simply be replaced by another. The only option is for the U.S. to press al-Maliki to abandon his plans to absorb the militias into the security forces, slow down recruitment and set up a screening process to prevent militiamen from infiltrating the ranks. And cops suspected of abuses can't merely be fired. "If these officers and policemen have been guilty of sectarian crimes, they should be in jail and not in the street where they can commit more crimes," says political analyst Tahseen al-Shekhli. "Otherwise, the message al-Maliki sends to every policeman is, 'There is no punishment for killing Sunnis.'"

DEAL WITH AL-SADR

Since the Feb. 22 destruction of a majorÂ Shi'ite shrine in Samarra, the Mahdi Army, al-Sadr's black-clad private militia, has been on the warpath against Sunnis, especially in and around Baghdad. Once driven by anti-Americanism--the Mahdi Army fought pitched battles against U.S. troops in 2004--the militias are fired by a determination to avenge centuries of Sunni oppression. Often with the connivance of the Iraqi security forces, marauding gangs professing loyalty to al-Sadr have killed or kidnapped thousands--not only Sunnis but also Shi'ites who don't subscribe to their radical version of the faith. Al-Sadr's truculence has become increasingly destabilizing. Last week, just days after he met with al-Maliki to discuss an end to sectarian killings, al-Sadr's men battled police and a rival Shi'ite militia and briefly seized control of the southern city of Amarah.

In public, the U.S. military says al-Sadr--who controls a sizable block of parliament--is a major political figure and must be treated accordingly; in media briefings, even al-Sadr's name and that of his militia are studiously avoided. Privately, however, American commanders say they would like the shackles taken off just long enough to deliver some blows against the Mahdi Army. It wouldn't be simple: a full-frontal assault on heavily populated Sadr City isn't a smart option, and a senior U.S. intelligence officer says that "Sadr himself has a diminished ability to command and control his forces." But the U.S. may still be able to do some good by hacking away at those elements of the Mahdi Army responsible for the worst sectarian atrocities and criminal activities. Doing so, however, would require more steel from the al-Maliki government. After the U.S. arrested a top al-Sadr operative in Baghdad last week, a man they described as "the alleged leader of a murder and kidnapping cell" in east Baghdad, the Prime Minister emerged from a meeting with al-Sadr in Najaf to order the man's release.

BRING THE SUNNIS BACK

Yes, that's beenÂ tried, but much of theÂ hard slog U.S. Ambassador Zalmay Khalilzad put in last winter to bring the Sunnis into the political process was undone last month when Shi'ite and Kurdish parties forced through legislation that brings Iraq closer to a partitioned state, which Sunnis fear would leave them without access to the country's main resource, oil. "The Shi'ites and Kurds used their combined parliamentary majority to bully the Sunnis," says a Western diplomat in Baghdad. "They need to understand that a big part of democracy is about reassuring the minority that its worst fears won't be realized."

Sunni parties boycotted the vote on the federalism bill and are threatening to withdraw from the all-party government. The risk is that more Sunnis will join the insurgency, which is being driven by extremist jihadis who have taken over parts of western Iraq. The Mujahedin Shura Council, an umbrella of jihadist groups that includes al-Qaeda's Iraqi wing, last week announced the formation of an Islamic state in "the Sunni provinces of Iraq." Scores of white-clad jihadis staged a brazen show of force in several towns in Anbar province. Although the majority of Sunnis want no part of an Islamic state run by jihadis, they may feel they have no option if the political process seems rigged against them.

One option, says the Western diplomat, is to use U.S. leverage with the Kurds to "get them to stop pushing the Sunnis into a corner." That would isolate the Shi'ites, who won't have a large enough majority in parliament to pass legislation. Khalilzad can draw on the fact that the Kurds, although committed to their own autonomy, owe their very existence to American arms. And the growing number of jihadist attacks on Kirkuk, a northern city coveted by the Kurds for its rich oil deposits, shows that they too stand to lose by radicalizing the Sunnis.

WAKE UP THE NEIGHBORS

Since Syria and Iran areÂ a big part ofÂ Iraq's problems--Damascus shelters and funds Sunni insurgents; Tehran arms and trains Shi'ite militias--they will have to be a big part of any solution. That has always been clear in Baghdad, where leaders like President Jalal Talabani maintain that the U.S. needs to engage Iraq's neighbors in some sort of dialogue, through unofficial channels if no other options exist. Talabani told the BBC last week that "if Iran and Syria were involved, it will be the beginning of the end of terrorism and securing Iraq within months."

But talks with either country remain anathema to the Bush Administration, which has consistently accused Syria of harboring terrorists and is currently engaged in a war of words with Iran over its nuclear program. "We'd be very happy for them not to foment terror," White House spokesman Tony Snow said last week. "But it certainly doesn't change our diplomatic stance toward either." Given the U.S.'s predicament, the Administration needs all the help it can get in Iraq. "Dialogue is what everybody does--enemies and friends," says former Marine General Anthony Zinni, a former chief of the U.S. Central Command. "It's neither good nor bad."

Haass, who served both President Bushes, says that despite the Administration's current reluctance, the U.S. will eventually find itself in such dire straits that it won't have much choice but to engage Syria and Iran. "We don't have the luxury of not talking with Iran about Iraq simply because we disagree with Iran about other things," Haass says flatly. "I believe that as a rule of thumb we make a mistake when we set preconditions for negotiations. What matters in a negotiation is not where you begin, but where you end up."

GET TOUGH. THEN GET OUT

Given the breakdown ofÂ security inÂ much of Baghdad and western Iraq, military commanders won't contemplate an imminent reduction in the number of U.S. troops in Iraq--which is holding steady at 140,000. And although some hawks, like Arizona Senator John McCain, advocate sending more troops in the short term, the Bush Administration--and the public--hasn't signaled any inclination to do so.

Even at current troop levels, U.S. forces may be able to bring the violence down to a more tolerable level. As the insurgency has intensified, many U.S. units have gone into "force protection" mode: going outside the wire only when a situation has reached crisis proportions and there's little they can do to set things right. That's the scenario that unfolded in Balad last week, when U.S. forces stood on the sidelines despite calls by Sunni leaders for them to intervene against the Shi'ite death squads. Some top commanders would instead like to see the U.S. military adopt more aggressive counterinsurgency tactics. For instance, rather than confine most troops to a few large bases on the outskirts of urban centers, the commanders advocate setting up smaller "patrol bases" near volatile neighborhoods. Those would give U.S. troops a higher profile--which is in itself a deterrent against violence--and allow them to respond more swiftly to trouble.

In Baghdad, the Americans have increased their patrolling in the city, but they are rarely on hand to prevent Shi'ite militias or Sunni insurgents from strafing a neighborhood or snatching people from the streets. Setting up more patrol bases in Baghdad could allow for surprise swoops and a more rapid response to crises.

But the corollary to a more aggressive posture is that as U.S. troops grow more visible, the insurgents will have greater incentive to keep fighting, which would inevitably lead to higher U.S. casualties. Although the military says it can withstand even the heavy toll it has suffered this month, many officers, as well as lawmakers from both parties, acknowledge that the unabated sacrifice of American life will eventually exhaust what public support remains for the war. At the Pentagon, officers are discussing withdrawal schemes. The question at this point may simply come down to how rapidly it's done. "We're all waiting for Nov. 7," says a senior officer, referring to Election Day in the U.S. "We know things have to change, but it needs to be reasonable. They can't just want us to bail out immediately. That would be ugly."

If all of theseÂ prescriptions were applied, would they make a difference? It's possible, but only if taken together. The Iraqi security forces can't be cleaned up unless the U.S. is prepared to face down al-Sadr--and it can accomplish neither of these tasks unless American commanders are allowed to be more aggressive on the ground. And no political solution is possible unless the Sunnis stay in the tent and the Iranians and Syrians agree to stay out of it.

Equally plausible, however, is the prospect that none of these steps will work, taken separately or together. Among independent analysts in Iraq and Washington, there is a growing skepticism about prescriptions of any kind. "No mix of options for U.S. action can provide a convincing plan for victory in Iraq," wrote Anthony Cordesman of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in a recent paper. "The initiative has passed into Iraqi hands. There are no 'silver bullets' that can quickly rescue this situation." Saving Iraq, if it's still possible, won't happen without more blood and heartbreak--among Americans as well as Iraqis like Ammar Jawad. His family survived the bloodletting in Balad, and Jawad is leaning toward leaving his family there. He says he has "given up believing things will be better anywhere in Iraq." It will be a long time before Iraqis like him will be persuaded otherwise--no matter when the U.S. goes. With reporting by With reporting by Sally B. "We're Not Looking For An Exit Strategy. We're Looking For Victory." (TIME)

By Mike Allen, James Carney

Time, October 30, 2006

In the sitting room of his official residence last Wednesday, Vice President Dick Cheney sat down with TIME's Mike Allen and James Carney for a rare print interview. Excerpts:

â€¢What do you think a Democratic Congress would be like?

I don't expect that to happen. I'm optimistic that we're going to hold both the House and the Senate. One of the things I talk about on the campaign trail is the importance of what we've been able to do with tax policy. How our changes in tax policy--especially in '03--stimulated a recovery that's generated 6.6 million new jobs. Just today, the Dow broke through the 12,000 mark, first time ever for the Dow Jones industrial. I think a lot of that goes back to what we were able to do with cutting taxes on investments, on dividends and cap gains and so forth. All of that is at risk if there were to be a Democratic Congress.

â€¢How badly do you think the Mark Foley scandal has hurt Republican candidates?

I don't think it's hurt our candidates generally. Obviously, it's a terrible situation. I think appropriate action has been taken. Investigations are under way to find out what happened. The place where it's likely to have an impact, clearly, would be in Foley's district. But beyond that, I don't sense that it's the kind of issue that has an impact on Wyoming or California or Texas.

â€¢How long do you think it will be before the average American sees going to Iraq as a good idea?

I think that will all depend upon the final outcome. It's difficult for people to judge week to week. I think we've done the right thing. I think we're doing the right thing now. I firmly believe that. The President firmly believes it. I think the world is better off with Saddam Hussein in jail, on trial, than in power. Right next door today in Iran you've got Mr. Ahmadinejad off and running trying to develop nuclear weapons. The only thing that would be more volatile is if you also had Saddam Hussein trying to develop nuclear weapons in Baghdad. Establishing a democratic government, getting rid of the old regime, closing down a major state sponsor of terror, shutting off Saddam Hussein's practice of making payments to the families of suicide bombers--we've done good work to get this far. We've got more to do. It's going to be tough to finish the task, but I think it's very important that we complete the task.

â€¢Do you think that in your lifetime going to Iraq will be widely seen as visionary?

I do. I don't see any way you can argue, for example, that what happens in Iraq isn't going to have an impact on Musharraf in Pakistan or Karzai in Afghanistan. The key to a workable strategy in that part of the world against al-Qaeda, and the Islamic radicals that we're at war with, is to get the locals into the fight. They've got to take responsibility for their own governments, for their own security. That's what's happened in Afghanistan and in Pakistan, where having them working with us in the intelligence arena to capture and kill al-Qaeda has been absolutely essential. Same thing in Saudi Arabia.

If we were to do what some of the Democrats want, withdraw from Iraq, you could imagine what happens to a man like Karzai or Musharraf, who in effect puts his life on the line every day when he goes to work; the hundreds of thousands of men in Afghanistan and Iraq who signed on for the security forces to fight on our side, in effect, against the evil ones; the overall attitude of the millions of people in Afghanistan and Iraq who have gone to the polls and risked their own lives in order to vote and participate in newly created democracies, and suddenly the United States says, Well, gee, it's too tough in Iraq, we're going home. You cannot separate out Iraq from that broader global war on terror. Bin Laden has made the point repeatedly that Iraq is now the central front in the war on terror.

â€¢But hasn't he made that point because we're there? If we weren't there, would he be making that point?

The fact of the matter is we are there, and it is the central struggle at this point. The terrorists' only strategy is to break our will. They can't beat us in a stand-up fight. They never have. They go back, and they cite evidence of Beirut in 1983 and Somalia in 1993, when they killed Americans and then Americans withdrew. They think we don't have the stomach for the fight. For us to do what the Democrats--some Democrats--have suggested in Iraq would simply validate that strategy, would simply say to al-Qaeda, You're right. And all it would do is encourage more of the same.

â€¢Isn't what's happening in Iraq, though, not about al-Qaeda principally but about sectarian war?

There's no question that there is sectarian violence now, but remember how we got to sectarian violence: al-Qaeda. That was their strategy: to kill Shia until they could generate some kind of a response. And the lesson we should have learned with 9/11 is that there may have been a time in our history when we could withdraw behind our borders and be safe and secure here at home. That day passed on 9/11. When we saw the damage that a handful of men could do--trained in the remote training camps of Afghanistan, aided and abetted by a planning cell in Hamburg, Germany, and ending up here killing 3,000 Americans that morning--and when we think of the ultimate threat of deadlier weapons than they had that day, the idea that we can turn our back on the Middle East and walk away from a state that could conceivably become a safe haven for terrorists or another area where they can train and plot and plan, that went out the window on 9/11.

â€¢There's a lot of talk that the Iraq Study Group led by James Baker will provide the Administration after the election with an exit strategy from Iraq.

I know what the President thinks. I know what I think. And we're not looking for an exit strategy. We're looking for victory. And victory will be the day when the Iraqis solve their political problems and are up and running with respect to their own government, and when they're able to provide for their own security. How we get to that objective is what we need to keep in mind. Our strategy hasn't changed. Our tactics change from time to time, and they have to adapt and adjust. We're eager to have thoughts and ideas from experienced people in terms of how we can move forward, in having the Baker-Hamilton group go put fresh eyes on the problem and take a look at it.

â€¢If you had to take back any one thing you've said about Iraq, what would it be?

I thought that the elections that we went through in '05 would have had a bigger impact on the level of violence than they have, I guess. I expressed the sentiment some time ago that I thought we were over the hump in terms of violence. I think that was premature.

â€¢Do you think we'll have a military draft in your lifetime?

I don't believe so. I'm a great believer in the all-volunteer force. It produces a very, very high-caliber military. People are serving because they want to serve. We preserve the Selective Service system in the event there were to be some catastrophic conflict that would require putting [nearly] 20 million people in uniform like we did in World War II, but I don't foresee at this stage the likelihood of that.

â€¢Now that you're a wartime Vice President, do you regret not having served in the military?

No. I don't go back and look at those decisions. I've spent a lot of time over the years on these issues. But I'm 65. I'd like to go back and do it all over again, but I made the choices I made.

â€¢In light of the North Korean tests, is the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty [NPT] system in trouble?

So far, I would say I've been generally pleased with the way in which the international community has come together in the last week or two after the test by North Korea. The Chinese have been vital in that process, and I think they've undergone a significant transformation in terms of how they look at the problem. The ultimate test, though, will be whether or not we can complete the task of the denuclearization, if you will, of the Korean peninsula and also get the Iranians to come into compliance with their obligations under the NPT and give up their aspirations to build nuclear weapons.

â€¢Why not run for President? You're younger than John McCain.

I've got a lot of miles on me. [Laughs.]

â€¢What do you think you and Mrs. Cheney will do after you leave office?

I don't have any idea. I'll be 68. I still have a few good years left, and I expect we'll spend time with family. Still got a lot of rivers I haven't fished.

Intel: What The Brits Said (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

The CIA won't say so, but the U.K. initially opposed war in Iraq. A new book by Tyler Drumheller, former chief of the CIA's European ops, describes how, the day after 9/11, a "powerful delegation from a very close European ally" visited CIA Director George Tenet at HQ. In his book "On the Brink," Drumheller says the foreign-team leader said "his government stood by us ... and that we could count on it for any and all support." But the foreign rep cautioned, "I hope we can all agree that we should concentrate on Afghanistan and not be tempted to launch any attacks on Iraq." In Drumheller's account, Tenet replied, "Absolutely, we all agree on that."

DOJ_NMG_0084870

Who was this "close European ally"? That's classified, says the CIA. According to a footnote in Drumheller's book: "The nationality of the visiting delegation in this chapter and other details of what the author witnessed of that event have been masked under CIA secrecy requirements." But two former intel officials tell NEWSWEEK the foreign delegation was British, led by spy chief Richard Dearlove and David Manning, the national-security adviser. A U.K. source, who, like the former intel officials, requested anonymity due to diplomatic sensitivities, acknowledged that the delegation did visit Tenet on Sept. 12, 2001, and confirmed it was the U.K.'s position at the time that the U.S. should not attack Iraq. One of the other officials acknowledged the meeting but said Iraq was not discussed. CIA spokesman Paul Gimigliano said, "The agency does not publicly discuss its relations with foreign intelligence organizations."

State Dept. Official Apologizes For Criticism Of Iraq Policy (NYT)

By Neela Banerjee

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 22 — A senior State Department official apologized Sunday night for saying that the United States had acted with “arrogance” and “stupidity” in its campaign in Iraq.

The apology from Alberto Fernandez, director of the office of press and public diplomacy in the Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs in Washington, involved a comment that he had made during an interview conducted in Arabic and broadcast Saturday on Al Jazeera, the Arab television network.

In the 35-minute interview, Mr. Fernandez, who speaks Arabic fluently, said, “History will decide what role the United States played.” According to a translation by CNN, he said that while the United States had tried its best, its role might be criticized by future historians “because undoubtedly there was arrogance and stupidity from the United States in Iraq.” Other news sources have translated the remarks in a similar way.

After news of the remarks spread Sunday, American officials said they did not reflect the administration’s views. “I can only assume his remarks must have been mistranslated,” said a senior administration official, who was not authorized to speak for attribution. “Those comments obviously don’t reflect our position.”

In a statement released Sunday night by the State Department, Mr. Fernandez said:

“Upon reading the transcript of my appearance on Al Jazeera, I realized that I seriously misspoke by using the phrase ‘There has been arrogance and stupidity by the U.S. in Iraq.’ This represents neither my views, or those of the State Department. I apologize.”

Mr. Fernandez has a reputation for outspokenness that predates his comments to Al Jazeera. Though he is responsible for getting top State Department officials into the Arab news media, he has given dozens of interviews himself, he told Newsweek in a profile published in August. His popularity in the Arab news media has been bolstered by his command of Arabic and his willingness to speak passionately about issues.

Mr. Fernandez’s interview on Al Jazeera came at the end of a week when the American military command conceded that it had failed to quell violence in Baghdad, despite a two-month offensive, and fighting between and within religious sects rocked several Iraqi cities. His opinions may open him to criticism from supporters of the Bush administration’s policies in Iraq. But some Iraqi lawmakers welcomed the remarks.

Mahmoud Othman, a Kurdish lawmaker, said more American officials should be willing to be self-critical about missteps in Iraq. “I have been expecting American officials, someday, last year, this year, to say something about this, that this policy has not worked,” Mr. Othman said. “It has been a failure. They should admit it before it is too late.”

Envoy Sorry For Iraq 'Stupidity' Comment (AP)

AP, October 23, 2006

A senior U.S. diplomat apologized Sunday night for saying U.S. policy in Iraq displayed "arrogance" and "stupidity."

A day after his remarks in an interview were broadcast by the pan-Arab satellite channel Al-Jazeera, Alberto Fernandez issued a written apology through the State Department press office.

DOJ_NMG_0084871

"Upon reading the transcript of my appearance on Al-Jazeera, I realized that I seriously misspoke by using the phrase 'there has been arrogance and stupidity' by the U.S. in Iraq," said Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in State's Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs.

"This represents neither my views nor those of the State Department," Fernandez added. "I apologize."

U.S. officials had sought to play down Fernandez' assessment of the security situation in Iraq.

State Department spokesman Sean McCormack told reporters Saturday that Fernandez said after the broadcast he didn't think reports of his comments were an "accurate reflection of what he said." Asked whether the Bush administration believed that history will show a record of arrogance or stupidity in Iraq, McCormack replied, "No."

Fernandez spoke in fluent Arabic in the interview, which Al-Jazeera said was taped in Washington on Friday. His remarks were translated into English by The Associated Press.

Fernandez also said Washington was ready to talk with any Iraqi group except al-Qaida in Iraq to facilitate national reconciliation.

15 Police Recruits Killed In Iraq; U.S. Death Toll For October Hits 83 (WP)

By John Ward Anderson

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 22 -- At least 15 Iraqi police recruits were killed Sunday when two buses taking them to Baghdad were ambushed by insurgents north of the capital, a local police official said. Twenty-five recruits were injured in the attack, and 20 others were kidnapped, he said.

The U.S. military on Sunday announced the deaths of four soldiers and a Marine, bringing the number of U.S. troops killed in Iraq this month to 83 -- the highest monthly toll since 84 U.S. troops were killed in November 2005. Attacks against U.S. and Iraqi forces in Baghdad have increased 43 percent since midsummer, U.S. military officials say.

Three of the soldiers were killed Sunday, two by small-arms fire west of Baghdad and one by a roadside bomb in the eastern part of the capital, the military said. The Marine was killed in Anbar province on Saturday, the same day that another soldier died, in Salahuddin province, the Associated Press reported.

Meanwhile, at least 10 Iraqis were killed and dozens more injured in violence in Baghdad. A U.S. military official said recently that violence in the capital had risen 22 percent this month, prompting U.S. and Iraqi officials to revisit their security plan.

The attack on the Iraqi police recruits occurred about noon near al-Muradiyah, a town north of Baghdad and south of Baqubah in the restive province of Diyala, provincial Capt. Muhannad al-Bawi said.

[A] news service reported that the recruits were traveling to the capital from a training base that had been attacked Saturday in an incident that was not publicly reported. It quoted a Baqubah official as saying that "many" people were killed and 80 injured in that assault.

Separately, Alberto Fernandez, a senior U.S. diplomat, apologized for criticizing U.S. policy in Iraq in an interview broadcast by the pan-Arab satellite channel al-Jazeera, the Associated Press reported.

"Upon reading the transcript of my appearance on al-Jazeera, I realized that I seriously misspoke by using the phrase 'there has been arrogance and stupidity' by the U.S. in Iraq," said Fernandez, director of public diplomacy in the State Department's Bureau of Near Eastern Affairs.

13 Police Recruits Among 18 Iraqis Killed In Violence (NYT)

By Michael Luo

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

BAGHDAD, Oct. 22 — A deadly ambush of police recruits north of Baghdad on Sunday and several bombings aimed at shoppers in the city put a violent stamp on preparations for the celebration of the end of the Muslim holy month of Ramadan.

The latest violence left at least 18 Iraqis dead overall, officials said, adding to what had already been one of the bloodiest stretches here since the American-led invasion in 2003.

DOJ_NMG_0084872

In addition, about 50 bodies were collected Sunday around Baghdad, the capital, a figure considered high weeks ago but now routine. An Interior Ministry official said many of the victims had apparently been shot at close range and bore signs of torture.

The American military reported five more combat deaths as well. A marine in Anbar Province and a soldier in Salahuddin Province died from "enemy action" on Saturday, the military said. Another soldier in Baghdad was killed Sunday by a roadside bomb, and two others were killed Sunday by small-arms fire in the capital when their patrol came under attack, the military said.

The deaths brought the month's total of lost American lives in Iraq to at least 83.

With more than a week remaining, October's death toll was already the highest for American troops since November 2005, according to Iraq Coalition Casualty Count, an independent Web site that keeps track of such figures.

The ambush of the police recruits, by gunmen with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenade launchers, occurred near the town of Muradiya, north of Baghdad, and left 13 recruits dead, an Interior Ministry official said.

It began with a roadside bomb that halted a police convoy, the official said. It bore the signs of the kind of sectarian violence that has plagued Iraq, particularly since the bombing of a sacred Shiite shrine in Samarra in February.

The recruits may have been members of the Mahdi Army, the biggest of the Shiite militias in the country, the Interior Ministry official said, but an American military official in nearby Baquba could not confirm that. Several of the recruits were missing and were believed to have been kidnapped.

Attacks have spiked in Baghdad since the beginning of Ramadan, the Muslim period of fasting and repentance that will come to an end this week with the three-day holiday of Id al-Fitr, when Muslims traditionally gather with their families to celebrate the end of the fasting period.

The violence in Baghdad during Ramadan has persisted despite the presence of thousands of additional American troops as part of a new security plan for the city that military officials had hoped would help stop the bloodshed. An American military spokesman in Baghdad conceded last week that the plan had faltered and that commanders were working to "refocus" their efforts.

On Sunday, shopping areas in Baghdad were crowded as residents stopped by bakeries to purchase sweets and picked through racks to buy new clothes for the coming holiday.

During Ramadan, hundreds of people were killed in sectarian attacks in Baghdad, and clashes broke out last week between rival Shiite militias in the southern city of Amara, threatening to extend the spiraling violence to the Shiite south.

The mayhem on Sunday included a bomb that exploded under an unattended car in the Shorja market, an area filled with wholesale stores that is Baghdad's largest and oldest shopping bazaar. At least two people were killed and five wounded from the explosion at about 11:30 a.m., an Interior Ministry official said.

About the same time, the official said, a bomb exploded and wounded four people near the al-Farasha bakery in eastern Baghdad, where shoppers were lined up to buy holiday sweets.

Several hours later, a suicide bomber wearing an explosive belt detonated it on Palestine Street, a busy commercial area in the eastern part of the city, killing himself and three others and wounding 20, the official said.

The bombings in Baghdad on Sunday were similar to an attack the day before in Mahmudiya, a volatile predominantly Sunni town 15 miles south of the city, when bombs left on five motorcycles exploded as shoppers packed the main market, killing at least 16 people and wounding 60.

The Iraqi Islamic Party, the country's largest Sunni party, issued a strongly worded statement on Sunday that blamed Shiite militias for the attack in Mahmudiya. The statement said that the militias had killed 1,000 residents in the town since January and that American and Iraqi forces had been allowing the attacks.

The party urged that the leadership of the Iraqi Army brigade in the area be replaced.

In Balad, Age-Old Ties Were 'Destroyed In A Second' (WP)

By Ellen Knickmeyer

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084873

OUTSIDE BALAD, Iraq -- At midweek, Shiite Interior Ministry commandos and their Shiite militia allies cruised the four-lane hardtop outside the besieged city of Balad, trying to stave off retaliation for a deadly four-day rampage in which they had all but emptied Balad of Sunnis.

Sunni insurgents pouring in to take that revenge patrolled the same highway, driving battered white pickups and minivans, their guns stashed out of sight. Affecting casualness, more Sunni men gathered on rooftops or clustered on the reed-lined edge of the highway, keeping an eye on the Shiite forces and the few frightened civilians who dared to travel the highway past Balad.

What brought this Tigris River city north of Baghdad to this state of siege was a series of events that have displayed in miniature the factors drawing the entire country into a sectarian bloodbath: Retaliatory violence between Sunnis and Shiites has soared to its highest level of the war, increasingly forcing moderates on both sides to look to armed extremists for protection.

The Shiite-led government's security forces, trained by the United States, proved immediately incapable of dealing with the sectarian violence in Balad, or, in many cases, abetted it, residents and police said.

More than 20,000 U.S. troops are based within 15 miles of Balad, but, uncertain how to respond, they hesitated, waiting for Iraqi government forces to step up, according to residents, police and U.S. military officials.

And all that was left holding Balad, and Iraq, together -- the desire for peace and normality still held by the great majority of Iraqis, and the generations of intermarriage and neighborliness between ordinary Shiite and Sunni Muslims -- was ripping apart.

"The people of Balad should not kill the Sunnis who are among them," said one slightly built Shiite man, fleeing his home on the outskirts of Balad. He and 13 women and children of his family were crammed into a single, battered Toyota sedan, stranded by a flat tire near the highway turnoff to the city. "Our relations are not of months or years. It's since the beginning of time," he said. "This relationship has been destroyed in a second."

The principals involved give a straightforward timeline of how that happened.

The trigger event, U.S. and Iraqi officials said, was the killing of two or three Sunni men from the area earlier this month. One of the men had been a local leader of the insurgent group al-Qaeda in Iraq, according to Maj. Gen. William B. Caldwell, a U.S. military spokesman.

On Oct. 13, Sunni insurgents took their revenge. In Duluiyah, a Sunni hamlet four miles and across the river from Balad, insurgents kidnapped and beheaded 17 Shiite laborers who had come to work in the date palm groves there. The U.S. military later arrested two Sunni police officers from the town for alleged involvement in the deaths.

Al-Qaeda in Iraq fighters instigated the killings, then stood by as innocent Sunnis were killed in the retaliation that followed, said police Maj. Hussein Alwan in Duluiyah.

Hours after the beheadings, outraged and frightened Shiite elders of Balad telephoned an office of Shiite cleric Moqtada al-Sadr in Kadhimiyah, a Shiite neighborhood of Baghdad. Sadr leads the Mahdi Army, the most feared Shiite militia in Iraq.

Balad's Shiite leaders asked for protection by the Mahdi Army, and for the militia to exact revenge, Taysser Musawi, a Shiite cleric in Balad, later recounted.

The Kadhimiyah branch of the Madhi Army responded, Ammar Joda al-Musawi, a spokesman for the militia brigade, said at his office in Baghdad.

"It was like an SOS call," Musawi recalled. "To protect them from being killed by the Salafis who are killing followers of the prophet" Muhammad, he added, referring respectively to the Sunni insurgents and the Shiites.

Mahdi Army fighters in plain clothes crowded into two buses and headed to Balad, Musawi said. More Mahdi Army fighters followed in army uniforms and army vehicles, Musawi said. Others wore the blue-and-white camouflage pants that Iraq's Interior Ministry commandos wear, but with black T-shirts to distinguish them from the real commandos.

By early in the day on Oct. 14, a Saturday, the Shiite forces had assembled to rid Balad of Sunnis.

Mosque loudspeakers blared warnings for all Sunnis to leave the city within 48 hours, residents recalled. Gunmen in uniforms and civilian clothes took control of Balad's streets and outlying roads, police and residents said.

The Shiite gunmen set up checkpoints, quizzing occupants of each passing vehicle about whether they were Shiite or Sunni.

Um Mustafa, 37, a dentist from Balad, lost her husband at one such checkpoint. The Sunni couple and their two young children had tried to flee the city at 7 a.m. that Sunday. But armed men in black were waiting at one checkpoint.

DOJ_NMG_0084874

A hooded man among them pointed to Um Mustafa's husband, she recounted later. This man is a Sunni, the hooded man told the Shiite gunmen, and he served as a colonel in Saddam Hussein's army. The Shiite gunmen bashed her husband in the face with the butts of their rifles, Um Mustafa recalled.

"My husband was screaming, 'God! God!' " she said. "And they were saying, 'Do not mention God, you infidel.' "

Gunmen put her bloodied husband in a white sport-utility vehicle and drove away. Um Mustafa, now sheltered with strangers outside Balad with her 11-year-old son and 7-year-old daughter, found her husband's body the next day in Balad's morgue.

By the end of Saturday, the U.S. forces had learned about the mass killings underway in Balad, Caldwell, the military spokesman, said in Baghdad. A platoon-size quick-reaction force was dispatched that same day, he said.

The U.S. soldiers asked the Balad officials whether they wanted help, Caldwell said, but the officials declined the offer. The Iraqi government made no request for assistance, he said.

Caldwell described Shiite officials in the town as seemingly interested only in receiving local intelligence from the Americans.

The U.S. military spokesman said he did not know whether U.S. forces intervened. By Sunday, American forces had received reports of at least 57 people slain.

The Balad morgue had received about 80 bodies by Tuesday, hospital officials said. Most were Sunnis, and all had been shot; some bore the holes of electric drills.

The Iraqi government ordered in national police commandos, whose forces often have been accused of working with the militias to kill Sunnis.

Forty-eight hours after the attacks on Sunnis started, the Iraqi government ordered in the Iraqi army's 3rd Regiment, 4th Division from outside Balad, Iraqi army officials said.

Residents credited the Iraqi army forces, many of them Sunni Arabs and Kurds, with finally quelling the violence.

By then, however, very few Sunnis were left in Balad.

Munthir Lattif, 27, who stayed in the city, called around and found only five or six other Sunni families still in Balad, he said Thursday.

"We are living in a very difficult situation," he said in an interview at his home. He, his wife and their four children slept on the roof of their home at night, ready to jump to neighboring rooftops if the Shiite gunmen came to their door.

Lattif said his family had only rice and mandarin oranges to eat. The siege of the city by the Sunni insurgents had cut off most food deliveries into Balad.

With no customers and no food left to sell at his falafel shop, Hussein Abid Ali, a Shiite, nonetheless went to work. He had left home to escape looking into the eyes of his eight hungry children, he said.

Balad's Shiites had been living alongside Sunnis for hundreds of years, Ali said, staring bleakly at the road outside. He had a Sunni son-in-law and Sunni friends, he said. It took the American occupation, he said, to change all that.

"What do you want to know?" Ali demanded bitterly. "How we reached this level? How we started to kill people according to their identity? How this sectarian strife was brought to us?"

The Shiite militiamen from Baghdad remained in Balad at week's end but had melded into newly formed armed bands called civilian defense groups. Shiite militiamen manned the first checkpoint into the city, off the highway. They blocked all people with outside accents.

Real police officers sat meekly in their vehicles down the road closer to Balad, ceding control of the road to the militias.

Three miles outside the city, at the intersection of the highway and the turnoff into Balad, Sunni men had poured in from Samarra, Tikrit and other Sunni communities to the north and south. Scores loitered at a gritty strip of shops, shuttered since the crisis began, staking out the turnoff. Scores more pretended to line up in their vehicles at a gas station that on closer inspection proved to be long closed.

Balad was only starting to pay for the rampage, the Sunni insurgents said. "We kill the guys who go into Balad," an older insurgent said. "And we kill the guys who come out of Balad."

DOJ_NMG_0084875

In the midst of it all, the slightly built Shiite man tried to change his flat tire. Seven female relatives in black robes, cradling babies or gripping children by the hand, gathered anxiously around him as he struggled. Strangers in cars slowed each time they passed the family's car, craning their necks to stare.

Exasperated, the Shiite man clutched a crowbar and began to pace. He damned all sides in the conflict, and all of their fighters.

"I am a Shiite, but I condemn what the Shiites did," he said, snorting his refusal later when asked to give his name. "It's the government who's behind the sectarian feelings. Doing that, they are creating the sectarian killing."

Special correspondent Muhanned Saif Aldin in Balad and special correspondent Salih Dehema in Baghdad and outside Balad contributed to this report.

Britain Cites Progress In Iraq Troop Training (NYT/AP)

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

LONDON, Oct. 22 — Britain has gone "quite far" toward handing over control of southern Iraq to local forces, Defense Secretary Des Browne said Sunday.

But Mr. Browne did not say whether he agreed with Foreign Minister Kim Howells, who said Saturday that "in a year or so there will be adequately trained Iraqi soldiers and security forces" to take over most duties from American-led troops.

Mr. Browne told Sky News during a visit to Afghanistan on Sunday: "We are quite far down the process of transferring responsibility to the Iraqis. In any event, we have handed over two of four provinces."

He said British troops would leave "when the job is done. This is a process and not an event."

British officials have spoken in recent months of cutting troop levels in Iraq from the current 7,000 to between 3,000 and 4,000 by mid-2007, but no firm date has been set.

Last week the country's top soldier, Gen. Sir Richard Dannatt, called for British troops to be withdrawn "sometime soon," and said their presence was provoking rather than preventing violence.

60 Minutes' Steve Kroft Reports On Disappearance Of More Than $500 Million To Equip Iraqi Army (CBS)

CBS News, October 23, 2006

(CBS) More than half a billion dollars earmarked to fight the insurgency in Iraq was stolen by people the U.S. had entrusted to run the country's Ministry of Defense before the 2005 elections, according to Iraqi investigators.

Iraq's former minister of finance says coalition members like the U.S. and Britain are doing little to help recover the money or catch suspects, most of whom fled the country. The 60 Minutes investigation also turned up audio recordings of a suspect who seems to be discussing the transfer of $45 million to the account of a top political adviser to the interim defense minister.

Correspondent Steve Kroft reports on this mother of all heists.

"We have not been given any serious, official support from either the United States or the U.K. or any of the surrounding Arab countries,"" says Ali Allawi, who was confronted with the missing funds when he took over as Iraq's finance minister last year.

He thinks he knows why Iraqi investigators have gotten little help. "The only explanation I can come up with is that too many people in positions of power and authority in the new Iraq have been, in one way or another, found with their hands inside the cookie jar," says Allawi, who left his post when a new Iraqi government was formed earlier this year. "And if they are brought to trial, it will cast a very disparaging light on those people who had supported them and brought them to this position of power and authority," he tells Kroft.

One of the people praised in former U.S. Ambassador L. Paul Bremer's memoirs is a major suspect in the case. Ziad Cattan was in charge of military procurement at a time when the ministry of defense went on a $1.2 billion buying spree. Allawi estimates that $750 to $800 million of that money was stolen. Judge Radhi al-Radhi, head of Iraq's Commission on Public Integrity, which investigates official corruption, tells Kroft that a lot of the money that wasn't stolen was spent on outdated, useless equipment.

"It isn't true," says Cattan, whom 60 Minutes found in Paris and who was recently convicted in absentia in Iraq for squandering public funds. He showed Kroft documents and pictures of equipment that he says is now in Iraq. An official from Jane's, one of the world's foremost experts in military hardware, says the documents Cattan provided were too vague to prove anything.

Audio recordings obtained by 60 Minutes reveal Cattan talking to an associate in Amman, Jordan, in 2004 about the distribution of Iraqi funds. According to two independent translations, he is discussing payoffs to Iraqi officials.

One possible payoff the recordings allude to is the transfer of $45 million to the account of a top political adviser to the defense minister, a man who is also identified on the recordings as a representative of the president and the prime minister of the interim government. Cattan acknowledged his own voice was on the recordings. Three translators say he specifically mentions "45 million dollars," but he disputes the translation. "I don't say dollars," he tells Kroft. "I don't remember what the matter was."

Cattan maintains that U.S. and coalition advisors at the Iraqi Ministry of Defense approved everything he did and says the recordings have been doctored. Audio experts consulted by 60 Minutes could not find any evidence of that. Judge Radhi also has a copy of the recordings and says a former employee of the ministry of defense confessed after hearing them.

60 Minutes has learned that Cattan is building himself a villa in Poland. Another suspect, Naer Jumaili, principal in a middle-man company that handled much of the $1.2 billion in Iraqi military contracts, is said to be buying real estate in Amman, Jordan, and building himself a large villa, even though he is wanted by Interpol. Judge Rahdi believes the fugitive suspects are bribing their way to freedom and says countries like Jordan and Poland have been "no help at all" in apprehending the suspects or recovering the money.

The case is one of 2,000 Iraqi government corruption cases the judge's commission is handling that, all told, involve $7.5 billion.

No one in the U.S. government would speak on camera about the case. But U.S. officials say this was Iraqi money spent by a sovereign Iraqi government and therefore is the Iraqis' business.

At War: The Military's Fight Against Friendly Fire (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron, Newsweek

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

The Pentagon plans to complete by late November its fourth investigation into the friendly-fire killing of former NFL player Pat Tillman in Afghanistan, says the congressman from Tillman's district. Launched in March under pressure from the family, the probe will determine if members of Tillman's Army Rangers unit should be tried for criminal negligence and whether there was a cover-up. The inquiry was to have been completed last month, but Army investigators had trouble tracking down soldiers, most of whom are no longer in uniform, says Congressman Michael Honda, who represents California's San Jose area. He was briefed on the investigation recently by top Defense Department officials. Honda says more than 50 people had been questioned and many of them had hired lawyers. "It's been frustrating for them," he says of Tillman's parents. "They want to get to the bottom line." Tillman was killed by fellow Rangers during a 2004 fire fight with Afghan guerrillas. Army officers initially told his family that he was shot by guerrillas and died a hero. An autopsy weeks later revealed the truth about the means of his death. But three investigations failed to answer key questions: why, for example, Rangers burned his uniform and body armor. Honda says the cover-up investigation is being conducted separately, but the Pentagon will announce the results of both probes simultaneously.

Some top Army officers worry that the findings will overshadow the military's broader success in reducing friendly fire. Less than 1 percent of soldiers killed so far in Iraq and Afghanistan were victims of fratricide, the official military term for it, compared with 17 percent in Operation Desert Storm, and about 10 percent in Vietnam. Military analysts say part of that success is circumstantial: ambushes and roadside bombings are less complicated than large war maneuvers and cause fewer mistakes. But technology has also been a factor. Many of the Army's Stryker vehicles, for instance, have onboard computer systems where friendly troops appear as thin blue circles superimposed on a Baghdad satellite map. A NEWSWEEK reporter riding with troops in a Stryker vehicle on a dark night in Baghdad last week could see clusters of U.S. forces on nearby streets. "It tells you where you are, where your friends are and where the enemy is," Col. Peter Fuller, the project manager for the Stryker Brigade Combat Team, said by phone from ground-combat-systems HQ in Detroit.

DOJ_NMG_0084877

Lower-tech gizmos are also helping. New uniforms issued last year include a patch the size of a postage stamp with a unique infrared signature. Troops who shine a light on the patch from across a hill or from a chopper above can tell the soldiers are friendly—the kind of thing that might have saved Pat Tillman.

Pat Tillman's Brother Blasts Iraq War, Bush (WP/AP)

The Washington Post/AP, October 23, 2006

PHOENIX -- The brother of an NFL player who was killed by friendly fire in Afghanistan after quitting his team to join the Army Rangers has spoken out.

Kevin Tillman, a former Army Ranger who served in Iraq and Afghanistan with his older brother, Pat, has been silent since his brother died in 2004. But last week, he wrote a scathing indictment of the war in Iraq, the Bush administration and American apathy.

"Somehow, the more soldiers that die, the more legitimate the illegal invasion becomes," Kevin wrote on Truthdig.com, an online magazine that bought his work.

The brothers, Arizona State University graduates, joined the Army in response to the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks. They served as Rangers with the 2nd Battalion of the 75th Ranger Regiment.

Pat Tillman, who played defensive back for the Arizona Cardinals, was killed near the Pakistan-Afghanistan border in April 2004. The Defense Department is investigating allegations of a coverup, including failure by the Army to tell Tillman's family for several weeks that he had been killed by gunfire from his fellow Army Rangers.

Kevin Tillman has not spoken publicly about the war or his brother's death since his discharge from the Army. But on Truthdig.com, he wrote openly about the war and America's response to it.

"Somehow, the same incompetent, narcissistic, virtueless, vacuous, malicious criminals are still in charge of this country. Somehow, this is tolerated. Somehow, nobody is accountable for this."

After playing for the ASU Sun Devils, Pat Tillman was drafted by the Arizona Cardinals in 1998. He played with the team for four years.

On Sept. 12, 2001, he gave an interview in which he talked about how "stupid" football seemed relative to world events.

"At times like this, you stop and think about not only how good we have it but what kind of system we live under," he said. "My great-grandfather was at Pearl Harbor. And a lot of my family has gone and fought in wars. And I really haven't done a . . . thing as far as laying myself on the line like that."

Pat Tillman was about to sign another contract with the Cardinals in spring 2002 when he decided to join the Army instead.

The Tillmans were sent to Iraq as part of Operation Iraqi Freedom. In 2003, the brothers returned to the United States for training to become Army Rangers. After that, they were sent to Afghanistan.

Tillman's Brother Breaks Silence (AZ)

Kevin Tillman has finally spoken.

The former Army Ranger served in Iraq and Afghanistan along with his older brother, Pat Tillman, who was celebrated as a paradigm of American patriotism when he quit the Arizona Cardinals to join the Army.

Kevin has remained silent since his brother's 2004 death. But, this week, he wrote what can only be described as a scathing indictment of the war in Iraq, the Bush administration and American apathy.

"Somehow, the more soldiers that die, the more legitimate the illegal invasion becomes," Kevin wrote on Truthdig.com, which purchased his work.

The brothers, both Arizona State University graduates, joined the Army in response to the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

The brothers served together as Rangers with the 2nd Battalion of the 75th Ranger Regiment.

They were in Afghanistan when Pat, 27, was killed by friendly fire in eastern Afghanistan near the Pakistani border.

Since his discharge from the Army, Kevin has not spoken publicly about the war or his brother's death.

But in Truthdig.com, Kevin wrote openly about the war and America's response to it.

"Somehow, the same incompetent, narcissistic, virtueless, vacuous, malicious criminals are still in charge of this country.

"Somehow, this is tolerated.

"Somehow, nobody is accountable for this."

After starring for Arizona State University's Sun Devils, Pat Tillman was drafted by the Arizona Cardinals in 1998. He played with the team for four years.

On Sept. 12, 2001, he gave an interview in which he talked about how "stupid" football seemed relative to world events.

"At times like this, you stop and think about not only how good we have it but what kind of system we live under," Pat said.

"My great-grandfather was at Pearl Harbor. And a lot of my family has gone and fought in wars. And I really haven't done a damn thing as far as laying myself on the line like that."

In the spring of 2002, Pat was on the verge of signing another contract with the team when he decided to join the Army, instead.

Kevin, who played minor-league baseball after playing at ASU, joined the Army with his brother.

The Tillmans were initially sent to Iraq as part of Operation Iraqi Freedom.

In 2003, the brothers returned to the U.S. for training to become Army Rangers.

After that, they were sent to Afghanistan.

Kevin stayed in the Army until his discharge last year.

In the aftermath of Pat's death, his family would come to vehemently criticize the Army's investigation of the events that led to Pat's death and the Army's actions after he was killed.

Planted Propaganda (WP)

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

THE DEFENSE Department inspector general has concluded that having a Pentagon contractor secretly pay Iraqi journalists and news organizations to run positive news stories about the war doesn't violate any laws or regulations. It's almost impossible to tell whether that conclusion is correct: The scanty, two-page summary released by the Pentagon provides no details about the activities of the contractor, the Lincoln Group, the contract under which it was operating or the applicable rules.

We won't dwell too long, though, on the irony that an assessment of the military's secret propaganda operations is itself -- except for the largely exculpatory conclusion -- secret. The more important point is that, assuming the inspector general's legal assessment is right, it only makes the problem worse. The U.S. government has a legitimate interest in conveying its point of view. The problem is when it does so in secret. The government shouldn't be in the business of covertly peddling propaganda -- especially in a war based on the notion of seeking to export democratic values such as, say, a free press.

But don't just take it from us. Take it from, among others, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Peter Pace, who criticized the program in comments to the Los Angeles Times in March. "I think there are ways to get your message out, but get it out in a form that people understand how the message got there," Gen. Pace said. "They need to know that, so they can make their own judgment about what they believe and don't believe in the article. The worst thing you can have is people feeling like somehow they've been snookered."

Or take it from Defense Secretary Donald M. Rumsfeld, who told PBS's Charlie Rose in February, "When we heard about it, we said, 'Gee, that's not what we ought to be doing.' " Or take it from Mr. Rumsfeld's former chief spokesman, Lawrence Di Rita, who said in December of the inspector general's investigation, "If somebody comes back to me and says there's nothing wrong with the Department of Defense paying journalists, I'll say, 'Even if there's nothing wrong, does it make sense?' "

No, it doesn't. But when we called the Pentagon to determine its policy position, the response we received -- even after citing the statements of Mr. Rumsfeld and Gen. Pace -- reflected no understanding of that bedrock principle. "The current situation in Iraq necessitates that the coalition maintain the capability to communicate with the Iraqi people via the Iraqi media," the statement said. "A thorough investigation concluded that the U.S. followed established doctrine by paying to place truthful articles and advertisements in Iraqi newspapers. The IG report made no recommendations to the contrary." But making recommendations wasn't the inspector general's job. If this is "established doctrine," it needs swift reexamination.

CORPORATE SCANDALS:

The Guidelines Now Tougher, Skilling To Face Sentence Today (NYT)

By Alexei Barrionuevo

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

HOUSTON, Oct. 22 — For Jeffrey K. Skilling, it was a last summer of freedom before the bars close behind him.

Mr. Skilling, 52, a former Enron chief executive, will stand in federal court here on Monday and receive a sentence that many expect will keep him in prison for the rest of his life. Most legal experts are betting that United States District Judge Simeon T. Lake III will give Mr. Skilling a sentence of at least 25 years for his role in heading a conspiracy to defraud Enron investors. Should it exceed that, it would be the longest sentence ever handed down for a white-collar criminal.

Until now, the record has been held by Bernard J. Ebbers, the former chief executive of WorldCom, who was sentenced to 25 years for being head of an $11 billion fraud that led to the bankruptcy of his long-distance telephone company. Mr. Ebbers's sentence was less than the 30 years to life imprisonment called for in the sentencing guidelines.

Mr. Skilling's prospects reflect how tough the federal guidelines have become for those convicted of white-collar crimes in the wake of the huge-scale frauds at companies including Enron, WorldCom and Adelphia.

Some legal experts have begun to question the sentences that federal judges are handing down in these cases.

"You can certainly make the case that things have gotten too harsh," said Samuel W. Buell, a former Enron prosecutor who now teaches law at Washington University in St. Louis. "But the reason why things have gotten so harsh is we went through these years when sentences were too light. Maybe we need a correction in the other direction to get a happy medium."

Enron was the company that first imploded in the years of corporate scandal, leading to a wave of investigations and calls for tougher regulations and accountability. The sentence to be handed down Monday is likely to underscore that message of deterrence, legal specialists said.

"Enron still stands alone as a brand name of corporate fraud," said Robert Mintz, a white-collar criminal defense lawyer and former federal prosecutor, "and this judge is not going to hesitate to hand down a lengthy sentence in this case."

Mr. Skilling will be facing the judge alone, without Kenneth L. Lay, Enron's founder and Mr. Skilling's co-defendant in his criminal trial, who died of heart problems in July. His guilty verdict was vacated last week.

Missing, too, will be Andrew S. Fastow, the former chief financial officer who pleaded guilty to fraud and stealing from the company. He was sentenced last month to 6 years in prison, less than the 10 years he could have received as part of his deal to cooperate with prosecutors.

All of that leaves Mr. Skilling as the only top executive through whom Enron's ultimate punishment will be remembered, Mr. Mintz said.

Judge Lake is likely to be careful not to impose a sentence that could be regarded as overly harsh and invite scrutiny from an appeals court, said Joel M. Androphy, a Houston criminal defense lawyer.

For Mr. Skilling, this summer was about coping. After the verdict in May, he spent significant time with his three children, traveling to California with his daughter and to a dude ranch with his youngest son, said friends, family members and his lead lawyer, Daniel Petrocelli. Neighbors in Houston said they saw little of Mr. Skilling, although he occasionally rented videos from a store near his home.

Virtually all Mr. Skilling's net worth, around $55 million, is frozen by the government. He owes O'Melveny & Myers, the law firm that handled his defense, more than $30 million, Mr. Petrocelli said.

Mr. Skilling seemed to stay out of Houston as much as possible, spending time at a condominium he owns in Dallas, where his daughter had been a student at Southern Methodist University. But Mr. Skilling's coping also meant drinking again, despite a court order that forbade him to do so after a much-publicized night of drunkenness in April 2004 at a Manhattan cigar bar, when Mr. Skilling scuffled with some other patrons.

His summer travel ended after he was arrested in Dallas last month for public intoxication. He pleaded no contest and paid a fine. That night, he was out with his brother Mark and his daughter at a Mexican restaurant and had some margaritas, which did not mix well with his prescription medicine, Mr. Petrocelli said. He was walking home to the condo when he was stopped by a police officer; he spent a night in jail.

Mr. Skilling has said he took solace in the bottle to cope with depression. Not being allowed to have an occasional drink "is unreasonable, considering the stresses he is under," Mr. Petrocelli said.

But the incident is one more reason, outside lawyers say, why Judge Lake is likely to reject Mr. Skilling's request to remain free pending appeal, and instead order United States marshals to take him to jail after sentencing on Monday.

Supporters of Mr. Skilling have recently reached out, trying to help him. In August, two friends of the Skilling and Lay families, Beth Stier and Terrie James, sent a letter to supporters, urging them to pass along "a pleasant memory, a thoughtful wish or a fond goodbye" to Mr. Skilling and Mr. Lay's family, according to a person who reviewed a copy of the letter. The thoughts were to be collected into books to be given to Mr. Lay's family and to Mr. Skilling before his sentencing. Ms. Stier declined yesterday to say if the Lay and Skilling families had received the books.

Since the Dallas incident, Mr. Skilling has primarily spent time with his family in Houston. On Thursday afternoon, Mr. Skilling — wearing jeans, hiking boots and a small waist bag — walked with his brother near Mr. Skilling's home in the upscale River Oaks neighborhood of Houston.

"He has a clear head," Mr. Petrocelli said Friday. "He is very stoic about everything. He is prepared for all eventualities on Monday."

Mr. Petrocelli said he spent the weekend huddling with Mr. Skilling, discussing in part what his client will say to Judge Lake. With an appeal pending, an expression of guilt or remorse is not part of the planned remarks, the lawyer said.

"Jeff is sorry for the consequences of Enron's failure, but he doesn't believe he committed any crimes," Mr. Petrocelli said. "And our view is that many of the people that pleaded guilty to crimes at Enron were not guilty."

For some former Enron employees, that message will not make them feel any sympathy for Mr. Skilling.

"All we ever wanted was for him to take responsibility, and he never did that," said Deborah DeFforge, who worked at Enron for five years and said she lost about $100,000 in retirement savings. "Until he does that, I could never show him any mercy."

Judge Lake came under fire last year from a federal appeals court for sentencing Jamie Olis, a midlevel executive at the energy company Dynegy, to 24 years in prison for accounting fraud. The sentence, handed down in 2004, was within new federal guidelines that impose harsher penalties depending on the investor loss amount; in Dynegy's case, that was put at $105 million.

Last year, the Supreme Court gave more latitude to federal judges to consider sentencing guidelines as only advisory, paving the way for the judge to reduce the loss consideration to $79 million and drop Mr. Olis's sentence to six years.

The total loss related to the Enron fraud, which prosecutors and defense lawyers have agreed on, is under court seal. Losses totaling hundreds of millions of dollars would greatly magnify Mr. Skilling's sentence under the guidelines, which were made significantly tougher in 2001.

His lawyers are arguing that he should be sentenced under the 2000 guidelines because the 2001 guidelines did not take effect until Nov. 1, 2001 — three months after Mr. Skilling resigned his chief executive post and left the company. The jury in the Enron case, however, convicted Mr. Skilling of being part of a conspiracy the government defined as extending through December 2001. Under the 2000 guidelines, Mr. Skilling could receive a prison term closer to 12 or 13 years, sentencing experts said.

German Retrial Highlights Perils Of Importing U.S. Pay Practices (WSJ)

By Edward Taylor

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

The retrial later this week of Deutsche Bank AG Chief Executive Josef Ackermann on criminal charges that he abused his position as a director of another German company again brings to the fore the differences between U.S. and German practices on executive compensation.

It also likely will hamper Mr. Ackermann's ability to lead Germany's largest bank, although his position isn't under threat for now.

Mr. Ackermann is being retried on charges of which he was acquitted in July 2004. That trial became a flashpoint for critics of Wall Street-style pay packages in a country that traditionally has sought to limit the gap between highly paid executives and lower-paid workers.

Judges at a court in Düsseldorf will seek to establish whether Mr. Ackermann and five other directors of former engineering company Mannesmann AG breached fiduciary trust, a potentially criminal offense known in German as "Untreue," when they approved €57 million ($71.9 million) in bonuses to Mannesmann executives in 2000 after the company was bought by Vodafone Group PLC of the U.K.

Mr. Ackermann was on Mannesmann's supervisory board at the time the bonuses were awarded. He has denied the criminal charges, which are unrelated to his work at Deutsche Bank.

The Federal Court of Justice in Karlsruhe in December 2005 overturned the Mannesmann verdict after it found flaws in the lower court's verdict and ordered a retrial.

The high court held that the lower court had a false understanding of what constitutes a criminal breach of fiduciary trust and that the fact-finding procedure in the original trial was incomplete.

It isn't clear how long the new trial will last, but it will be a distraction for Mr. Ackermann, who will continue as Deutsche Bank's chief executive during the retrial. The original trial cost Deutsche Bank at least €2 million in legal fees and forced Mr. Ackermann to spend about two days a week in court for six months.

Deutsche Bank's supervisory board has said it has "no doubt that Mr. Ackermann could successfully continue his work and supports him." A spokesman for the bank said Friday, "There is no need for a succession debate within the bank."

At the first trial, Mr. Ackermann and five other directors said they had wanted to reward Mannesmann executives for forcing Vodafone to improve its first offer, thereby creating more value for shareholders. The federal court that overturned the verdict said the way the bonuses were awarded could amount to a criminal breach of fiduciary trust. It said Mannesmann directors shouldn't have awarded managers extra compensation for creating shareholder value since that task was part of their "ordinary duties."

AOL Fraud Prosecutors Stop Short Of The Top (WP)

By Carrie Johnson

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

One of the government's most highly touted accounting-fraud investigations -- into questionable advertising deals at America Online Inc. around the time it merged with Time Warner Inc. -- has apparently hit a dead end, running into the five-year statute of limitations before prosecutors could move as far as they had hoped up the company's corporate ladder.

Despite a lengthy investigation by the U.S. attorney's office for the Eastern District of Virginia, lawyers involved in the case now say the government will not be able to bring criminal charges against top AOL executives over transactions in which the Dulles Internet service provider and its business partners allegedly sought to artificially boost each other's revenue numbers as the dot-com bubble was bursting in 2000 and 2001.

Before the deadline passed, prosecutors filed securities fraud and related charges against two former mid-level AOL executives. They are on trial in a federal court in Alexandria with two former officials of PurchasePro.com Inc., a Las Vegas software maker.

PurchasePro was AOL's partner five years ago in what prosecutors call "round trip" accounting, where no money changed hands but each company claimed to have paid the other for advertising and other services. Such deals, if they are not properly disclosed, can violate accounting rules.

A review of the public record suggests that the leaders of PurchasePro and other AOL business partners paid a far steeper price for their roles in the questionable deals than their counterparts at AOL.

The only former AOL officials to be charged with crimes are Kent D. Wakeford, a former executive director at the company's since-disbanded business affairs unit in New York, and John P. Tuli, a former vice president in AOL's Netbusiness unit in Dulles. Both men, who operated far from the company's highest ranks, are contesting allegations that they struck sham deals with PurchasePro to mislead investors.

DOJ_NMG_0084882

Compare that with the top executives of companies that once competed to reach ad agreements with the Dulles company. Charles E. Johnson Jr., the founder of PurchasePro, is on trial on federal charges that he lied to auditors and shareholders about his company's financial health. A half-dozen former PurchasePro employees have already pleaded guilty and could testify against Johnson and a former subordinate, Christopher J. Benyo, in the case.

Meanwhile, earlier this month, Stuart H. Wolff, the former chief executive of Homestore.com, an online real estate venture based in California, was sentenced to 15 years in prison after a jury convicted him of conspiracy, insider trading, filing false reports and lying to auditors in connection with revenue-swapping deals with AOL.

Much of the investigators' interest had been focused on AOL's raucous, since-disbanded business affairs unit, run by David M. Colburn and Eric Keller. Attorneys for both men, who left AOL in 2002, declined to comment for this article.

Among the documents that prosecutors and FBI agents reviewed were internal AOL reports showing declines in the rate of AOL advertising deals before and after its 2001 merger with Time Warner, as well as e-mails and other documents indicating a last-minute race to sign more deals to enable AOL to reach quarterly earnings targets.

At one point in late 2000, Colburn gave an in-house award to Wakeford and a colleague for their work on the PurchasePro account, calling it "science fiction," according to "Stealing Time," a book by Washington Post reporter Alec Klein on the company's accounting practices. Colburn has said he did not recall using that term. Colleagues laughed as Wakeford accepted the award, thanking AOL for its help, Klein wrote.

Lawyers involved in the case, who spoke on condition of anonymity because they have not been authorized to talk about the case, cite many reasons for the apparent dead end.

They noted that the lengthy investigation was run by two different U.S. attorneys in the Eastern District of Virginia and several prosecutors who departed for other jobs. Moreover, while AOL ultimately paid more than $500 million and agreed to cooperate with the government two years ago, none of its high-ranking insiders pleaded guilty and testified against their supervisors. Such assistance was crucial to breaking open complex white-collar investigations of such companies as Enron Corp., WorldCom Inc. and Adelphia Communications Corp.

The trial that starts today is a subdued end to a scandal that prodded Time Warner to restate its financial results twice and agree to a deferred prosecution deal with the Justice Department nearly two years ago. Yet the company continues to experience aftershocks from accounting problems that date to its merger with AOL.

In August, Time Warner said it would restate previous financial reports by $582 million after an independent examiner scrutinized how the company handled advertising revenues in 2000 and 2001, uncovering problems in deals between Time Warner or its AOL unit and 15 business partners. The examiner's report, a condition of the company's settlement with the government, will not be made public, a Time Warner spokeswoman said.

During the investigation, AOL founder Steve Case, Time Warner chief executive Richard D. Parsons and former finance chief Wayne H. Pace gave depositions under oath to securities regulators. The SEC, which has the authority to file civil charges and seek financial penalties and court orders that bar executives from holding certain jobs at public companies, continues to scrutinize former AOL officials, according to interviews and a statement by the agency last year.

But prosecutors' focus now rests squarely on the PurchasePro trial, at which they must simplify scores of complex documents and accounting issues into an easily digestible case about lying to auditors and investors. Assistant U.S. Attorneys Charles F. Connolly and Timothy D. Belevetz, and senior trial counsel Adam A. Reeves declined to comment.

"Kent Wakeford never committed any crime, and that will become apparent during the course of this trial," said defense lawyer Henry W. Asbill. Mark J. Hulkower, a defense lawyer for John Tuli, declined to comment as jury selection proceeded late last week, as did Preston Burton, a lawyer representing PurchasePro's Johnson.

The defense teams received a measure of good news when U.S. District Judge Walter D. Kelley Jr. dropped several charges from the case Oct. 16. But the stakes for those who remain in the case are high. Under federal sentencing guidelines, which are taken under advisement by the judge, each of the former executives could go to prison for several years if convicted.

US Welfare System Faces Accounting Overhaul (FT)

By Krishna Guha In Washington

DOJ_NMG_0084883

Financial Times, October 23, 2006

A radical new approach to government accounting that would require the US administration to account for the cost of future social security payments year by year as people build up entitlements will be proposed on Monday.

The proposal by the federal accounting standards advisory board (FASAB) – which would also require the government to account for benefits accrued under Medicare and other social insurance programmes in the same way – is unprecedented internationally. It would radically change the presentation of US government finances, in effect bringing forward the cost of rapidly increasing social security and Medicare obligations and greatly increasing the reported fiscal deficit.

George W. Bush's administration is firmly opposed to the proposal, which officials believe wrongly implies that the government is contractually obliged to make future payments based on current benefit rules.

They fear this would make it more difficult to reform the big entitlement programmes and increase pressure on future governments to raise taxes to meet projected funding shortfalls.

The big increase in the reported fiscal deficit under the proposed rule could have an immediate political effect, making it more difficult to press for Bush tax cuts scheduled to expire in 2010 to be made permanent.

The result is a split in the FASAB board, with six independent members supporting the proposal and the three representing the Treasury, the White House office of management and budget, and the government account-ability office opposing.

The FT has obtained a copy of the FASAB preliminary views paper which will be released on Monday. In it, the independent board majority argues that "for social insurance programmes an expense is incurred and a liability arises when participants substantially meet eligibility requirements during their working lives".

By contrast, the government representatives argue that the liability arises only when the benefit amount is "due and payable" as under current accounting rules.

The majority independent directors want the government to start providing for the future cost of social security and other benefits when workers become fully insured after 10 years in covered employment.

They say the current arrangement is "flawed" because it "fails . . . to recognise the accruing cost of social insurance programmes in each reporting period".

Adopting the proposed new rule would bring the government more into line with the private sector, an approach that has considerable support within a section of the Republican party and may in this instance be of interest to Democrats too.

However, it would break with international public accounting practice, which essentially treats social insurance offered by sovereign governments as a political commitment to pay future benefits rather than a financial liability.

The Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development has written to the FASAB saying it is "very concerned" about the proposed rule change.

The letter, signed by Barry Anderson, head of the OECD's budgeting and public expenditures division, says that "classifying these transactions the same as private sector liabilities is wrong" and could confuse the public.

The proposal will now be put to public consultation, with hearings scheduled for March. If the board votes to adopt it, the administration could still veto the proposal, but this would be unprecedented.

"We have never been prevented from adopting an accounting standard," a person familiar with the process said.

The Cut-My-Salary Standard (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

Former New York Stock Exchange CEO Dick Grasso had a bad day in court last week when a state judge ordered him to repay part of his generous retirement package. New York Attorney General Eliot Spitzer is claiming victory, albeit prematurely. The bigger news may be that the judiciary now feels entitled to set executive pay standards.

That was at the heart of last week's ruling from New York state Justice Charles E. Ramos, who has been overseeing the legal case over Mr. Grasso's $187.5 million compensation and ouster from the Big Board. The Grasso team had tried to have Judge Ramos removed from the case because he had sought a job on the NYSE board. The judge also refused Mr. Grasso's request for a jury trial on the main issue in the case -- whether his pay was "reasonable" under New York law for non-profits (which is what the NYSE then was). An appeals court is reviewing the jury question and has delayed that part of the trial.

DOJ_NMG_0084884

Challenging the judge hearing your case is always risky, and it clearly didn't pay off for Mr. Grasso. Rather than wait for an appellate ruling, Judge Ramos used the several technical questions still before him to issue a scathing "summary partial judgment." His sweeping opinion sets unusual new compensation standards, to say the least.

His oddest judgment is that the NYSE board hadn't been made aware of large amounts of Mr. Grasso's pay. This is directly contradicted by numerous depositions in which board members admitted they were well aware of the money Mr. Grasso was due. This disclosure issue is crucial to the case given the judge's further ruling that Mr. Grasso had a fiduciary duty to disclose that pay to the board.

Judge Ramos thus appears to be saying that Mr. Grasso had a duty to go, one by one, to the very people who crafted and authorized his pay package to ensure that they really knew what they were doing. This turns the normal compensation system on its head. Especially in the wake of this decade's corporate scandals, we have been told that boards are supposed to more closely supervise management pay. Whether Mr. Grasso was paid a dollar or $187.5 million, the decision was the NYSE board's. Yet Judge Ramos now scores Mr. Grasso for not asking NYSE directors whether they were paying him too much. If nothing else, this is an unhelpful judicial intrusion in private pay decisions.

Our main problem with Mr. Spitzer's lawsuit is that it seemed to be a politically opportunistic attempt to target the unsympathetic Mr. Grasso while sparing much of the NYSE board that was responsible for paying him. In the most egregious instance, Mr. Spitzer left out of his suit the influential Democrat and former head of the NYSE board's compensation committee, H. Carl McCall, whose support the AG wanted when he still thought he might have to run against Senator Chuck Schumer in the Democratic primary for Governor. Mr. Grasso deserves his chance to have his counsel question Mr. McCall and other board members under oath in public court.

A future hearing will determine how much Mr. Grasso would owe the NYSE under Judge Ramos's ruling. But the former CEO says he'll appeal and he arguably has a stronger case now that the judge has ruled so broadly even before the appeals court decided on the jury trial question. Appellate courts tend not to appreciate judges who pre-empt their discretion.

CRIMINAL LAW:

FED TROLLS FOR BIG FISH (NYPOST)

By Kati Cornell

The New York Post, October 23, 2006

October 23, 2006 -- The arrest of state Assemblyman Brian McLaughlin, along with recent high-profile public-corruption probes, are just the beginning for U.S. Attorney Michael Garcia, who is ramping up efforts to bust crooked politicians.

"It's shocking to see cases where people abuse their public-service office to enrich themselves illegally. If you're in this for the money, something's really wrong," Garcia told The Post.

Since becoming U.S. attorney for the Southern District of New York in 2005, Garcia has vowed to make ferreting out corruption a priority.

The office, where Garcia cut his teeth in the 1990s, has a strong reputation for taking on terrorism, white-collar and organized-crime cases. "You really don't think about public corruption - it's an area where I think this office should play a role," Garcia said.

But Garcia said that the FBI is increasingly devoting its resources to these difficult cases and he intends to do the same as he makes new hires.

The Southern District encompasses Manhattan, The Bronx, and counties to the north.

"There's just a lot of opportunity here, a lot of money in everything from zoning and those types of traditional areas where you see corruption - to bigger areas like the U.N.," Garcia said.

Last week the focus was local with McLaughlin's arrest for a slew of alleged scams targeting everyone from a Little League team to members of his union.

DOJ_NMG_0084885

Last month, Garcia confirmed a probe into former Westchester DA and state attorney general candidate Jeanine Pirro after she was allegedly recorded talking with former city Police Commissioner Bernard Kerik about suspicions that her husband was cheating and her desire to bug his boat.

In August, a veteran state senator, Efrain Gonzalez, was nabbed for allegedly siphoning $37,000 from a Bronx charity.

Last year, Naparjan Venkataram, a former top official for the city medical examiner, was charged with stealing millions in federal funds meant to help with identifying victims of the 9/11 attacks.

An assistant U.S. attorney for 81/2 years, Garcia worked on the 1993 World Trade Center bombing and other high-profile terrorism probes.

In 2001, he headed to Washington, eventually becoming assistant secretary for immigration and customs enforcement.

Garcia acknowledged the unique difficulties in pursuing corruption cases.

"You're dealing with people who know the system," he said.

With allegations against McLaughlin, a Democrat, and Pirro, a Republican, coming to light on the eve of elections, Garcia said "people on both sides of the aisle" have asked him about the timing.

"We are a law-enforcement agency," he said. "We don't charge, not charge, investigate, not investigate, for political reasons."

A 'Traitor' Wants Name Cleared (SEAPI)

By Tracy Johnson, P-I REPORTER

Seattle Post-Intelligencer, October 23, 2006

Edwin Wilson began this quest from a solitary-confinement cell, where he wrote letters seeking top-secret documents to show that his own government betrayed him.

The notorious ex-spy once traveled the world, gathering intelligence while playing the role of global businessman. He later was tied to shipping a planeload of explosives to Libya, sending him to prison for decades.

He was hurtling into history as one of this nation's most infamous traitors until three years ago -- when a federal judge concluded he'd been buried with the help of government lies.

Now 78 and paroled, Wilson works in his Seattle office, a scrupulously tidy room in his attorney's high-rise building, to prove he didn't earn the spectacular fall from skilled CIA agent to despised federal prisoner.

He studies his documents over cup after cup of black coffee and charts his latest mission: a federal lawsuit against the high-ranking people who helped lock him away.

"The bottom line is I want to clear my name," Wilson said. "My situation hasn't been explained."

It could be the most difficult task of his movie-like life. In books about his downfall, he is the villain: a ruthless renegade who left the CIA and made himself rich by selling arms and training terrorists for Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi.

And though he's made headway on new appeals, he remains convicted of some grim crimes, including shipping several guns to Libya and plotting to kill prosecutors and witnesses.

But three years ago, a federal judge in Texas threw out a major conviction -- that Wilson conspired to ship 20 tons of a powerful plastic explosive known as C-4 to Libya in 1977 -- and blasted the government for covering up the truth.

Wilson had finally gotten documents to help support the claim he had made all along: That despite his 1971 retirement, the CIA was still secretly using him to gather intelligence and knew about many of his activities in Libya.

The government had denied it for years. His attorney, Steve Berman, said the CIA didn't want to be publicly connected to anything it had authorized Wilson to do, so it simply "hung him out to dry."

The people Wilson is suing -- former officials in the U.S. Attorney's Office, the Justice Department and the CIA, including two men who are now federal judges -- contend they can't be held liable for doing their jobs, even if his rights were violated.

Wilson spent 22 years in prison. He was freed two years ago. Now the Edmonds man, once labeled a terrorist, "death merchant" and even "Great Gatsby of the spook world," is determined to reclaim his fortune and his name.

The CIA defense

Although metal-rimmed glasses and arching creases now frame his eyes, the 6-foot-4 former espionage agent with Idaho farm-boy roots looks nearly the same as he did when he was locked away in 1982.

Lifting weights and walking a mile on the treadmill each morning at an Edmonds gym not far from the apartment he now rents from his brother keep him fit. When he heads to his office before dawn each morning, he usually puts on a tie.

Boxes of documents line his office walls. He spent months building an index so he could quickly reference any subject: 168 alphabetized files that start with "A-bomb" -- the one he tried to keep the Libyans from getting, he said.

They include CIA papers, U.S. Attorney memos, news articles and his hard-won lists of contacts he'd had with the agency after he officially retired. Many are carefully highlighted. More than one he calls "a smoking gun."

Wilson began his battle to get the documents while he was locked in a notoriously harsh federal prison in Marion, Ill. Clanking away at a rickety typewriter, he made formal requests to the CIA, Justice and other departments.

What he wanted to prove was simple: The government lied.

He has always maintained that the CIA knew about his profitable business dealings in Libya -- contracts to provide things such as parachutes, land-mine clearing and basic military training -- and had encouraged him to gain the trust of Libyan officials for intelligence purposes.

Wilson said the CIA even gave him a list of 30 Soviet weapons and other military gear and asked him to get samples from the Libyans.

As for the charges, Wilson admits he agreed to give several guns to Libyan intelligence officers. He denies knowing that a subcontractor he'd used occasionally was going to send the explosives.

"As soon as I found out they shipped that stuff in there, I notified the agency," he said.

And he's insistent that none of the C-4 has ever been traced to any terrorism; he said he understood it was for use in oil fields, not some nefarious purpose.

But in his 1983 trial on the explosives charges, prosecutors shot down his "CIA defense" with a sworn statement from Charles Briggs, then the agency's executive director. It said that apart from one exception, Wilson "was not asked or requested, directly or indirectly, to perform or provide any service" after he left the CIA.

The statement was apparently a key piece of evidence for jurors. They deliberated for a day, asked to have the statement read to them again -- then found Wilson guilty.

Richter scale of evil

Berman, a nationally known Seattle litigator who has taken on Big Tobacco and Enron, was initially skeptical of the case. It sounded like "a story out of some spy novel or something," he said.

He first heard about Wilson's situation from a law professor at the University of Washington, where someone spotted Wilson's classified ad seeking legal help.

Berman looked up the 2003 opinion overturning Wilson's conviction and had "never read a decision that was so condemning of the government," he said.

U.S. District Judge Lynn Hughes found that about two dozen government lawyers were involved in hiding information from Wilson's defense attorney, presenting Briggs' false statement and refusing to come clean about it later.

In his blistering opinion, Hughes noted that the CIA had more than 80 contacts with Wilson after he left the agency, which, among other things, had used him to "trade weapons or explosives for sophisticated Soviet military equipment -- like MiG-25 fighters, tanks, missiles and ocean mines -- with Libya."

At one point, a CIA agent had even discussed with Wilson that "sending tons -- yes, tons -- of explosives to a hostile power could be authorized" if the U.S. got good enough information for it, the judge wrote.

Berman said the documentation would have made a huge difference in Wilson's criminal trials. Instead, he said, the government hid the information and gave jurors a sworn statement that was a lie.

"What I'm concerned about is that our highest government officials would knowingly fabricate evidence to keep this guy put away," Berman said. "I think every citizen in the United States would be hugely concerned. ... It's off the Richter scale in terms of evil."

DOJ_NMG_0084887

Wilson said he's not bitter. But it hurts to be called a traitor, and he maintains that he was in Libya for one reason only: to serve his government by helping the CIA.

"God, I was risking my neck for these people, and they tried to shoot me while I was trying to survive," he said. "I was doing it for them. If they hadn't walked away from me, I wouldn't have ever been convicted."

Lawsuit a 'desperate move'

Lawrence Barcella, a former assistant U.S. Attorney, spent years investigating Wilson and helped put him away. He's the dedicated lawman in "Manhunt: The Incredible Pursuit of a CIA Agent Turned Terrorist" by Peter Maas, a best-selling author who dubbed Wilson the Great Gatsby of spies.

Now a target of Wilson's lawsuit, Barcella was reluctant to discuss the case but said, "Suffice it to say, a lot of his allegations have improved with age."

The Washington, D.C., lawyer -- one of the people Wilson was convicted of trying to have killed as he sat in prison in the early 1980s -- said he still worries about the explosives.

He said most were ruined because "thankfully, the Libyans didn't know much about storing them." But every time he hears about an explosion somewhere, he said, he still wonders.

Barcella's attorney, Melinda Sarafa, said Wilson's claims miss the heart of the matter because he has "never identified any witness or document showing he had authorization to make that shipment" of explosives to Libya.

Daniel Hedges, another former prosecutor whom Wilson is suing, acknowledged that "things have come to light" about Wilson's CIA connections, but he said he didn't know if it would have changed anything.

"I'm not going to second-guess what I did 20 years ago," he said. "We didn't find out about any exculpatory evidence until considerably after the trial."

Wilson's lawsuit names five other former assistant U.S. Attorneys -- Stephen Trott, now a judge on the Ninth U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals; D. Lowell Jensen, now a federal judge in California; James Powers, retired; Mark Richard, who still works for Justice; and Theodore Greenberg, now senior counsel for World Bank -- and ex-CIA official Briggs.

In court documents, Briggs' attorneys contend he believed the affidavit he signed was true "and would not have signed it otherwise."

Greenberg also believed the statement was accurate and still does, said his attorney, Robert Bennett. He said Greenberg had "an unblemished reputation" as a 29-year prosecutor and called Wilson's lawsuit "a desperate move."

"These allegations are frivolous and baseless," Bennett said. "This is a man who put a contract out to murder a United States attorney."

Long hit list alleged

The murder plot that Wilson was ultimately convicted of only reinforced what he had become in the public eye.

While he was behind bars in New York, another inmate told investigators Wilson had a list of people he wanted to have killed, including Barcella, another prosecutor and some witnesses.

In a sting, an undercover FBI agent posed as a "hit man" and later testified that Wilson's son gave him a $10,000 down payment for the crimes. Wilson's son also was indicted, but the charges were dismissed.

Wilson denies trying to kill anyone and said the money was part of a business deal involving the sale of three airplanes. He contends the government framed him to make sure he stayed in prison and didn't further sully the CIA.

Now there may be evidence that the FBI agent who helped build the case against Wilson is corrupt; he was charged in New York earlier this year for allegations that he helped the Mob commit murders.

Houston attorney David Adler, who got Wilson's explosives case vacated in Houston and is now fighting his Virginia gun-shipping conviction, suggested government misconduct may have factored into the murder-plot case, too.

"What are the odds that after violating his rights in Virginia and Houston, they decided to play by the rules in New York?" he asked.

Adler was appointed to help Wilson years ago. At first, he said, it was clear that Wilson didn't trust him -- he figured Adler, an ex-CIA officer himself, would just help the government continue covering the truth.

DOJ_NMG_0084888

"In the beginning, he was a very difficult character," Adler said. "But if you look at what he'd been through, it was sort of justifiable." He now considers Wilson "the most persevering person I've ever met."

Wilson's 71-year-old brother, Bob, said he believes Wilson was "really railroaded" after putting his life on the line for his country, although he's sure he'll eventually be exonerated.

"He's very outgoing and assertive, you might say. You wouldn't want to not do what he says," he said, chuckling. "He just doesn't take 'no' for an answer."

'Patriotic thing to do'

If Wilson ever thought he was invincible as a wheeler and dealer overseas, he evidently no longer does. He now talks about the toll of aging and arthritis.

He lost everything long ago: The lavish home on a 2,500-acre Virginia farm that he said he and his wife were able to buy after a series of successful real estate deals. The job that gave him the same rush a firefighter feels when the station bell sounds. His family.

His wife grew frustrated with the time he spent overseas and divorced him, he said. He keeps in touch with one son, but the one who was entangled in the murder-for-hire case hasn't spoken to him since.

These days, Wilson doesn't think much about the danger he later faced in Libya.

"They'll execute you just like that, sure, but that was the job," he said. "You get your job done."

He walked out of prison on Sept. 15, 2004. On each anniversary of his release, he's had dinner at Canlis.

The man who was once a master of pretending is certain that many still-classified documents further detail his CIA work. Much of it he won't talk about, but he insists he served his government honorably until the prison doors closed behind him.

"I can't think of one thing I did that I have any guilt about," he said. "I didn't hurt anybody. I didn't get anyone killed."

He said he did things he knows might seem absurd: Continuing to work for the CIA for free. Shelling out much of his own money, earned through his various business deals, to gather intelligence.

Once, he said, he agreed to sell 5,000 M-16 machine guns to Libya so that he could help the CIA find out which countries were selling them on the black market -- a contract he never intended to fulfill and didn't, costing him $1.1 million.

"In retrospect, it seems a little stupid," he said, a lopsided smile crossing his face. "It was a patriotic thing to do. But nobody believes that."

He has countless tales about his undercover work -- days helping guard the ultra-secret U-2 spy plane project, keeping tabs on foreign labor unions or running a CIA-created maritime business to conceal various agency operations abroad. He said he only retired from the CIA because he had to. His cover had been blown.

If given the chance, he'd still be handling covert operations in perilous locales on the other side of the world.

"It was a hell of a satisfaction," he said. "Assuming I'd get out of there alive."

FBI Stats Show Many Colleges Understate Campus Crime (WSJ)

By ZACHARY M. SEWARD

Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

BOSTON -- Northeastern University tallied just five burglaries on and around its campus here in 2004, far below most other colleges in the area.

That stellar figure, reported to the U.S. Education Department and distributed in the school's literature for students and staff, helped tip some safety-minded applicants toward Northeastern, school officials say.

James Ferrier, a campus police officer who compiles the university's crime statistics, calls Northeastern an "oasis compared to crime in the rest of the city." But those statistics may be more like a mirage.

Northeastern may have recorded only five burglaries -- thefts that involve trespassing -- but the university also counted 345 instances of larcenies, which don't involve unlawful entry. These larcenies, included in a separate report to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, weren't reported to the campus community. Furthermore, federal regulators say that many larcenies at Northeastern and other schools should have been reported as burglaries and disclosed on campus.

Under a 1990 law known as the Clery Act, schools must report statistics on burglaries -- but not larcenies -- to the Education Department and to students and staff. Schools report larceny totals separately to the FBI for its annual report on crime in the U.S. But thefts, whether characterized as burglary or larceny, are only part of the problem of gauging campus security. Some schools have understated violent crimes such as robberies and sexual assaults.

Crime statistics are a sensitive matter for colleges, which initially resisted passage of the Clery Act. The law, named for a student murdered in 1986 at Lehigh University in Pennsylvania, is intended to provide accurate assessments of campus crime for applicants, students and their parents.

But a comparison of recent Clery reports to FBI data shows that colleges may be portraying themselves as safer than they really are. For instance, some schools, including Northeastern, acknowledge they exclude many unsolved thefts from burglary numbers submitted to the Education Department, despite federal guidance to the contrary.

Under pressure from Congress and Security on Campus Inc., a nonprofit group that lobbied for the Clery Act, about a dozen colleges have owned up to errors in their statistics and paid fines to the Education Department since 1998. Salem International University, a private school in West Virginia, agreed last year to pay a record $200,000 for understating sex offenses and robberies, among other violations.

In 2004, Security on Campus accused Yale University of underreporting sexual assaults on campus. The law requires schools to ask deans and other officials in charge of students for tallies of sex crimes reported to them each year, regardless of whether charges were pressed. Yale acknowledged that it had failed to do so but says it now fully complies with Clery's regulations.

"It's so easy to underreport sexual assaults because it's such a private crime, and schools are left with the responsibility of asking deans about sexual assaults reported to them by students," says S. Daniel Carter, senior vice president for Security on Campus. "If they don't ask, it doesn't get recorded."

The Education Department is investigating allegations of intentional crime misreporting at West Virginia University. In a lawsuit filed against the school in a state court, three WVU police officers said they faced retaliation from supervisors after they alleged that incident reports were changed to indicate larcenies had occurred when the proper classification was burglary. The court found the officers were retaliated against, but the university denies incident reports were changed and says it is cooperating with Education Department investigators.

The U.S. Education Department also recently told the University of Massachusetts at Boston to classify more property thefts as burglaries, says Philip M. O'Donnell Jr., the campus police chief. UMass-Boston reported three burglaries in 2004, while counting 99 larcenies in its report to the FBI.

The House of Representatives twice, in 1990 and 1998, voted to include larceny among the crimes that colleges would have to report. But the Senate version of the bill didn't include the requirement and prevailed both times. Staffers involved in negotiations over Clery in 1998 say the exclusion of larceny was urged by two higher education groups, the American Council on Education and the American Association of Community Colleges. Both groups declined to comment.

With unsolved thefts, it is often impossible to determine who took the item and whether the thief was allowed to be in the area. The case of a laptop missing from a room on Northeastern's campus on May 19 is a good example. A staff member said the computer had been left in the room at 6 p.m. the day before and stolen overnight. Public-safety officers found no sign of forced entry, according to the university's crime log, so they assumed the door had been left unlocked.

Northeastern counted it as a larceny. Mr. Ferrier, the campus police officer, says, "If I have no indication that there's unlawful entry, I would tend to call that a larceny." But the FBI, which sets guidelines for Clery reporting, says the opposite. "If an item is missing from a structure and it is unknown who took the item, the proper classification would be burglary," says an FBI memorandum. The Education Department underscores that point with a large-type note on page 35 of a thick handbook on Cleary reporting issued last year. Schools can face a fine of $27,500 for each instance of misclassified theft.

Northeastern's Mr. Ferrier calls that guideline a "recommendation." He also contends that the school's tight security often precludes any possibility of burglary. "It's very unlikely that anybody in our residence halls is in there unlawfully," he says.

David Bergeron, director of policy for the Education Department's office of postsecondary education, says Mr. Ferrier's interpretation is incorrect. "One of the reasons that we did the handbook was to get everybody on the same page," he says.

According to the FBI, larcenies occurred three to four times more often than burglaries nationwide in 2004. But many colleges report a sharply lower burglary proportion to the FBI -- and repeat the low burglary numbers in the Clery data they must share with students. Rice University in Houston reported just one burglary in 2004 compared with 149 larcenies. The College of William and Mary, in Williamsburg, Va., reported three burglaries and 334 larcenies. And the University of Michigan's campus in Ann Arbor listed 25 burglaries and 908 larcenies. Statistics for last year aren't yet available from all schools.

Rice and William and Mary both declined to comment on their crime-reporting policies, as did other private schools with lopsided burglary and larceny statistics. At Michigan, a spokeswoman explained that in cases with no indication of which type of theft occurred, the campus police score the crime as larceny.

Harvard University says it adheres to the FBI's definition of burglary. As a result, Harvard reported 446 burglaries and 229 larcenies in 2004. That's 132 burglaries per 10,000 undergraduate and graduate students, the highest such rate in the Ivy League.

But Steven Catalano, who is in charge of Harvard's Clery reports, says a review of the theft figures "leads us to believe that the disparity is more the result of a difference of how thefts are classified than a difference in actual theft rates." When burglary and larceny figures are taken together, Harvard's total theft rate is sixth among the Ivy League's eight schools.

Weldon's World Of Influence (PHI)

By Chris Mondics

The Philadelphia Inquirer, October 22, 2006

WASHINGTON - Several times in recent years, U.S Rep. Curt Weldon (R., Pa.) has taken time from his busy schedule to help a foreign company, which turned around and hired a lobbying firm close to him.

In 2002, Weldon started aiding a large Russian energy firm just before his daughter Karen and longtime political ally Charles P. Sexton Jr. received a $500,000 contract to lobby for the company.

A year later, Weldon also aided the interests of a Russian helicopter plant as well as two brothers linked to a prominent Serbian war criminal. Both parties later hired the Weldon-Sexton lobbying firm, Solutions North America.

Weldon has denied he did anything wrong. And his actions have had little impact on the 10-term incumbent whose Delaware County seat had long been secure.

But everything changed this year. Last week, Weldon became publicly embroiled in a federal criminal probe that appears to focus on actions he took to help clients of his daughter's firm, Solutions North America.

On Monday, FBI agents carted away documents from Karen Weldon's Philadelphia home and Media office and Sexton's Springfield, Delaware County, home.

Agents also searched the offices of at least one of Karen Weldon's clients - the giant Russian energy firm Itera International, with U.S. offices in Jacksonville, Fla. - and the Philadelphia law office of Weldon friend John J. Gallagher, who had helped Weldon's daughter get business.

DOJ_NMG_0084891

Weldon, who combines a foreign-policy interest with considerable showmanship skills, predicted the probe would find nothing. He said he hadn't helped his daughter get anything, and he ascribed the raids' timing to a Democratic plot to ruin him. Sexton and Karen Weldon, whose firm is now called Solutions Worldwide, have not responded to requests for comment.

The revelations have roiled an already competitive race between Weldon and a well-funded Democrat, retired Vice Adm. Joe Sestak.

"Being accused of financial malfeasance in Pennsylvania, that is often the coup de grace for a struggling politician," said Michael Young, a former Pennsylvania State University political science professor who runs a polling firm.

Young said Weldon may have felt free because for years he faced little opposition. "The lack of real competition in primaries has created a whole class of politicians. I think he's the embodiment of [those] who seem to believe that they are invulnerable."

No evidence has surfaced that Weldon has personally benefited from his official actions. But there are many signs that those around him have reaped gains.

Weldon's clout as the second-highest-ranking Republican on the House Armed Services Committee gives him easy access to White House officials and foreign leaders. Companies that later became Solutions North America's clients and others close to Weldon benefited from that access, though the congressman's efforts were not always successful.

On July 15, 2003, Weldon rose to speak on the House floor. He wanted to help his friend and contributor, globe-trotting Philadelphia lawyer John Gallagher, to recoup a $2.5 million investment in a cognac factory seized by the government of Moldova. Weldon proposed to bar all U.S. aid from the former Soviet republic until Gallagher was repaid.

"The Moldovan government must remedy this matter," said Weldon, who later dropped his proposed amendment.

Federal investigators are reviewing Weldon's role in that attempt to help Gallagher.

These weren't the only times Weldon seemed to blur the line between politics and personal interest.

Earlier in his career, Weldon was accused of using a federal antipoverty program he had founded to pay for promotional materials from his congressional campaign. The Delaware County Partnership for Economic Development was closed after the government concluded it had misspent more than $5 million on travel and gifts for staff and on no-bid contracts to politically connected firms, including the accounting firm of Weldon's former campaign treasurer.

William Tancredi, the program's former executive director who pleaded guilty in 1992 to corruption charges, said he was pressed by Weldon to spend program money on campaign materials. He said a primary task of one agency worker was to run errands for Weldon.

Weldon was never charged. He denied the allegations at the time and insisted, as now, that he had been the victim of a smear campaign.

Gray-haired and bespectacled, Weldon has the look of the policy wonk he is.

From memory, he can spit out details of obscure trade agreements, bilateral defense treaties, and internal political matters on Russia and the former Soviet republics.

He also has a knack for drawing attention in ways that can backfire. For more than a year after the Sept. 11, 2001, attacks, Weldon maintained that a Pentagon data-mining unit had identified some of the hijackers before the attacks, suggesting the catastrophe could have been averted. A Pentagon inspector general's report could not substantiate Weldon's account.

The latest FBI probe may have been triggered by disclosures in 2004 that Weldon's daughter Karen and business partner Sexton won contracts totaling more than $1 million from foreign interests that the congressman had helped.

Among them was Itera International Energy Corp., a huge Russian firm that was seeking a grant from the U.S. Trade and Development Agency to develop a sprawling Siberian natural-gas field.

The agency gave preliminary approval for the $868,000 grant in 2002, but soon rescinded its decision after competing investors charged that Itera was composed of stolen assets and had never disclosed all its owners.

Shortly afterward, Weldon began urging the agency to approve the grant. He wrote at least two letters to agency officials and led a congressional delegation to Moscow, where it met with Itera officials, and he praised the company. He also contacted President Bush's top political adviser, Karl Rove, and Energy Secretary Spencer Abraham, to complain about Itera's treatment.

In September 2002, after Weldon began helping the firm, his daughter and Sexton signed a $500,000 contract with Itera.

DOJ_NMG_0084892

The following year, Karen Weldon and Sexton won two more lucrative contracts from clients who also seemed to benefit from her father's assistance. One was a Russian aircraft manufacturer, Saratov Aviation, that sought to sell equipment to the Pentagon.

Both Weldon and his daughter visited Saratov's Russian plant in 2003, around the time Karen Weldon began negotiating a $20,000-a-month contract with Saratov to provide promotion and help it find clients.

During this same period, Weldon also set out to help two Serbian brothers whose family foundation had hired Solutions North America. The brothers, Bogoljub and Dragomir Karic, had wanted to travel to the United States, but had been denied visas because of alleged links to accused Serbian war criminal Slobodan Milosevic. Weldon said then that the two had been unfairly maligned by U.S. intelligence agencies, and he tried to help polish their image.

Since Milosevic was ousted, the government has taken a series of actions against the Karic brothers. It suspended the license of the cell-phone corporation of Bogoljub Karic and issued a warrant for his arrest. He is believed to be living in Moscow. U.S. authorities, in addition to denying visas for the Karic brothers, have encouraged European countries to do the same.

Among other efforts, Weldon wrote the brothers on congressional stationery on Oct. 8, 2002, praising their business acumen and inviting them to the United States.

"We are interested in establishing a dialogue regarding future economic cooperation between our two nations," said the letter, signed by Weldon and 18 other members of Congress.

There was soon an uptick in economic activity between the United States and Serbia, however incremental.

In 2003, Solutions North America signed a $240,000 contract to promote the Karic Foundation in the United States.

Judge Rejects Request To Subpoena Reporter In China Spy Case (NYS)

By Josh Gerstein, Staff Reporter of the Sun

New York Sun, October 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO — A federal judge has refused to allow a reporter for the Washington Times to be subpoenaed by defense attorneys in a case stemming from allegations of Chinese espionage at American defense contractors.

Lawyers for one of the defendants in the case, Chi Mak, argued that the newspaper's top national security correspondent, William Gertz, should testify about leaks he allegedly received of classified information about the prosecution.

Judge Cormac Carney, who is based in Santa Ana, Calif., rejected the request, ruling that the legality of the government's wiretaps under the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Act should be assessed solely on the basis of the paperwork the government filed to seek warrants for the surveillance.

"Any classified information Mr. Gertz may have received is irrelevant to the court's inquiry," Judge Carney wrote in an order dated October 16.

An attorney for Mr. Mak, Ronald Kaye, declined to discuss the motion to subpoena Mr. Gertz. A copy of the defense's legal filing was not available last week from the court. Mr. Gertz is renowned in Washington for obtaining and publishing classified reports. It is unclear precisely what prompted the interest of defense attorneys, but the case against Mr. Mak is discussed at length in Mr. Gertz's latest book, "Enemies."

Mr. Mak, a China-born naturalized American citizen is charged, along with four of his family members, with failing to register as an agent of the Chinese government. Prosecutors contend that he stole details about Navy-related propulsion technology from his employer, Power Paragon, and arranged to deliver them to Chinese agents. Judge Carney has ordered that Mr. Mak stand trial separately from the other defendants because of what the judge said was a "powerfully incriminating" confession by Mr. Mak. All of the defendants have pleaded not guilty. The judge did not rule on whether Mr. Gertz could be called as a witness at trial. There is no indication that the defense has made such a request.

The government opposed the subpoena to Mr. Gertz, but did not say in its filing whether any investigation into the alleged leaks is under way.

In a similar case, involving two pro-Israel lobbyists accused of obtaining classified documents, a federal judge in Virginia recently ordered a Justice Department probe into alleged leaks to CBS News.The results of that inquiry have not been made public.

Like Grandpa, Like Granddaughters

Add a new name to the political dynasties of Bush and Clinton: Cheney. Recall that when Vice President Dick Cheney hit the campaign trail in 2004, he and his wife, Lynne, sometimes showed up with their grandkids in tow. Well, the kiddies got hooked. We know because earlier this month, when daughter Liz Cheney drove by the veep's residence at the U.S. Naval Observatory, one of her daughters urged Mom to turn in so they could see "Grandma" and "Grandpa." Liz sped on, explaining that the grandparents were out of town campaigning. "What?" barked one of her daughters in disappointment. "Without us?"

The Hill Monitor (TIME)

By Karen Tumulty

Time, October 23, 2006

When the FBI raided his daughter's home three weeks before Election Day, Pennsylvania Congressman Curt Weldon figured he knew exactly whom to blame. The agents were looking for evidence that he had used his influence to help Karen Weldon win lobbying and consulting contracts, but the 10-term Congressman wasn't mad at just them. "It's a woman who runs an organization called CREW," he complained to a blogger for the Daily Pennsylvanian. That woman is a tenacious 40-year-old former prosecutor named Melanie Sloan, whose targets have included Tom DeLay and Mark Foley. She is executive director of the liberal watchdog group Citizens for Responsibility and Ethics in Washington (CREW). Since its founding in 2003, CREW has worked through legal and regulatory channels to press allegations of impropriety almost exclusively against Republicans. Ironically, given CREW's new prominence as a favorite target of vast-left-wing-conspiracy theorists, its litigious approach borrows heavily from the conservative group Judicial Watch, which in the 1990s helped propel Paula Jones' sexual-harassment accusations against Bill Clinton into his impeachment.

Sloan, a former congressional staff member for such liberal lawmakers as Michigan's John Conyers and New York's Charles Schumer, was working as an assistant U.S. Attorney when two Democratic activists approached her with the idea of trying something like Judicial Watch from the left. For its first 18 months, CREW was a one-woman shop. An early target was the seemingly invincible DeLay. Sloan asked the Internal Revenue Service to investigate the House majority leader's fund raising and sued the Federal Election Commission to get more info about his dealings with a Kansas utility. But she was not getting much support from Democratic officials, particularly in the House, where the two parties had declared an "ethics truce" that effectively blocked either side from filing a complaint against the other.

Until, that is, DeLay redistricted Texas Congress- man Chris Bell--now the Democratic nominee for Texas Governor--out of a job. In Bell, Sloan finally had the in-house ally she needed, and under House rules formally filed a CREW-drafted com-plaint in June 2004. Eventually, the Ethics Committee unanimously admonished the majority leader--an early sign of the troubles that led to DeLay's resignation and an achieve- ment Sloan counts as "the thing I'm most proud of."

More recently, it was CREW that first alerted the FBI to the fact that Foley, a Florida Congressman, had been sending suspiciously friendly e-mails to a former House page. This was two months before the scandal broke publicly. The FBI declined then to investigate but opened a probe after ABC News reported on other, sexually suggestive e-mails Foley sent.

Representative Weldon has accused CREW of orchestrating last week's raids for maximum impact just before an election. But the FBI is part of the Bush Administration's Justice Department, and CREW's initial complaint against Weldon was filed more than two years ago.

For an organization dedicated to holding government accountable, CREW isn't transparent about its own operations. Organized as a 501(c)3 under federal tax laws, it does not have to reveal the names of all its donors. "I wouldn't have any donors if I revealed all my donors," says Sloan. FBI Says It May Launch Probe Of Bishop State (MR AL)

By George R. Altman, Staff Reporter

Mobile Press-Register (AL), October 23, 2006

The FBI is considering an investigation into Bishop State Community College and has consulted other law enforcement agencies about the matter, a bureau spokesman said Thursday.

Meanwhile, Alabama's two candidates for attorney general -- incumbent Troy King and Mobile County District Attorney John Tyson Jr. -- have criticized each other's handling of matters regarding the Mobile college less than three weeks before the general election.

"We're conferring with other law enforcement authorities to determine what course of action, if any, we should take at this time" with regard to Bishop State, said Craig Dahle, spokesman for the Mobile office of the FBI.

Dahle declined to say what specific agencies the bureau has consulted with regard to the 4,000-plus student college. But Nicki Patterson, chief assistant district attorney for Mobile County, confirmed that she has talked with officials from the FBI about Bishop State.

Tyson said his office has also been in contact with the inspector general's office at the U.S. Department of Education about Bishop State. A spokeswoman for the office of inspector general said she could not comment.

The Department of Education earlier this year demanded Bishop State repay $150,000 in misspent aid money and now requires the school to demonstrate each student's eligibility before it can receive federal funds.

Tyson's office has charged six people, three of whom are Bishop State employees, in connection with the theft of more than $75,000 in financial aid money.

While all Bishop State-related arrests have come from Tyson's office, the state two-year system forwarded the findings of its internal review of the college to King more than a month ago.

The full report was not made public, but a summary of the report detailed both financial and academic problems at Bishop State, including mishandling of federal aid, poor oversight of academic functions, and employees giving money to family members.

The attorney general's office would not say Thursday whether King is investigating matters related to the school.

Tyson told the Press-Register this week that if he were in King's position, he would be "more active than they are" regarding Bishop State.

"I don't know what he's done," Tyson said. "I'm concerned that I don't know."

King shot back that Tyson "does not know what he's talking about."

"That is a reckless, irresponsible and inexperienced thing to say. That is not the way that the attorney general's office conducts investigations," King said.

King is a Republican appointed by Gov. Bob Riley to the attorney general seat vacated by Bill Pryor when the latter became a federal judge. Tyson is a longtime prosecutor who won the Democratic nomination in June to challenge King. The general election is Nov. 7.

Tyson said he has the summary of the two-year system report on Bishop State, but has not been given the full report that King received.

Tyson said he was investigating Bishop State before the two-year system report was released.

Tyson said that investigations into irregularities at the college need a "real sense of urgency" before the federal government stops sending aid money. About 80 percent of Bishop State students receive some type of financial aid.

"We should be moving this thing along as fast as we can," Tyson said. "I really think that the existence of the school is threatened."

King said that while his office would "find those who are responsible," he would not try cases in the media, as he said Tyson was doing.

"Just because he thinks it will get him a headline ... we are not going to allow him to compromise important investigations," King said.

DOJ_NMG_0084895

On Oct. 6, Tyson said that his office would benefit from federal assistance on the Bishop State case. This week, he said he preferred King's involvement to be limited.

"We could use help. As you know, our resources are always thin," Tyson said, "but if you're going to step in and take it over, I'm not interested in that. That's harmful."

Gangs Take Toll On Traveling Gem Sellers (USAT)

By Richard Willing, Usa Today

USA Today, October 23, 2006

Cunning criminals scare reps out of trade

FBI and local police are teaming up to combat a little noted but highly lucrative crime: robberies by gangs that target traveling jewelry and precious gem sales representatives.

Jewelry and gem salespersons reported 117 such robberies nationwide in the first nine months of this year, putting the industry on track for its lowest number of annual attacks since about 1990, according to a report by the industry group Jewelers' Security Alliance (JSA).

However, ripping off sales reps, who typically travel by car and carry hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of goods in small pieces of rolling luggage, remains a highly lucrative crime. The average theft this year has netted about $224,000. By contrast, the average bank robbery netted about $4,220 in 2004, the FBI estimated.

"It's a crime that's below the radar, and doesn't get nearly the attention of say, bank robbery," says John Kennedy, president of the JSA. "But in the past 10 years or so, it's become a fact of life for an industry where it had pretty much been unknown."

Interrogations of captured robbers have shown that most are illegal immigrants, usually Colombian or Ecuadorean, who have worked their way up in ethnic gangs by performing less serious robberies, says Daniel McCaffrey, an FBI agent in New York City who specializes in jewel theft.

After 1999, when sales reps endured a record 323 robberies and more than $76 million in losses, the FBI began to partner with local police task forces in New York City, Los Angeles, Houston, Miami and other jewel theft hot spots. Using stakeouts, stings and other methods, they've helped boost arrests and lower dollar losses each year since 2000. Figures kept by the Jewelers' Security Alliance show local, state and federal arrests increased 25%, from 456 in 2003 to 570 in 2004. Those included crimes against retailers as well as sales reps.

The targeting of traveling jewelry and gem sales people has taken a toll on the trade.

Joseph Menzie, a former traveling salesman who is now a gem wholesaler in New York City, estimates that sales reps, who once numbered in the thousands, now are down to about 600 to 800 full-time workers and declining each year. About 15% are women, he estimates.

"It used to be a great job for a young guy," Menzie says. "But now, forget it. Nobody young is coming in, and a lot of the old guys would get out if they could. … All of them have been hit (by robbers)."

When Menzie started in the mid-1970s, representing his grandfather's gem company out of New York City, going on the road to sell was a time-honored way of breaking into the jewelry business. The job featured travel, fellowship with other sales reps, and some prestige. Commissions of 4% to 15% afforded a decent living.

Because of the nature of their product, jewel and gem reps seemingly were impervious to changes that the Internet brought to the sales industry.

"The customer wants to hold the piece in her hand, so the retailer wants to see it and feel it, too," Menzie says. "That's where the salesman comes in."

Sales reps kept their product line of diamonds, watches, finished jewelry and gemstones such as emeralds and sapphires in small off-the-rack travel cases. They formed groups such as the Brotherhood of Traveling Salesmen, which collected annual dues and passed the hat when a sales rep died on the road to pay for return shipping of both the body and the product line.

Crime was an occasional problem. In more than 10 years on the road, Menzie remembers being followed once, on a freeway in Alabama. He eluded the chase car and found refuge at a small town police station.

For reasons that aren't clear, Ecuadorean and Colombian gangs began to target sales reps, FBI agent McCaffrey says.

They use Mapquest, Global Positioning System devices, cellphones, and telephone and property databases to identify and follow sales reps. It's not unusual for 20 or more crewmembers using several cars to follow prospective "scores" for days or weeks, McCaffrey says.

Some of the thieves' favorite methods, says McCaffrey, who has interviewed captured robbers, include:

•Cutting brake lines or spiking tires on a sales rep's car, then trailing him until he breaks down.

•Breaking into the parked car while the salesman is having coffee.

•Surprising the sales rep as he leaves his motel or home.

The robberies, which have netted nearly $600 million since 1995, according to the JSA, are forcing changes in the industry. Manufacturers and wholesalers, beset with rising insurance premiums, increasingly are using large trade shows to reach retailers. Reps who continue to travel carry more product, to compensate for higher gas and hotel costs.

In a sure sign of the times, the Brotherhood of Traveling Salesmen disbanded about a year ago, Menzie notes. The group, which dated from the 1930s, was down to about 100 members and had few new applicants. Those who remained, Menzie says, decided to cash out the group's account and get a check now rather than wait for each other to die off.

Fort Peck Couple Admits Fraud Scheme (BG MT)

By Clair Johnson

Billings Gazette (MT), October 20, 2006

A former Fort Peck tribal education official and her husband admitted Thursday that they took money from the federal government and used most of it to pay for their daughter's college tuition.

Desiree Dean Kirn Lambert, 50, and Bernard John Lambert Jr., 58, of Busby, pleaded guilty in federal court in Great Falls. An uncle of Desiree Lambert charged in a related scheme pleaded guilty earlier.

Desiree Lambert pleaded guilty to fraudulent claims, grant fraud and theft from a tribal organization; her husband pleaded guilty to conspiracy to defraud the government.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Carl Rostad said that from November 2001 to December 2002, Desiree Lambert, while director of the Fort Peck Tribes Department of Education, approved payments totaling $12,000 to her husband, who was superintendent of the Brockton School District, for writing 10 grants. The grants were from various corporations and the U.S. Department of Education. Investigators found that none of the grants Bernard Lambert was paid to write was ever received or funded.

The couple admitted that $8,500 of the $12,000 Desiree paid to Bernard was to pay tuition for their daughter, Kayla Lambert, at the University of Montana. Bernard Lambert contended that he wrote all the grants and repeatedly claimed he would provide records of the grant applications to the Department of Interior but has not done so, Rostad said in court records.

When Kayla Lambert applied for financial aid, she and her mother stated that Desiree Lambert was the sole source of family income. At the time, Desiree and Bernard were married and living together, and Bernard was making about $60,000 a year as Brockton superintendent. He resigned in July 2004.

"Finally, as Kayla went off to college, Desiree gave her a Department of Education cell phone. Kayla ran up about $900 worth of charges, which were paid for by the tribes," Rostad said.

In a related case, Desiree Lambert's uncle, Raymond A. Dolezilek, 53, of Sheridan, Wyo., pleaded guilty earlier this month to conspiring with his niece to submit false claims to the Department of Interior. Dolezilek admitted that he submitted eight vouchers for payment totaling $8,510 to Desiree Lambert for work he had not performed, Rostad said.

Dolezilek also paid $1,700 in kickbacks to his niece. Desiree Lambert told investigators she hired her uncle to provide her with expert assistance at the Education Department and denied getting kickbacks. Charges against Desiree Lambert in the case with her uncle were dismissed in exchange for her pleas in the tuition scheme indictment.

U.S. District Judge Sam Haddon set sentencing for the Lamberts for Feb. 7. Dolezilek is to be sentenced on Jan. 25.

The conspiracy charge carries a possible sentence of 10 years in prison and a $250,000 fine, while the false claims and fraud charges carry a possible sentence of five years and a $250,000 fine.

Computer Search Turned Back At The Border (LAW)

By Amanda Bronstad, The National Law Journal

DOJ_NMG_0084897

National Law Journal, October 23, 2006

Government officials must have reasonable suspicion under the Fourth Amendment to search someone's laptop at U.S. borders, according to a recent ruling in Los Angeles.

The decision by U.S. District Judge Dean D. Pregerson of the Central District of California is the first within the area of the 9th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals to address whether searching a person's laptop is more than routine and therefore subject to the search and seizure protections of the Fourth Amendment. U.S. v. Arnold, No. 2:05-cr-00772 (C.D. Calif.).

The Oct. 2 ruling expands upon a previous decision by the 9th Circuit that permitted the search of temporary cache files in a man's laptop. U.S. v. Romm, 455 F. 3d 990 (9th Cir. 2006). The decision could lead to a potential circuit split, given a conflicting 4th Circuit ruling last year in a similar case.

Under existing law, border officials must have a reasonable suspicion to conduct a nonroutine or invasive search, such as a body cavity search or X-rays. In most cases, that standard of proof is relatively low given the nation's heightened security concerns at the borders.

Previously, the only other case that addressed whether a laptop search is intrusive was U.S. v. Ickes, 393 F.3d 501 (4th Cir. 2005.) In that case, the 4th Circuit upheld a man's conviction in ruling that a laptop search at the border did not violate his First Amendment right of expression.

In July, the 9th Circuit upheld the conviction of a man with a prior criminal record in ruling that border authorities could search the temporary cache files in a laptop. But the circuit declined in Romm to address the issue of whether searching a laptop was routine or intrusive.

The recent case involves Michael Timothy Arnold, a 43-year-old man with no previous criminal record who was indicted on child pornography charges after customs officers searched his laptop and other computer equipment at Los Angeles International Airport in July 2005.

The government contended that the search was routine and therefore not subject to Fourth Amendment protections against unreasonable searches.

"While not physically intrusive as in the case of a strip or body cavity search, the search of one's private and valuable personal information stored on a hard drive or other electronic storage device can be just as much, if not more, of an intrusion into the dignity and privacy interests of a person," Pregerson wrote. Given that conclusion, the government failed to prove reasonable suspicion.

Marilyn Bednarski of Pasadena, Calif.-based Kaye, McLane & Bednarski, who represents Arnold, hailed the ruling. "The search of a computer is different because it's like looking into somebody's mind," she said.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Elizabeth Carpenter said prosecutors are deliberating about whether to appeal.

Jury Expected To Get Rosenbaum Case Soon (WT)

By Arlo Wagner

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

The jury in the trial of a man accused of killing a New York Times journalist could begin deliberations as early as today.

Prosecution and defense teams in the murder trial of Percey Jordan Jr. rested their cases Friday in a D.C. Superior Court.

Mr. Jordan, 42, is on trial for the killing of editor-reporter David E. Rosenbaum, who was severely beaten Jan. 6 as he walked in the 3800 block of Gramercy Street near his home in a usually peaceful Northwest community.

Closing arguments by Assistant U.S. Attorney Amanda Haines and defense attorney Michael Starr are expected to focus on the recorded testimony of Mr. Rosenbaum's wife, Virginia, who died of colon cancer six months after testifying to a grand jury.

The testimony, read to the murder trial jury by an intern in the U.S. Attorney's Office, described Mrs. Rosenbaum's panic and frustration when her husband did not return from a nighttime walk to get rid of hiccups. Mr. Rosenbaum was alive when found at 9:30 p.m. and transported to Howard University Hospital where he died Jan. 8.

An investigation into the incident found that first responders with the D.C. fire department were slow to arrive, didn't recognize Mr. Rosenbaum's injuries and, as a result of the misreading, took him to a hospital on the other side of town.

DOJ_NMG_0084898

Mr. Rosenbaum died of "blunt impact" to his head, Dr. Lois Goslinoski, the District's deputy medical examiner, testified Friday.

The trial last week included testimony from Mr. Jordan's cousin, Michael C. Hamlin, who said Mr. Jordan planned the robbery and hit Mr. Rosenbaum on the head with a hard plastic pipe. Hamlin has pleaded guilty to second-degree murder and robbery in the case.

Other testimony in the trial last week came from John Snowden, who said he has known Mr. Jordan for about 30 years. Snowden said Mr. Jordan talked about the murder-robbery as they walked together Jan. 11 in Southeast.

"One time he mumbled and said they got a cracker," Snowden said. "He said they 'caught a cracker sleeping.' "

Defense attorney Mr. Starr suggested that Snowden talked to police and testified to get a $25,000 reward.

He said that Snowden previously has been charged with prison break, breaking and entering and drug charges and that he is on parole until 2008. Mr. Starr also suggested that police led Hamlin to implicate his cousin.

Researchers See Privacy Pitfalls In No-Swipe Credit Cards (NYT)

By John Schwartz

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

AMHERST, Mass. — They call it the "Johnny Carson attack," for his comic pose as a psychic divining the contents of an envelope.

Tom Heydt-Benjamin tapped an envelope against a black plastic box connected to his computer. Within moments, the screen showed a garbled string of characters that included this: fu/kevine, along with some numbers.

Mr. Heydt-Benjamin then ripped open the envelope. Inside was a credit card, fresh from the issuing bank. The card bore the name of Kevin E. Fu, a computer science professor at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst, who was standing nearby. The card number and expiration date matched those numbers on the screen.

The demonstration revealed potential security and privacy holes in a new generation of credit cards — cards whose data is relayed by radio waves without need of a signature or physical swiping through a machine. Tens of millions of the cards have been issued, and equipment for their use is showing up at a growing number of locations, including CVS pharmacies, McDonald's restaurants and many movie theaters.

The card companies have implied through their marketing that the data is encrypted to make sure that a digital eavesdropper cannot get any intelligible information. American Express has said its cards incorporate "128-bit encryption," and J. P. Morgan Chase has said that its cards, which it calls Blink, use "the highest level of encryption allowed by the U.S. government."

But in tests on 20 cards from Visa, MasterCard and American Express, the researchers here found that the cardholder's name and other data was being transmitted without encryption and in plain text. They could skim and store the information from a card with a device the size of a couple of paperback books, which they cobbled together from readily available computer and radio components for $150.

They say they could probably make another one even smaller and cheaper: about the size of a pack of gum for less than $50.

And because the cards can be read even through a wallet or an item of clothing, the security of the information, the researchers say, is startlingly weak. "Would you be comfortable wearing your name, your credit card number and your card expiration date on your T-shirt?" Mr. Heydt-Benjamin, a graduate student, asked.

Companies that make and issue the cards argue that what looks shocking in the lab could not lead to widespread abuse in the real world, and that additional data protection and antifraud measures in the payment system protect consumers from end to end.

"This is an interesting technical exercise," said Brian Triplett, senior vice president for emerging-product development for Visa, "but as a real threat to a consumer — that threat really doesn't exist."

The finding comes at a time of strong suspicion among privacy advocates and consumer groups about the security of the underlying technology, called radio frequency identification, or RFID. Though the systems are designed to allow a card to be read only in close proximity, researchers have found that they can extend the distance.

DOJ_NMG_0084899

The actual distance is still a matter of debate, but the claims range from several inches to many feet. And even the shortest distance could allow a would-be card skimmer to mill about in a crowded place and pull data from the wallets of passersby, or to collect data from envelopes sitting in mailboxes.

"No one's going to look at me funny if I walk down the street and put a flier in everybody's mailbox," Mr. Heydt-Benjamin said.

The experiment was conducted by researchers here working with RSA Labs, a part of EMC, an information management and storage company. The resulting paper, which has been submitted to a computer security conference, is the first fruit of a new consortium of industry and academic researchers financed by the National Science Foundation to study RFID.

Security experts who were not involved in the research have praised the paper, and said that they were startled by the findings. Aviel D. Rubin, a professor of computer security at Johns Hopkins University, said, "There is a certain amount of privacy that consumers expect, and I believe that credit card companies have crossed the line."

The companies, however, argue that testing just 20 cards does not provide an accurate picture of the card market, which generally uses higher security standards than the cards that were tested. "It's a small sample," said Art Kranzley, an executive with MasterCard. "This is almost akin to somebody standing up in the theater and yelling, 'Fire!' because somebody lit a cigarette."

Chips like those used by the credit card companies can encrypt the data they send, but that can slow down transactions and make building and maintaining the payment networks more expensive. Other systems, including the Speedpass keychain device offered by Exxon Mobil, encrypt the transmission — though Exxon came under fire for using encryption that experts said was weak.

Though information on the cards may be transmitted in plain text, the company representatives argued, the process of making purchases with the cards involves verification procedures based on powerful encryption that make each transaction unique. Most cards, they said, actually transmit a dummy number that does not match the number embossed on the card, and that number can be used only in connection with the verification "token," or a small bit of code, that is encrypted before being sent.

"It's basically useless information," said David Bonalle, vice president and general manager for advanced payments at American Express. "You can't steal that data and just play it back and expect that transaction to work."

While the researchers found that these claims were true for some of the cards they tested, other cards gave up the actual credit card number and did not use a token or change data from one transaction to another. They also took data in from some cards and transmitted it to a card-reader in the lab and tricked it into accepting the transaction. Mr. Heydt-Benjamin, in fact, was able to purchase electronic equipment online using a number skimmed from a card he ordered for himself and which was sealed in an envelope.

(None of the cards transmits the additional number on the front or back, known as the card validation code, that some businesses require for online purchases; Mr. Heydt-Benjamin chose a store that does not require the code.)

Mr. Kranzley said the MasterCard-issuing banks decided how much security they wanted to implement, but said that with 10 million of the company's chip-bearing cards on the market, some 98 percent of them used the highest standards.

"Today, there's an extremely small percentage of cards that have the characteristics that RSA has looked at in this report," he said. Visa and American Express representatives said all their cards conformed to the highest security standard.

Beyond the security on the cards themselves, the companies said, they have deployed fraud detection and prevention measures that block suspect purchases. And each company stressed that cardholders were not liable for fraud.

Dr. Fu acknowledged that the research involved a small sample, and added, "We would be happy to examine cards that have better security so that we can verify these claims." He added, however, that all of the cards they tested were issued this year, and all were felled by at least one of the attacks that they attempted.

Tom O'Donnell, a senior vice president at Chase, the largest issuer of the new cards, said that the attacks described in the paper would be too cumbersome in the real world. And the researchers said that other kinds of fraud, like so-called phishing scams in which criminals trick people into revealing credit card information through misleading e-mail messages and Web sites, were currently more effective.

DOJ_NMG_0084900

Still, John Pescatore, vice president for Internet security at Gartner, a technology market research firm, said he was surprised by the lack of security in transmitting personal data. He said it was a mistake that companies often made in rolling out early versions of a technology.

"It's the classic 'Let's depend on security through obscurity — who's going to look?' " he said. "Then, whoops! As soon as somebody does look, you roll out the security."

All of the card companies said that they were in the process of deleting names from the stream of data transmitted to the card readers. "As a best practice, issuers are not including the cardholder name," Mr. Triplett of Visa said.

CIVIL LAW:

Less Means More: 3rd Circuit Fixes Congressional Typo (LAW)

By Shannon P. Duffy, The Legal Intelligencer

Legal Intelligencer, October 23, 2006

The Bauhaus school of architecture famously preached that "less is more," but the 3rd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals has now taken that one step beyond, finding that in statutory construction, the word "less" sometimes actually means "more."

Following the lead of three other circuits, a unanimous panel of the 3rd Circuit held last week that a key provision of the Class Action Fairness Act includes a "typographical error" in which Congress accidentally used the word less when it meant to say more.

Under CAFA, a defendant named in a class action filed in the state courts may remove the suit to federal court.

The law also provides that if the federal court determines that the case should be sent back to the state courts, the defendant may file a discretionary appeal.

The glitch in the law, courts have discovered, is the wording of the time limit imposed on such appeals.

CAFA states that a federal appellate court "may accept an appeal" from a remand order "if application is made to the court of appeals not less than seven days after entry of the order."

Read literally, the law seems to impose not a time limit on the appeal, but a waiting period followed by an unlimited time to appeal.

Now, in Morgan v. Gay, the 3rd Circuit has joined a growing chorus of appellate courts in saying that Congress obviously meant the opposite of what it said.

"Because the uncontested legislative intent ... was to impose a seven-day deadline for appeals, we conclude that the statute as written contains a typographical error and should be read to mean 'not more than seven days,'" U.S. Circuit Judge D. Brooks Smith wrote.

Smith, in an opinion joined by Judges Maryanne Trump Barry and Richard L. Nygaard, noted that the 9th, 10th and 11th circuits have all reached the same conclusion.

In Pritchett v. Office Depot Inc., the 10th Circuit said, "Given Congress' stated intent to impose time limits on appeals of class action remand orders and the limited availability of appeals prior to the statute's enactment, we can think of no plausible reason why the text of the act would instead impose a seven-day waiting period followed by a limitless window for appeal."

Smith said he recognized that looking to legislative history is a controversial practice that has been described as "looking over a crowd and picking out your friends."

But in the case of CAFA, Smith said, "the crowd speaks with one voice."

As a result, Smith concluded that "this court does not need to step into a statutory interpretation debate over the role of legislative history and congressional intent to conclude that [the law] needs common sense revision that accurately reflects the uncontested intent of Congress."

The ruling clears the way for the defense to pursue an appeal of an order by U.S. District Judge Garrett E. Brown Jr. of the District of New Jersey that remanded a class action brought by purchasers of the skin cream Stri Vectin-SD alleging false advertising and other claims.

Garrett ruled that the federal courts lacked jurisdiction over the case and remanded it to the New Jersey Superior Court.

DOJ_NMG_0084901

Now the 3rd Circuit has agreed to hear an appeal of the ruling and will issue a second decision on the merits.

O.C. Candidate Defends Letter Scaring Immigrants (LAT)

By Garrett Therolf

The Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2006

At a chaotic sidewalk news conference Sunday, Orange County congressional candidate Tan Nguyen defended a letter his campaign sent to 14,000 registered voters that warned in Spanish that immigrants could be jailed or deported for voting.

"There has been no crime committed, so why is there a criminal investigation three weeks prior to a very important election?" asked Nguyen outside his campaign office in Garden Grove. It was his first public appearance since the controversy erupted last week. "What is going on? Who is fueling this investigation?"

Nguyen, a Republican challenging Democratic Rep. Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District, said that he would stay in the race despite the national uproar over the letter and calls by Orange County Republican leaders for him to drop out.

"I am innocent, and there is no way in hell that I am going to withdraw," Nguyen said. "I am not going to quit this race, and I am going to win this race."

His speech was punctuated by outbursts from a crowd of roughly 50, who angrily demanded more information about the letter's authorship. Nguyen maintained that the letter was sent without his knowledge. But he added that, after firing the staffer he said was responsible for it, he was asking her to return because he believes the mailer was fair.

In the letter, registered voters with Latino surnames in Santa Ana, Garden Grove and Anaheim were warned "that if your residence in this country is illegal or you are an immigrant, voting in a federal election is a crime that could result in jail time...."

The mailer has sparked state and federal investigations over possible voting rights violations. On Friday, Nguyen's campaign headquarters, his home and a staffer's residence were searched by California Department of Justice investigators.

A spokesman for Atty. Gen. Bill Lockyer said Sunday that the investigators were continuing to review the evidence and movement in the case could come this week.

Orange County officials said they would decide this week whether to send a second letter to the affected voters making it clear that naturalized citizens have the right to vote.

Former U.S. Atty. William Braniff, a lawyer for Nguyen's campaign, said Sunday that the controversy was caused by the news media and others who inferred that the word emigrado, or immigrant, included U.S. citizens. In fact, Braniff said, emigrado in the letter merely referred to U.S. immigrants who have legal status but not citizenship — and thus do not have the right to vote.

Braniff declined, however, to say why the campaign had used letterhead closely resembling that of the California Coalition for Immigration Reform without the group's permission and why it was signed by a fictional "Sergio Ramirez."

"These are fair questions and could be answered if they were being asked if this was a purely political forum, but there is an investigation going on," Braniff said.

He also declined to comment on accounts by sources familiar with the investigation who said an LAPD officer had paid for the $4,000 mailing of the letter .

Nguyen lambasted his opponent, Sanchez, saying she was "fueling this hysteria," and said investigators were "terrorizing my family and volunteers" and violating his right to free speech.

The candidate said his campaign had been crippled by the government's seizure of his mailing lists and other material.

No representative of the Sanchez campaign was immediately available for comment.

Schwarzenegger Ramps Up Pressure Over Orange County Mailing (LAT)

By Scott Martelle And Susannah Rosenblatt, Times Staff Writers

The Los Angeles Times, October 22, 2006

He says GOP candidate Nguyen should quit House race if he knew of his office's threatening letter to immigrants.

DOJ_NMG_0084902

Gov. Arnold Schwarzenegger stepped up the pressure Saturday on an Orange County Republican congressional candidate, telling reporters that Tan Nguyen should withdraw if he knew about his campaign's mailing of letters intended to threaten immigrant voters.

Schwarzenegger denounced the mailings traced to Nguyen's campaign to unseat Democratic incumbent Loretta Sanchez in the 47th District and said that "anyone that knew … has to resign immediately."

Speaking during a campaign appearance in Santa Ana, the governor said the mailings "were illegal; it's a hate crime…. There should be no tolerance for this kind of behavior."

Democratic gubernatorial challenger Phil Angelides had earlier denounced Nguyen's campaign, which sent mailers to 14,000 registered voters. Written in Spanish, they warned that immigrants who cast a ballot could face jail time or deportation.

Nguyen, himself a Vietnamese immigrant, said Thursday that he had fired his campaign office manager because of the letter but that he had no prior knowledge of it. However, the chairman of Orange County's Republican Party has said that he was told by the mailing company that sent the letter that Nguyen was personally involved.

The Nguyen controversy — and key Republicans' quick action to distance the party from the mailings — pointed to a sharp contrast between the two major parties' approaches to the elections, just over two weeks away. As the Democrats seek to promote themselves as a unified slate, the Republicans are largely running as individuals.

Schwarzenegger made two Orange County campaign stops Saturday unaccompanied by other Republican candidates for statewide office, while the Democratic statewide candidates crisscrossed Southern California and stressed the need for unity.

Angelides began his day at a UC Berkeley football game tailgate party, then traveled to three Los Angeles-area labor rallies, which also drew such statewide Democratic candidates as John Garamendi, running for lieutenant governor; Cruz Bustamante, running for insurance commissioner; John Chiang, running for controller; and Debra Bowen, running for secretary of state; and local candidates.

"No matter where you go in this state, you see Democrats campaigning together," Angelides told about 200 supporters during an afternoon barbecue at a Gardena union hall. "These Republicans this year — in the year of George Bush's Republican Congress — they're all treating each other like they got the bird flu."

Despite Saturday's show of solidarity, the Democrats have their own fissures. Ray Cordova, chairman of the South Bay County Labor Council, told the Gardena crowd that he was "sick and tired" of seeing Senate President Don Perata and Assembly Speaker Fabian Nuñez "ride around the state" with Schwarzenegger rallying votes for Propositions 1A through 1E, which would spend $37 billion on state construction projects.

Schwarzenegger and the legislative leaders worked together to get the measures on the ballot and have since campaigned for them together.

But the theme of the day was unity, and the need to propel California voters to the polls by building on what recent surveys have shown could be a nationwide Democratic surge on election day. Angelides for the last two days has cited polls that he says have shown his campaign rallying from 17 to 7 points behind — though the polls were, in fact, sponsored by different polling organizations and do not necessarily demonstrate a trend.

"We are rocking and rolling," Angelides said in Gardena. "Those guys are slipping and sliding."

Schwarzenegger's campaign day was more low key. In Santa Ana, he admired cowboy apparel and browsed ranchera albums on 4th Street, chatting with store owners and pausing for photos, handshakes and autographs before a private meeting with the Hispanic 100 civic group, which has endorsed him.

Speaking to reporters, Schwarzenegger reiterated his support for immigration reform, advocating a guest worker program and, under specific conditions, driver's licenses for illegal immigrants.

"Right now we have this policy where everyone looks the other way and everyone does things illegally," he said. "This is not the right way to go."

He moved on to Cook's Corner, a biker roadhouse in Trabuco Canyon, arriving on his maroon Indian Chief motorcycle. Nearly a thousand Harley-Davidsons and other choppers gleamed in the sun as part of the "California Dream Ride" to raise money for an organization that supports military families.

DOJ_NMG_0084903

"I could have gone anywhere else in the world; I would not have remotely achieved the things that I have achieved, and it is all because of California," Schwarzenegger told the crowd.

ANTITRUST:

We're Google. So Sue Us. (NYT)

By Katie Hafner

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

SAN FRANCISCO, Oct. 19 — Google attracts millions of Web users every day. And, increasingly, it's attracting the attention of plenty of lawyers, too.

As Google has grown into the world's most popular search engine and, arguably, the most powerful Internet company, it has become entangled in scores of lawsuits touching on a wide range of legal questions, including copyright violation, trademark infringement and its method of ranking Web sites.

Any company that is large and successful is going to attract lawsuits, and Google's deep pockets make it an especially big target. But as it rushes to create innovative new services, Google sometimes operates in a way that almost seems to invite legal scrutiny.

A group of authors and publishers is challenging the company's right to scan books that are still under copyright. A small Web site in California is suing Google because it was removed from the company's search results. And European news agencies have sued over Google's use of their headlines and photos in Google News.

In these cases and others, potential legal problems seem to give the company little pause before it plunges into new ventures.

"I think Google is wanting to push the boundaries," said Jonathan Zittrain, professor of Internet governance and regulation at Oxford University.

"The Internet ethos of the 90's, the expansionist ethos, was, 'Just do it, make it cool, make it great and we'll cut the rough edges off later,' " Professor Zittrain said. "They're really trying to preserve a culture that says, 'Just do it, and consult with the lawyers as you go so you don't do anything flagrantly ill-advised.' "

Now, with its planned $1.65 billion acquisition of the video site YouTube, which contains not just homemade videos but also copyrighted clips that users upload without permission, some observers say Google is exposing itself to a new spate of lawsuits.

Along with YouTube's 34 million viewers, Google will inherit a lawsuit filed last summer against the company. Robert Tur, who owns a video from the 1992 riots in Los Angeles that shows a trucker being beaten by rioters, is suing YouTube, accusing it of copyright infringement.

"Clearly, we investigated that whole issue," said David C. Drummond, Google's general counsel and senior vice president of corporate development. Mr. Drummond pointed to the "safe harbor" provision of the 1998 Digital Millennium Copyright Act. A number of courts have held that under this provision, Web sites are not liable for copyrighted content posted by users, as long as they promptly remove it when it is pointed out to them.

"We rely on the same safe harbor that YouTube relies on, so we're fairly familiar with the issues," Mr. Drummond said. "If you look at it, it's somewhat illustrative of the kinds of lawsuits we face."

Google has been known to settle, but for the most part it aggressively fights litigation — so far with a good deal of success.

Over the last few years, the company has spent millions in legal fees and hired a small army of bright young lawyers, many of them technically proficient and experts in the field of intellectual property.

The company's legal department has grown from one lawyer in 2001 to nearly 100 lawyers now, not just at its headquarters in Mountain View, Calif., but also overseas. The company has also retained counsel at many outside law firms.

Many of the lawsuits Google is facing carry little weight. Yet it has a vested interest in fighting all of them, even those of questionable merit, and seeing that they are resolved quickly. In part, this is because any lawsuit that reaches the discovery, the pretrial fact-finding phase, poses the danger of revealing too much about Google's proprietary technology. Google also has an interest in establishing a solid body of legal interpretation in its favor.

Many of the plaintiffs are asking for damages, but money is not always the issue. There are several cases, focusing on questions of intellectual property and trademark protection, that challenge Google's whole way of doing business. These plaintiffs are suing Google to protect their well-established practices; their interest is not so much in remuneration as it is in getting Google to change its approach.

Peter S. Menell, a professor at Boalt Hall School of Law at the University of California, Berkeley, said that although Google's well-established core search functions are not at risk, "there are a number of areas now in which new and exciting business models are being threatened."

Cases addressing trademark protection in Google's ad system could hurt its bottom line, as the company's revenue comes mainly from advertising sales, said Eric Goldman, director of the High Tech Law Institute at the Santa Clara University School of Law in California.

In one of the most important such cases to date, last year a federal judge in Alexandria, Va., dismissed a claim by Geico, the auto insurance company. Geico said that a Google policy of permitting Geico's competitors to buy advertisements tied to searches for the keywords "Geico" and "Geico Direct" confused Web surfers looking for the company's site. The two companies settled the case before the judge reached a full decision on the other issues involved.

"This is Google's cash cow," Professor Goldman said. "If they can't sell keywords freely, they're not worth their market valuation."

Michael Kwun, a senior litigation counsel at Google, agreed that "the Geico case was very important." Mr. Kwun said that establishing a body of precedent was a priority for Google, especially as legal interpretations continued to evolve. "If we don't at least litigate to the point where we get rulings on the issues that matter to us, we're left with less clarity in the law," he said.

Yet in the course of a long run of legal triumphs there have been a few bumps, and Google is facing some uncertain outcomes in the coming months.

Copyright challenges are at the center of the uncertainty. In one case that could have large ramifications, Perfect 10, a publisher of pornographic magazines and Web sites, sued Google for using thumbnail-sized reproductions of photos in its image search results, among other things.

Earlier this year, a Federal District Court judge in California said Google had violated copyright because it had undermined Perfect 10's ability to license those images for sale to mobile phone users, and he issued a preliminary injunction. Google appealed the decision, and oral arguments before the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit are scheduled for next month.

Google's use of snippets of copyrighted works has also raised the ire of news outlets.

Last month, a Belgian court ordered Google to stop publishing headlines from Belgian newspapers without permission or payment of fees. And in a case pending in a Federal District Court in Washington, Agence France-Presse is suing Google, accusing it of violating its copyright by using its headlines, photographs and story fragments in Google News.

Google is arguing that news headlines and short phrases are not copyrightable.

"From our perspective, these are simple issues that were decided a long time ago," said Alex Macgillivray, 34, whose title at Google is senior product counsel.

The company is making the same argument in cases pending against its book search service. Representatives of publishers and authors are challenging the company's practice of scanning books that are still under copyright. They argue that because Google must copy an entire book to make it searchable, it is violating the copyright of the author or publisher if it does so without permission.

Google has offered to let publishers opt out of the book search program but has refused to ask permission to make the copies in advance.

DOJ_NMG_0084905

Google has been known to settle cases. But in general it mounts a vigorous defense, Mr. Goldman said. "If they get sued, they turn the tables on the plaintiff and file motions to get the upper hand in the case," he said.

Last spring, KinderStart, a small search engine in Southern California that focuses on information for parents of young children, sued Google after it noticed that its site had been removed from Google's search results — leading to a loss of traffic and revenue for the company.

Google said in court filings that an area of the site that permitted visitors to add links had been full of pointers to low-quality or pornographic sites, indicating that it was poorly maintained or was an effort to manipulate Google's search results. KinderStart said the removal was unfair and unjustified and that Google's guidelines on ways to avoid such punishment were too vague.

A federal judge in San Jose dismissed the first version of the complaint, in essence agreeing with Google that the company is free to shape its search results in any way it chooses. KinderStart has filed a second, amended complaint, which is scheduled to be heard by the same judge on Friday.

"We're not against innovation at all," said Gregory J. Yu, a lawyer for KinderStart. "But Google should not dictate what we should or should not see and find on the Web. They can knock off these small Web sites and there's nothing the small Web sites can do."

In the KinderStart case, Google was quick to take the offensive. Shortly after the lawsuit was filed last spring, Google responded with a motion that, if granted, would throw out several of KinderStart's claims and require KinderStart to cover Google's legal fees. The judge deferred consideration of the motion.

Professor Zittrain of Oxford said Google's corporate mantra — "to organize the world's information and make it universally accessible" — gives some insight into its approach.

"They actually see that as Promethean," Mr. Zittrain said. "They think of it as bringing fire to humankind. And it may even cause them to be bolder than other companies."

Google's legal muscle and shrewdness are not lost on those on the other side of the fights.

"We've got a formidable legal team, but obviously it's nowhere near the unlimited resources of Google," said David A. Milman, the chief executive of Rescuecom, a nationwide computer repair company that sued Google on trademark infringement grounds similar to Geico's — and quickly lost. The company said that it would appeal the decision.

"People say you can't fight the government," Mr. Milman said. "Google, in this case, is very similar to the government. They're the government of the Internet."

Icahn Ally Gets ImClone Seat (USAT/BLOOM)

By Lisa Rapaport And Angela Zimm

USA Today, October 23, 2006

Billionaire investor Carl Icahn moved closer to gaining control of ImClone Systems with the naming of an additional ally to the biotechnology company's board.

The new director, pediatric surgeon Peter Liebert, fills one of the vacancies created with the departure earlier this month of William Crouse and Chairman David Kies, ImClone said Friday in a statement.

The second opening won't be filled, reducing the number of seats to 11. Icahn and his associates now hold five.

Icahn, 70, said earlier this week he had two-thirds of the support needed to oust interim Chief Executive Officer Joseph Fischer and three other directors, which would cut the size of the board to seven. Since August, Icahn has been raising his ownership and pushing to install an experienced biotech CEO to expand sales of ImClone's only product, the cancer drug Erbitux.

"The stock hasn't responded much because the market is not putting much faith in Icahn's ability to operate here," said Les Funtleyder, an analyst with Miller Tabak in New York. "Either investors don't think Icahn can get the full board, or they think options for ImClone are limited even if he does get full control."

Shares of ImClone fell 17 cents to close at $29.74 in Nasdaq composite trading Friday. The stock has declined 13% this year.

DOJ_NMG_0084906

The New York-based company's second-biggest shareholder, with 14%, Icahn won election to the board Sept. 20. He had pushed for the resignation of Kies and Crouse. ImClone's biggest holder is Bristol-Myers Squibb, with 17%.

Icahn said earlier last week in a letter to shareholders that ImClone's management made several "missteps."

The company failed to push "an aggressive development program" for Erbitux, he said, and he criticized the board for hiring a "string of CEOs who failed to act."

The board includes two directors Icahn isn't trying to remove who aren't his associates: Andrew Bodnar, a senior vice president of New York-based Bristol-Myers, and David Sidransky, ImClone's vice chairman and a cancer doctor at the Johns Hopkins University medical school in Baltimore.

China Asserts Patent Rights In US Courts (FT)

By Patti Waldmeir

Financial Times, October 23, 2006

Chinese companies have begun to defend their patent rights increasingly aggressively in US courts, legal experts say.

"Within the past year or two, the Chinese have begun standing up for themselves and testing the limits of intellectual property rights that are asserted against them," says Mark Hogge, a patent attorney at the law firm Greenberg Traurig. "They are learning the rules of engagement in the US marketplace and that includes intellectual property litigation."

Some Chinese companies are even going on the offensive in the US for the first time, and filing their own patent lawsuits against US competitors.

This year, Netac, a manufacturer of computer flash memory products based in Shenzhen, China, brought a patent suit against a New Jersey rival in a federal court in Texas, in what is believed to be the first time that a mainland Chinese company has sued an American one for patent infringement.

"This could be a harbinger of things to come," says Tony Chen, a US-trained patent attorney in the Shanghai office of the US law firm, Jones Day. "Chinese companies are treating intellectual property lawsuits as an effective competition tool in the marketplace."

Tom Jarvis, a patent attorney at the US law firm Finnegan Henderson Farabow Garrett & Dunner, who practices before the US International Trade Commission (ITC), where many patent disputes involving China are heard, predicts that "within five years the number of patent litigations instigated by Chinese companies in the US will grow exponentially".

US companies can challenge the importation of Chinese products before the ITC, alleging that they infringe a US patent practiced by a US company. But Chinese companies can use the ITC too, he says, if they believe a US company is violating their patent rights in the US market.

He says China is increasingly the target of litigation at the ITC, with the number of claims against mainland Chinese companies multiplying rapidly since 2000.

Historically, Chinese companies did not aggressively defend themselves against such suits, usually agreeing to settle, design around the disputed patent, or fail to show up and lose by default.

"Over the past 10 years, patent owners have won in about half of ITC cases against Chinese companies, but in the other half, Chinese companies have either won, forced the patent owner to withdraw the complaint, or obtained an agreed-upon settlement," says Mr Jarvis.

"The Chinese are now at a place where they aren't taking the hit and are going to take a stand," says Mr Hogge. Like Japan, Korea and Taiwan before it, China is becoming more aggressive in protecting its intellectual property as Chinese industry becomes more sophisticated, moving away from copying foreign products and towards innovation.

The increasing importance of intellectual property to Chinese companies was demonstrated earlier this month by figures from the World Intellectual Property Organisation (WIPO), showing patent filings in China (half of them by Chinese) have increased sevenfold in the past 10 years.

Getting sued for patent infringement in the US is very costly, but it can have benefits, says Mr Chen. Chinese companies are increasingly realising "it may not be a bad thing to be a defendant in a lawsuit because we get free publicity".

Report: BP Knew Texas City Risk Before Blast (MRKTWTCH)

Market Watch, October 23, 2006

LONDON (MarketWatch) -- An internal BP PLC (BP) report two years ago acknowledged that to save money the company failed to tackle known risks at its Texas City refinery in the U.S., the U.S. Chemical Safety and Hazard Investigation Board may say in its report on a March 2005 explosion at the facility which killed 15 workers, British Broadcasting Corp. reported Sunday.

The BBC's File On Four investigative radio program to be broadcast Tuesday at 1900 GMT said the safety watchdog, which has yet to issue its final report on the explosion, "alleges BP failed to learn from a string of dangerous events at Texas City going back to the 1990s".

The program's reporter Julian O'Halloran said the board "cites an internal BP audit two years ago that to save money the company was failing to tackle known risks."

BP, he added, had declined to comment, saying the board had yet to issue its final report or consult the company on its finding.

BP has been under growing scrutiny from regulators and the press in the wake of a series of operational and governance problems in the U.S.

Texas City has been among its biggest headaches.

Company-generated reports on the 2005 accident pointed to poor management and a lack of hazard awareness. Regulators have been scathing in assessing the company's record at the plant; the Occupational Health and Safety Administration referred the case to the Justice Department for a criminal investigation.

Plaintiffs' attorneys are to argue in litigation that the explosion was caused by management lapses so egregious they trigger the penal code.

Faced with a burgeoning slate of operational and governance problems in the U.S., the U.K. oil giant is feverishly trying to settle remaining suits emanating from the explosion that killed 15 workers and injured as many as 170. The goal is to avert a bruising courtroom showdown, due in November, with victims and family members who lost loved ones in one of the worst industrial accidents in recent years.

BP recently appointed a new refinery manager at the 460,000 barrel-a-day capacity Texas City plant. BP has broadly accepted responsibility for the explosion, which occurred on March 23, 2005 during the botched restart of a processing unit used to produce octane for gasoline. The company cited weak management, murky communications and "a poor level of hazard awareness," according to a 192-page report released by BP in December 2005.

A Reason To Drill In The Gulf (opinion) (NYT)

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

It is time to make a serious effort to save the vanishing wetlands and barrier islands along the coast of Louisiana. The best chance is a bill passed by the Senate that would guarantee Louisiana and three other coastal states a share of oil and gas revenues from drilling in the Gulf of Mexico. The states would be expected to use the proceeds largely for coastal restoration and related projects. The House should adopt this measure in its present form during the coming lame-duck session, and President Bush should sign it.

Since the deluge of Hurricane Katrina anniversary coverage in August, there has been very little talk about the safety of New Orleans and the surrounding region. In fact, the city and the region are more vulnerable than ever.

Even before last year's storms, the wetlands and barrier islands that provide a protective buffer were eroding at a rate of 25 square miles a year — the result of a half-century of calamitous mismanagement of Mississippi River water flows. Katrina and Rita together snatched away another 217 square miles. Levees, of course, are necessary to protect New Orleans and other low-lying areas, but they are only the final line of defense. Healthy wetlands are essential to any long-term plan.

The Senate bill — whose principal architect is Mary Landrieu, a Louisiana Democrat — would open up 8.3 million acres of the Gulf of Mexico to new oil and gas development. Half the royalties would go to the federal treasury, 37.5 percent would go to the four coastal states, and the rest would go into a fund to help other states purchase open space.

Our support for this bill should not be taken as a blanket endorsement of offshore drilling — nor as an endorsement of a mischievous bill sponsored by Representative Richard Pombo, Republican of California, and passed by the House last summer. The Pombo bill would end a longstanding federal moratorium on oil and gas drilling on the entire American coastline. The Landrieu bill would simply enlarge the drilling area in the gulf, where oil and gas exploration has been broadly accepted for years.

Mr. Pombo is hoping that the Senate will agree to a conference committee in which the two bills can be married. But his bill is so poorly thought out as to be unacceptable, even as a starting point for compromise. A conference committee would also leave the protection of America's coastal waters to the mercy of closed-door horse trading.

Ms. Landrieu opposes any such compromise and so, to his credit, does the Senate majority leader, Bill Frist. They are hoping to persuade the House to accept and approve Ms. Landrieu's narrower bill before the present Congress comes to an end.

Is this an impossible objective?

Not if sensible people in the House think carefully about it. The Landrieu bill targets an immediate need. The House should not see it as a rival to Mr. Pombo's bill — which has no chance of passing the Senate — or, for that matter, as primarily an energy bill. The House should instead see it as a way to restore the health of a battered ecosystem, as future protection for the livelihoods of hundreds of thousands of people, and as a way to deliver on unfulfilled promises.

FBI/DEA/ATF/USMS:

Merriman Suspended After Testing Positive For Steroids (SDUT)

By Kevin Acee, Union-tribune Staff Writer

The San Diego Union-Tribune, October 23, 2006

KANSAS CITY, Mo. – Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman will be suspended for four games for violating the NFL substance abuse policy, sources close to Merriman said.

A source said the appeal process is ongoing and that there is "a reason behind this."

Said the source: "This is not the finality of it."

The positive test and suspension were first reported by ESPN.com while the team was flying home from its game in Kansas City last night. The Web site cited a source with knowledge of the test saying it was "definitely for steroids not one of those supplement deals."

ESPN later reported that both Merriman's "A" and "B" samples had come back positive.

The initial positive occurred more than a week ago.

Team officials did not return phone messages last night. Merriman did not return messages and is not expected to comment until he and his attorney have a chance to confer further.

According to ESPN.com, Merriman's suspension originally was to be announced last Tuesday when two other players – Atlanta Falcons guard Mark Lehr and Detroit Lions defensive tackle Shaun Rogers – were suspended for violating the policy. But Merriman appealed, so his suspension was not announced.

First-time offenders of the NFL's steroid policy receive a minimum four-game ban, the equivalent of one-fourth of the regular season. A second positive test fetches eight games, and a third positive gets a yearlong suspension.

In addition, according to the NFL's Policy on Anabolic Steroids, suspended players may not "participate in team activities, use the club's facilities or have contact with any club officials except to arrange off-site medical treatment."

Players also must test negative for all prohibited substances before they are reinstated.

By comparison, first-time offenders for anabolic steroids in Olympic sports face a two-year competition ban. A second offense results in a lifetime ban.

Merriman, listed at 6-foot-4, 272 pounds, was the NFL Defensive Rookie of the Year after making 10 sacks last season and was a Pro Bowl starter. His 5-½ sacks this season are second on the team.

When Merriman's suspension begins, the Chargers will be without several key players on defense.

Linebacker Shaun Phillips, who has a team-high six sacks, suffered a strained calf in yesterday's 30-27 loss to the Chiefs and is expected to miss four to six weeks.

The absence of those two could dramatically alter the approach of the Chargers' defense.

Carlos Polk and Marques Harris are expected to be the primary replacements for Phillips and Merriman. But defensive coordinator Wade Phillips could also make other changes.

Whoever steps in will not have the same pass rush ability and ability to dominate as Merriman and Phillips.

Additionally, defensive end Igor Olshansky had surgery last week to repair a torn meniscus and is out at least another two games.

Already, the team is playing this season without Steve Foley. Phillips was starting in his place after Foley was shot by an off-duty police officer the week before the season opener.

Safety Terrence Kiel missed a game earlier this season after he was arrested at the team's facility in late September and later admitted to shipping prescription codeine to Texas. Kiel earlier this month pleaded not guilty to five felony charges.

Chargers' Merriman Is Facing Suspension (WP)

By Mark Maske, Washington Post Staff Writer

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

Star Reportedly Failed Steroid Test

San Diego Chargers defensive end-linebacker Shawne Merriman is facing a four-game suspension by the NFL for a positive result under the league's steroid-testing program, two sources familiar with the test result said last night.

Merriman and his representatives still are appealing the suspension, said the sources, who spoke on the condition of anonymity because results of players' drug tests are confidential.

ESPN first reported last night that Merriman had been informed of the positive test but the suspension had not been imposed because an appeal by Merriman was pending. The positive test was for steroids, not a related supplement, and was to be announced last week before Merriman appealed, ESPN reported.

Merriman and Chargers officials were not immediately available to comment as the team traveled back to San Diego after yesterday's loss at Kansas City.

Merriman, a Washington native and a graduate of Douglass High School in Upper Marlboro, is in his second NFL season after being selected in the first round of last year's draft from the University of Maryland. He has established himself as one of the league's top pass rushers. He had 10 sacks and was the NFL's defensive rookie of the year and a Pro Bowl starter last season and has 5 1/2 sacks in six games this season.

Under the NFL's policy on steroids and related substances, a player is suspended for four games without pay for a first positive test. Two other NFL players -- Atlanta Falcons guard Matt Lehr and Detroit Lions defensive tackle Shaun Rogers -- were suspended last week under the policy.

Sources: Chargers' Merriman Suspended For Steroids (KABC)

KABC-TV, October 23, 2006

Chargers linebacker Shawne Merriman has been notified he will be suspended for four games for violating the NFL's steroids and related substances policy, league and team sources told ESPN's Chris Mortensen.

Merriman's positive test was "definitely for steroids ... not one of those supplement deals," said a source with knowledge of Merriman's suspension.

Merriman, 22, was the NFL Defensive Rookie of the Year last season and started in the Pro Bowl after recording 54 tackles and 10 sacks. He also finished with five passes defended and two forced fumbles. Through six games this season, Merriman was second on the Chargers with 5.5 sacks.

The San Diego linebacker has acquired the nickname "Lights Out" for his hard hits and aggressive demeanor.

"Shawne, of course, he's something," Chargers coach Marty Schottenheimer said after Merriman won top honors for first-year players. "He's an extremely talented young man who brings it every snap. ... He's very, very competitive."

Merriman's suspension originally was to be announced last Tuesday when two other NFL players -- the Falcons' Matt Lehr and the Lions' Shaun Rogers -- were suspended for violating the policy. But Merriman reserved the right to appeal his suspension, so it was not announced.

"Per the collective bargaining agreement, the Chargers aren't allowed to comment on reports or results involving the league's substance abuse policy," Chargers spokesman Bill Johnston said Sunday night.

Merriman's suspension is the latest on a laundry list of on- and off-the-field issues Schottenheimer has had to deal with this season.

From a strictly football standpoint, Merriman's four-game absence decimates a San Diego defense already reeling from injuries.

Linebacker Steve Foley was shot in the leg by a off-duty police officer on Sept. 3 and was subsequently placed on injured reserve. Foley's replacement, Shaun Phillips, injured his right calf in Sunday's 30-27 loss to Kansas City and will be out four to six weeks.

In addition, defensive end Igor Olshansky is out after having arthroscopic knee surgery and is likely to miss a month.

Off the field, the situation has been at least as devastating.

Safety Terrence Kiel is currently facing five felony drug charges relating to the shipping and possession of large quantities of prescription cough syrup, which is a controlled substance. Although Drug Enforcement Administration investigators said Kiel admitted he shipped at least two packages and knew of the contents, Kiel pleaded not guilty at his arraignment earlier this month.

Foley, meanwhile, has been charged with two counts of misdemeanor DUI stemming from his confrontation with an off-duty Coronado, Calif., police officer.

Police said that Foley, who, according to his agent, David Levine, is currently unable to walk or stand without assistance, had been partying in downtown San Diego and registered a blood-alcohol level of .233 percent, nearly three times California's legal limit of .08 percent.

The charges carry enhancements that include being charged with DUI within 10 years of a prior conviction and having a blood-alcohol level exceeding .15.

Foley has been arrested at least five times since 1999, including cases that police say involved alcohol and confrontations with officers.

Information from The Associated Press was used in this report.

Report: Chargers' Merriman Suspended For Steroids (SN)

Sports Network, October 23, 2006

San Diego, CA (Sports Network) - San Diego Chargers standout linebacker Shawne Merriman will reportedly be suspended for four games for violating the NFL's substance abuse policy.

The San Diego Union-Tribune reported a source saying there "is a reason behind this."

ESPN first reported the suspension of Merriman, stating the linebacker's "A" and "B" samples came back positive.

Merriman, who was the NFL's Defensive Rookie of the Year, had 10 sacks last season. He started Sunday's 30-27 loss at Kansas City and finished with eight tackles, second-most on the club. He has 5 1/2 sacks this season.

If the suspension is announced this week, Merriman wouldn't be eligible to return to the Chargers until the November 26 home game against Oakland.

San Diego has a 4-2 record going into Sunday's home game against St. Louis.

The Union-Tribune also reported linebacker Shaun Phillips, who has a team-best six sacks, will be out the next 4-to-6 weeks due to a strained calf muscle he suffered in the game at Kansas City.

Records Detail Cocaine Scheme (HTRIB)

The Herald Tribune (Southwest Florida), October 21, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0084911

SARASOTA -- Three men met at the Ritz-Carlton in February to talk business -- the sale of several kilos of cocaine, and a way to launder drug money to leave no trace of the crime -- according to federal court records released Friday.

At the meeting, Luciano Angrilli, a manager of Khrome nightclub, bragged his boss could launder the drug sale proceeds because he is a "miracle worker" who owns all the Jackson Hewitt Tax Offices from Tampa to Venice, the records show.

Angrilli's boast was recorded by one of the men, a police informant wearing a wire, as part of a yearlong investigation that's still under way. It involves 10 kilograms of cocaine, $280,000 in cash and wire transfers, and a Sarasota businessman now charged with money laundering.

Angrilli was arrested on drug possession charges when he went to a commercial storage warehouse to load the cocaine into his trunk, the records say. The friend who drove him there, Michael Parsons, is also charged.

The same day, agents searched the office of Daniel Prewett, 56, of Sarasota, owner of a Jackson Hewitt accounting office. Prewett is accused of being the head of a local drug distribution ring, and faces charges that he laundered drug money through his accounting business.

Prewett, a felon who did time in a New York prison for a tax-fraud scheme, is involved in dozens of local businesses run from his Jackson Hewitt office at Clark and Beneva roads. He is also president of an investment company and another firm called J.H. Accounting, state records show.

The investigation into Prewett started with a tip that he provided money to buy large amounts of cocaine and ecstasy through Angrilli, a manager at his two nightclubs, Khrome and Ecstasy.

At the meeting at the Ritz, the two informants gave Angrilli a peek at $200,000 in cash, which earned them a meeting with Prewett, the court records show.

Prewett was recorded discussing different ways he could launder the money and transfer it to a bank account, explaining that he would have to be able to prove where the money came from, the records show.

There was talk of setting up a fake loan, then providing documentation that the loan had been paid off and then wiring the money to them a few days later.

Prewett agreed to launder the proceeds for a 10 percent commission, the complaint states.

An undercover DEA agent delivered $100,000 of supposed drug money to Prewett two times with the informants, and both times Prewett wired $90,000 to an undercover DEA account from an account belonging to J.H. Investment Services Inc., the records show.

On Oct. 10, an informant agreed to sell Angrilli 5 kilograms of cocaine for $80,000, and the next day the undercover account received a wire transfer for that amount from J.H. Investment Services.

Agents arranged the pickup at a commercial storage building on 17th Street on Monday and put the cocaine in 5-pound cardboard barrels. Michael Parsons was driving the car Angrilli arrived in.

Angrilli put one barrel in the trunk and Parsons put a second one in. Agents and detectives then arrested them, the records say.

Prewett agreed to answer questions when his office was searched that same day, and admitted to wiring the $80,000 to purchase the cocaine, the complaint states.

Doctor To Go To Prison On Drug Charges (JHN)

Joliet Herald News, October 21, 2006

A federal judge on Thursday sentenced a doctor who practiced in Dwight and Wilmington to six months in prison after he pled guilty to narcotics charges.

Dr. Parambaloth Edwin entered the guilty plea in August, about 10 days before he was to stand trial on 12 charges of distributing to patients the prescription painkiller hydrocodone, the generic name for Vicodin. He also faced five charges of failing to keep accurate records for 50,000 doses of hydrocodone, a controlled substance.

Judge Samuel Der-Yeghiayan imposed the maximum under federal sentencing guidelines though Edwin, sought probation. The judge also issued a $5,000 fine, said an assistant U.S. attorney in the Chicago office of the Northern Illinois district.

Edwin pled guilty to the five record-keeping charges and prosecutors agreed to drop the 12 distribution charges, said Madeleine Murphy, who handled the case. Edwin, 66, lives in Dwight and had an office there, though the charges were made about his practice in Wilmington.

Edwin will surrender to federal prison officials Jan. 8, 2007, she said. After he serves the prison term, he will be on one-year of supervised release, which includes reporting to a probation officer, Murphy said.

The Illinois Department of Professional Regulations suspended Edwin's medical license in 2003. In the plea agreement, Edwin promised not to seek a new license until at least April, 2009, Murphy said.

The Drug Enforcement Administration audit of Edwin's practice for 16 months found he had purchased 350,000 hydrocodone tablets and could not account for 50,000 tablets, Murphy said. Vicodin is used after dental procedures and car accidents, with the intention of dealing with short-term pain, she said.

Officials in Will and Grundy counties became suspicious of Edwin after six of his patients died. Federal agents had raided Edwin's Wilmington office and seized records in 2003. Edwin was indicted in June 2005.

Slain Man's Fugitive Brother To Be Sought At Funeral (PALMBEACHP)

By Allyson Bird, Palm Beach Post Staff Writer

Palm Beach Post (FL), October 21, 2006

As family members say goodbye to Jose Luis Escobedo, his wife, Yessica, and their two toddler boys, Luis Damian and Luis Julian, in Brownsville, Texas, Monday, authorities will keep a close watch at the funeral for Escobedo's younger brother.

Jose Manuel Escobedo was sentenced to 10 years in federal prison for conspiracy to distribute cocaine in 2003. Labeled an escapee by the federal Bureau of Prisons, he disappeared on his way to a work camp seven months ago.

Family slain

Jose and Yessica Escobedo with sons Luis Damian and Luis Julian.

Husband, wife and two children from Greenacres found shot to death off Florida's Turnpike in northern Port St. Lucie. Puzzled police searching for clues.

The younger brother arrived at Oakdale Correctional Complex in Louisiana, a minimum security prison, in March 2005. Rolando Jimenez, an executive assistant at the facility, said Escobedo had no discipline problems and took public transportation to transfer to a work camp less than a year after arriving at Oakdale. But he never reported to the work camp.

The younger Escobedo was born one day short of exactly one year after his 29-year-old brother. His Oct. 13 birthday is the day his brother, his sister-in-law and his 3- and 4-year-old nephews were shot to death alongside Florida's Turnpike in Port St. Lucie.

A Drug Enforcement Administration spokesman from Houston would not comment on a possible connection between Jose Luis Escobedo's death and his brother's drug-trafficking past.

Rita Flores, the Escobedos' sister, said the family has not heard from Jose Manuel and does not know where he is. The family also didn't know about extra security planned for the funeral services.

Brownsville police Lt. James Paschall said officers will be on hand not only to provide traffic control and relief from the heat, but also to be on the lookout for Jose Manuel Escobedo.

While the younger brother has no arrest record in Brownsville, Paschall said his arrest on federal charges in 2003 was a "big story" in the border town.

"We are familiar with him," Paschall said. "We'll get real excited if he does show up."

Paschall had not heard of any sightings of the younger Escobedo since his escape.

Jose Manuel Escobedo's 2003 indictment shows that he and two other men planned to sell at least 5 kilograms of cocaine, worth as much as $150,000, between 2002 and 2003.

Robert Hobbs, assistant U.S. attorney for the eastern district of Texas, prosecuted Escobedo during the sentencing phase of his trial. He said Escobedo and the two other men were part of a second round of nearly 20 indictments.

Hobbs said Escobedo "was one of the suppliers selling large quantities of cocaine" in the Houston area.

DOJ_NMG_0084913

He said defendants from Brownsville, such as Escobedo, are often part of the notorious Gulf cocaine cartel, which has a hub directly across the border in Matamoros, Mexico. Hobbs did not know whether Escobedo was involved in the cartel.

Hobbs said Houston, where Escobedo was arrested, has replaced Miami as the country's drug capital.

"Houston is a source city," Hobbs said. "Along the Texas-Mexico border, it has supplanted (Miami)."

The St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office declined to comment on Friday.

The Jose Luis Escobedo family moved to Greenacres in June and rented a home. Three days after they were slain, their Jeep Cherokee was found in a warehouse district in West Palm Beach.

Police Want To Question Brother Of Murdered Man (MH)

The Miami Herald, October 23, 2006

The first hint of a possible clue in the killings of a family of four along Florida's Turnpike two weeks ago has emerged.

Police want to question the fugitive brother of the man killed along with his wife and their two young sons and left on a grassy knoll off the turnpike early Oct. 13 in Port St. Lucie, The Palm Beach Post has reported.

The paper said José Manuel Escobedo, a convicted drug dealer and younger brother of slain José Luis Escobedo, 28, has been at large since he disappeared on his way to a work camp in Louisiana seven months ago. He had been sentenced to 10 years in prison for conspiracy to distribute cocaine in 2003.

Federal and Florida investigators have not suggested a motive for the killings, and it's unknown if the brothers had been in contact.

Four months ago, José Luis Escobedo had moved his family to Greenacres in Palm Beach County from Brownsville, Texas.

A spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Houston declined to comment on a possible connection between the brother's past and the four killings, according to The Associated Press.

On Sunday at the viewing for the slain family in Brownsville, police were present and on the lookout for the fugitive brother. The services were attended primarily by relatives, who were concerned about intrusive photographers.

"They wanted it private, but there are a lot of reporters from Florida and San Antonio," said Roy Vento, director of the funeral home. ``They didn't want them inside the funeral homes, especially if that meant taking pictures of the caskets or the bodies in the caskets."

FUNERALS FOR FAMILY

Funerals are today for the young father, his wife, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, 25, and the couple's sons, Luis Julián, 4, and Luis Damián, 3.

The Post said authorities in Brownsville will also keep a close watch at the service and burial for Escobedo's younger brother.

According to The Post, the younger brother arrived at Oakdale Correctional Complex in Louisiana, a minimum security prison, in March 2005.

Rolando Jimenez, an executive assistant at the facility, said Escobedo had no discipline problems and took public transportation to transfer to a work camp less than a year after arriving at Oakdale. But he never reported to the work camp, The Post said.

The slayings occurred on the fugitive brother's birthday -- Oct. 13.

Rita Flores, the Escobedos' sister, said the family has not heard from José Manuel and does not know where he is. The family also didn't know about extra security planned for the funeral services.

Brownsville police Lt. James Paschall said officers will be on hand not only to provide traffic control and relief from the heat, but also to be on the lookout for José Manuel.

While the younger brother has no arrest record in Brownsville, Paschall said his arrest on federal charges in 2003 was a "big story" in the border town. "We are familiar with him," Paschall said. ``We'll get real excited if he does show up."

Paschall had not heard of any sightings of the younger Escobedo since his escape.

José Manuel Escobedo's 2003 indictment shows that he and two other men planned to sell at least five kilograms of cocaine, worth as much as $150,000, between 2002 and 2003.

COCAINE DEALER

Hobbs said Escobedo "was one of the suppliers selling large quantities of cocaine" in the Houston area.

He said defendants from Brownsville, such as Escobedo, are often part of the notorious Gulf cocaine cartel, which has a hub directly across the border in Matamoros, Mexico. Hobbs did not know whether Escobedo was involved in the cartel.

"Houston is a source city," Hobbs said. ``Along the Texas-Mexico border, it has supplanted [Miami]."

Three days after they were slain and left on turnpike, the St. Lucie County Sheriff's Office announced the family's Jeep Cherokee was found in a warehouse district in West Palm Beach.

Visitation Held For Texas Family Found Dead In Fla. (AP)

AP, October 23, 2006

BROWNSVILLE - A visitation for four family members found shot to death along a Florida highway was attended primarily by relatives, who were concerned about intrusive photographers.

"They wanted it private, but there are a lot of reporters from Florida and San Antonio," said Roy Vento, director of the funeral home. "They didn't want them inside the funeral homes, especially if that meant taking pictures of the caskets or the bodies in the caskets."

Funeral services for Jose Luis Escobedo, 28, Yessica Guerrero Escobedo, 25, and the couple's sons, Luis Julian, 4, and Luis Damian, 3, were scheduled for Monday.

Their bodies were found Oct. 13 in a grassy area off the Florida Turnpike in Port St. Lucie.

Both parents graduated from high school in Brownsville. They had moved to Florida just four months ago.

Federal and Florida investigators have not suggested a motive for the killings.

The Palm Beach (Fla.) Post reported Saturday that police would watch Monday's funeral in search of Jose Manuel Escobedo, the fugitive brother of Jose Luis Escobedo. The paper said he was sentenced in 2003 to 10 years in prison for conspiracy to distribute cocaine, but he disappeared on his way to a work camp in Louisiana seven months ago.

A spokesman for the Drug Enforcement Administration in Houston declined to comment on a possible connection the brother's past and the four killings.

Police, Sheriff Get $260,937 In Drug Money (NA)

Goldsboro News Argus, October 22, 2006

Clutching a large white check for their share of $1.2 million seized from drug dealers, Goldsboro Police Chief Tim Bell and Wayne County Sheriff Carey Winders vowed to continue their fight to eliminate drugs.

Drug Enforcement Administration Assistant Special Agent in Charge John Emerson presented checks to Bell and Winders for $260,937.63. The checks were handed out on the second floor of City Hall at 11:30 a.m. Friday.

The checks distributed represented the departments share of money seized from drug traffickers, Emerson said. The money was seized in several states including Georgia and North Carolina and was part of an investigation conducted by the DEA and the Goldsboro-Wayne County Drug Squad, Emerson added.

"Drug traffickers sell their drugs here and then the money is brought back across the country into Mexico," Emerson said. "If we don't get the drugs and they've already sold the drugs then we are trying to intercept that money coming back, so they can't use that money to buy more drugs and bring it back to the states."

Emerson said a portion of the money was seized from local drug dealers.

"The bad guys were here, but they were connected with drug traffickers who were also in Atlanta," he said. "There were seizures in Atlanta and there were seizures here. We totaled those seizures up and then there's an asset-sharing percentage based on work hours and that resulted in the check distributions."

DOJ_NMG_0084915

Bell and Winders lauded the work of the drug squad who helped seize the $1.2 million. The drug squad is comprised of four officers from the city and four deputies from the county.

Bell said the money will be put to good use.

"The funds will be used to further our drug enforcement efforts," Bell said.

Winders said it took a collective effort from the Wayne County Sheriff's Office, the Goldsboro Police Department, the U.S. Marshals Service, DEA and U.S. Customs to make the outcome of the drug trafficking investigation a success.

Winders said the agencies targeted a major drug operation.

"This operation extended all the way to Mexico, Georgia, Texas and different areas," Winders said. "It was a big organization. In fact, it was one of the largest operations in eastern North Carolina and it was awarded as such."

Bell said working with the DEA gives the drug squad a larger advantage in the fight against drugs because it allows the drug squad to extend their jurisdiction outside of Wayne County.

Bell added that working with the DEA allows the drug squad to follow the flow of money and the drugs, and it allows the squad to target upper level drug dealers.

Winders said upper level dealers are one of their main targets.

"Everybody talks about the one that's very visible, the street dealer, but he's getting it from someone and that's what we want to find out," Winders said. "That's what we're targeting. Where the street dealer is getting it. Target that person. Because without the supplier, the street dealer won't be in business long."

The money awarded signified a major accomplishment for the drug squad, but Bell said their work is far from over.

"We're looking forward to putting more drug dealers in jail," he said.

Chronicle May Pay Fines In Steroid Case (SFBIZ)

San Francisco Business Times, October 23, 2006

The San Francisco Chronicle faces fines of up to a half-million dollars or more for refusing to reveal who leaked information to two Chronicle reporters regarding grand jury testimony on steroid use by Barry Bonds and other professional athletes, according to a court filing reported by the Associated Press.

The paper also agreed to be held in contempt of court. Prosecutors agreed to stay the fines pending the outcome of a an appeal in the case.

The newspaper, citing First Amendment protections, has refused to abide by a grand jury subpoena ordering it to release any information it has on the reporters' sources.

The two Chronicle reporters, Lance Williams and Mark Fainaru-Wada, wrote about Bonds' 2003 federal grand jury testimony. Williams and Fainaru-Wada also agreed to be held in contempt, pending appeal.

The grand jury was investigating the BALCO steroid ring.

The reporters could be jailed for as much as 18 months. A federal judge rejected their claim of First Amendment protection from orders to reveal sources.

If the deal is approved by U.S. District Judge Jeffrey White, the Chronicle could have to pay a fine of at least $1,000 per day, for up to 18 months -- around $540,000.

Authorities Say Over 15 Tons Of Drugs Seized In Afghanistan (AP)

AP, October 23, 2006

KABUL, Afghanistan Afghan authorities seized over 16 tons of drugs in the past 10 days in operations targeting smugglers in seven provinces, Afghanistan's top counter-narcotics official said Saturday.

Lt. Gen. Mohammed Daoud Daoud said the seizures included seven tons of opium, eight tons of marijuana and just over one ton of heroin.

The U.N.'s Office on Drugs and Crime said last month that cultivation of opium-producing poppies in Afghanistan rose 59 percent this year to produce a record 6,100 tons of opium — or about 92 percent of the world's supply and outstripping heroin demand by a third.

The U.N. agency said only six of Afghanistan's 34 provinces are poppy-free.

DOJ_NMG_0084916

It said some 2.9 million people were involved in growing opium, representing 12.6 percent of the total Afghan population, and that revenue from this year's harvest was predicted to hit over US$3 billion (€2.4 billion).

Daoud said that a renewed campaign with the help of local authorities is under way to convince the farmers not to grow the lucrative crop.

In The Land Of The Taliban (NYT)

By Elizabeth Rubin

The New York Times, October 22, 2006

One afternoon this past summer, I shared a picnic of fresh mangos and plums with Abdul Baqi, an Afghan Taliban fighter in his 20's fresh from the front in Helmand Province in southern Afghanistan. We spent hours on a grassy slope under the tall pines of Murree, a former colonial hill station that is now a popular resort just outside Pakistan's capital, Islamabad. All around us was a Pakistani rendition of Georges Seurat's "Sunday on La Grande Jatte" — middle-class families setting up grills for barbecue, a girl and two boys chasing their errant cow with a stick, two men hunting fowl, boys flying a kite. Much of the time, Abdul Baqi was engrossed in the flight pattern of a Himalayan bird. It must have been a welcome distraction. He had just lost five friends fighting British troops and had seen many others killed or wounded by bombs as they sheltered inside a mosque.

He was now looking forward to taking a logic course at a madrasa, or religious school, near Peshawar during his holiday. Pakistan's religious parties, he told me through an interpreter, would lodge him, as they did other Afghan Taliban fighters, and keep him safe. With us was Abdul Baqi's mentor, Mullah Sadiq, a diabetic Helmandi who was shuttling between Pakistan and Afghanistan auditing Taliban finances and arranging logistics. He had just dispatched nine fighters to Afghanistan and had taken wounded men to a hospital in Islamabad. "I just tell the border guards that they were wounded in a tribal dispute and need treatment," he told me.

And though Mullah Sadiq said they had lost many commanders in battles around Kandahar, he and Abdul Baqi appeared to be in good spirits, laughing and chatting loudly on a cellphone to Taliban friends in Pakistan and Afghanistan. After all, they never imagined that the Taliban would be back so soon or in such force or that they would be giving such trouble to the Afghan government of Hamid Karzai and some 40,000 NATO and U.S. troops in the country. For the first time since the fall of 2001, when the Taliban were overthrown, they were beginning to taste the possibility of victory.

As I traveled through Pakistan and particularly the Pashtun lands bordering Afghanistan, I felt as if I were moving through a Taliban spa for rehabilitation and inspiration. Since 2002, the American and Pakistani militaries have focused on North Waziristan and South Waziristan, two of the seven districts making up Pakistan's semiautonomous tribal areas, which are between the North-West Frontier Province and, to the south, Baluchistan Province; in the days since the 9/11 attacks, some tribes there had sheltered members of Al Qaeda and spawned their own Taliban movement. Meanwhile, in the deserts of Baluchistan, whose capital, Quetta, is just a few hours' drive from the Afghan city of Kandahar, the Afghan Taliban were openly reassembling themselves under Mullah Omar and his leadership council. Quetta had become a kind of free zone where strategies could be formed, funds picked up, interviews given and victories relished.

In June, I was in Quetta as the Taliban fighters celebrated an attack against Dad Mohammad Khan, an Afghan legislator locally known as Amir Dado. Until recently he was the intelligence chief of Helmand Province. He had worked closely with U.S. Special Forces and was despised by Abdul Baqi — and, to be frank, by most Afghans in the south. Mullah Razayar Nurzai (a nom de guerre), a commander of 300 Taliban fighters who frequently meets with the leadership council and Mullah Omar, took credit for the ambush. Because Pakistan's intelligence services are fickle — sometimes supporting the Taliban, sometimes arresting its members — I had to meet Nurzai at night, down a dark lane in a village outside Quetta.

My guide was a Pakistani Pashtun sympathetic to the Taliban; we slipped into a courtyard and behind a curtain into a small room with mattresses and a gas lamp. In hobbled a rough, wild-looking graybeard with green eyes and a prosthetic limb fitted into a permanent 1980's-era shoe. More than a quarter-century of warring had taken its toll on Nurzai's 46-year-old body but not on his spirit. It was 10 at night, yet he was bounding with energy and bombast about his recent exploits in Kandahar and Helmand. A few days earlier, Nurzai and his men had attacked Amir Dado's extended family. First, he told me, they shot dead his brother — a former district leader. Then the next day, as members of Dado's family were driving to the site of the first attack,

Nurzai's men ambushed their convoy. Boys, cousins, uncles: all were killed. Dado himself was safe elsewhere. Nurzai was mildly disappointed and said that they had received bad information. He had no regrets about the killings, however. Abdul Baqi was also delighted by the attack. He would tell me that Dado used to burn rocket casings and pour the melted plastic onto the stomachs of onetime Taliban fighters he and his men had captured. Abdul Baqi also recalled that during the civil war that ended with the Taliban's seizure of Kabul, Dado and his men had a checkpoint where they "grabbed young boys and robbed people."

Mullah Omar and his followers formed the Taliban in 1994 to, among other things, bring some justice to Afghanistan and to expel predatory commanders like Dado. But in the early days of Karzai's government, these regional warlords re-established themselves, with American financing, to fill the power vacuum that the coalition forces were unwilling to fill themselves. The warlords freely labeled their many enemies Al Qaeda or Taliban in order to push the Americans to eradicate them. Some of these men were indeed Taliban. Most, like Abdul Baqi, had accepted their loss of power, but they rejoined the Taliban as a result of harassment. Amir Dado's own abuses had eventually led to his removal from the Helmand government at United Nations insistence. As one Western diplomat, who requested anonymity out of personal safety concerns, put it: "Amir Dado kept his own prison, authorized the use of serious torture, had very little respect for human life and made security worse." Yet when I later met Amir Dado in Kabul, he pulled out a letter that an officer in the U.S. Special Forces had written requesting that the Afghan Ministry of Defense install him as Helmand's police chief and claiming that in his absence "the quality of security in the Helmand Province has dramatically declined."

One Place, Two Stories

I went to Afghanistan and Pakistan this summer to understand how and why the Taliban were making a comeback five years after American and Afghan forces drove them from power. What kind of experience would lead Afghans to reject what seemed to be an emerging democratic government? Had we missed something that made Taliban rule appealing? Were they the only opposition the aggrieved could turn to? Or, as many Afghans were saying, was this Pakistan up to its old tricks — cooperating with the Americans and Karzai while conspiring to bring back the Taliban, who had been valued "assets" before 9/11?

And why has the Bush administration's message remained that Afghanistan is a success, Iraq a challenge? "In Afghanistan, the trajectory is a hopeful and promising one," Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld wrote on the op-ed page of The Washington Post earlier this month. Afghanistan's rise from the ashes of the anti-Taliban war would mean that the Bush administration was prevailing in replacing terror with democracy and human rights.

Meanwhile, a counternarrative was emerging, and it belonged to the Taliban, or the A.C.M., as NATO officers call them — the Anti-Coalition Militia. In Kabul, Kandahar and Pakistan, I found their video discs and tapes in the markets. They invoke a nostalgia for the jihad against the Russians and inspire their viewers to rise up again. One begins with clattering Chinooks disgorging American soldiers into the desert. Then we see the new Afghan government onstage, focusing in on the Northern Alliance warlords — Abdul Rashid Dostum, Burhanuddin Rabbani, Karim Khalili, Muhammad Fahim, Ismail Khan, Abdul Sayyaf. It cuts to American soldiers doing push-ups and pinpointing targets on maps; next it shows bombs the size of bathtubs dropping from planes and missiles emblazoned with "Royal Navy" rocketing through the sky; then it moves to hospital beds and wounded children. Message: America and Britain brought back the warlords and bombed your children. In the next clip, there are metal cages under floodlights and men in orange jumpsuits, bowed and crouching. It cuts back to the wild eyes of

John Walker Lindh and shows trucks hauling containers crammed with young Afghan and Pakistani prisoners — Taliban, hundreds of whom would suffocate to death in those containers, supposedly at the command of the warlord and current army chief of staff, General Dostum. Then back to American guards wheeling hunger-striking Guantánamo prisoners on gurneys. Interspliced are older images, a bit fuzzy, of young Afghan men, hands tied behind their backs, heads bowed, hauled off by Communist guards. The message: Foreigners have invaded our lands again; Americans, Russians — no difference.

During the period from 1994 to 2001, the Taliban were a cloistered clique with little interest in global affairs. Today they are far more sophisticated and outward-looking. "The Taliban of the 90's were concerned with their district or province," says Waheed Muzhda, a senior aide at the Supreme Court in Kabul, who before the Taliban fell worked in their Foreign Ministry. "Now they have links with other networks. Before, only two Internet connections existed — one was with Mullah Omar's office and the other at the Foreign Ministry here in Kabul. Now they are connected to the world." Though this is still very much an Afghan insurgency, fueled by complex local grievances and power struggles, the films sold in the markets of Pakistan and Afghanistan merge the Taliban story with that of the larger struggle of the Muslim umma, the global community of Islam: images of U.S. soldiers in Iraq and Israelis dragging off young Palestinian men and throwing off Palestinian mothers clinging to their sons. Humiliation. Oppression. Followed by the same on Afghan soil: Northern Alliance fighters perching their guns atop the bodies of dead Taliban. In the Taliban story, Special Forces soldiers desecrate the bodies of Taliban fighters by burning them, the Koran is desecrated in Guantánamo toilets, the Prophet Muhammad is desecrated in Danish cartoons and finally an apostate, Abdul Rahman, the Afghan who was arrested earlier this year for converting to Christianity, desecrates Islam and is not only not punished but is released and flown off to Italy.

It is not at all clear that Afghans want the return of a Taliban government. But even sophisticated Kabulis told me that they are fed up with the corruption. And in the Pashtun regions, which make up about half the country, Afghans are fed up with five years of having their homes searched and the young men of their villages rounded up in the name of counterinsurgency. Earlier this month in Kabul, Gen. David Richards, the British commander of NATO's Afghanistan force, imagined what Afghans are thinking: "They will say, 'We do not want the Taliban, but then we would rather have that austere and unpleasant life that that might involve than another five years of fighting.'" He estimated that if NATO didn't succeed in bringing substantial economic development to Afghanistan soon, some 70 percent of Afghans would shift their loyalty to the Taliban.

Nation-Building, Again

In the middle of Lashkar Gah, the capital of Helmand Province, a metal sign tilts into the road advertising the New York English Language Center. It is a relic of the last American nation-building scheme. Half a century ago, this town, built at the confluence of the Arghandab and Helmand Rivers, was the headquarters for an ambitious dam project partly financed by the United States and contracted out to Morrison-Knudsen, an engineering company that helped build Cape Canaveral and the Golden Gate Bridge.

Lashkar Gah (literally, "the place of soldiers") was to be a model American town. Irrigation from the project would create farms out of the desert. Today you can still see the suburban-style homes with gardens open to the streets, although the typical Afghan home is a fort with walls guarding the family's privacy. Those modernizing dreams of America and Afghanistan were eventually defeated by nature, culture and the war to drive the Russians out of Afghanistan in the 1980's. What remains is an intense nostalgia among the engineers, cooks and farmers of Lashkar Gah, who remember that time as one of employment and peace. Today, Lashkar Gah is home to a NATO base.

Down the road from the base stands a lovely new building erected by an N.G.O. for the local Ministry of Women's Affairs. It is big, white and, on the day I visited, was empty except for three women getting ready to leave. "It's so close to the foreigners, and the women are afraid of getting killed by car bombs," the ministry's deputy told me. She was a school headmistress and landowner, dressed elegantly in a lime-colored blouse falling below the knees and worn over matching trousers. She weighed the Taliban regime against this new one in terms of pragmatic choices, not terror or ideology. She said that she had just wrapped up the case of a girl who had been kidnapped and raped by Kandahari police officers, something that would not have happened under the Taliban. "Their security was outstanding," she said.

Under the Taliban, she said, a poppy ban was enforced. "Now the governors tell the people, 'Just cultivate a little bit,'" she said. "So people take this opportunity and grow a lot." The farmers lease land to grow poppies. The British and the police eradicate it. The farmer can't pay back the landowner. "So instead of paying, he gives the landowner his daughter."

A few weeks before I arrived in Helmand, John Walters, the director of the White House Office of National Drug Control Policy, told reporters that Afghan authorities were succeeding in reducing opium-poppy cultivation. Yet despite hundreds of millions of dollars being allocated by Congress to stop the trade, a United Nations report in September estimated that this year's crop was breaking all records — 6,100 metric tons compared with 4,100 last year. When I visited Helmand, schools in Lashkar Gah were closed in part because teachers and students were busy harvesting the crop. A prosecutor from the Crimes Department laughed as he told me that his clerk, driver and bodyguard hadn't made it to work. They were all harvesting. It requires a lot of workers, and you can earn $12 a day compared with the $2 you get for wheat. Hence the hundreds of young, poor Talibs from Pakistan's madrasas who had flocked to earn that cash and who made easy converts for the coming jihad.

Walters had singled out Helmand for special praise. Yet just a short drive from the provincial capital, I was surrounded by poppy farmers — 12-year-old boys, 75-year-old men — hard at work, their hands caked in opium paste as they scooped figlike pulp off the bulbs into a sack tied around their waists. One little boy was dragging a long poppy stem attached to a car he had made out of bulbs. Haji Abdul, a 73-year-old Moses of a man, was the owner of the farm and one of those nostalgic for the heyday of the Helmand Valley project. He had worked with Americans for 15 years as a welder and manager. He was the first to bring electricity to his district. Now there was none.

"Why do you think people put mines out for the British and Italians doing eradication when they came here to save us?" He answered his own question: "Thousands of lands ready for harvest were destroyed. How difficult will it be for our people to tolerate that! You are taking the food of my children, cutting my feet and disabling me. With one bullet, I will kill you." Fortunately he didn't have to kill anyone. He had paid 2,000 afghanis per jerib (about a half acre) of land to the police, he told me, adding that they would then share the spoils with the district administrator and all the other Interior Ministry officials so that only a small percentage of the poppy would be eradicated.

When I asked Manan Farahi, the director of counterterrorism efforts for Karzai's government, why the Taliban were so strong in Helmand, he said that Helmandis had, in fact, hated the Taliban because of Mullah Omar's ban on poppy cultivation. "The elders were happy this government was coming and they could plant again," Farahi told me. "But then the warlords came back and let their militias roam freely. They were settling old scores — killing people, stealing their opium. And because they belonged to the government, the people couldn't look to the government for protection. And because they had the ear of the Americans, the people couldn't look to the Americans. Into this need stepped the Taliban." And this time the Taliban, far from suppressing the drug trade, agreed to protect it.

A Dealer's Life

The Continental Guest House in Kandahar, with its lovely gardens, potted geraniums and Internet access in every room, was mostly empty when I arrived, a remnant of the city's recently stalled economic resurgence.

To find out how the opium trade works and how it's related to the Taliban's rise, I spent the afternoon with an Afghan who told me his name was Razzaq. He is a medium-level smuggler in his late 20's who learned his trade as a refugee in Iran. He was wearing a traditional Kandahari bejeweled skull cap, a dark blazer and a white shalwar kameez, a traditional outfit consisting of loose pants covered by a tunic. He moved and spoke with the confident ease of a well-protected man. "The whole country is in our services," he told me, "all the way to Turkey." This wasn't bravado. From Mazar-i-Sharif, in northern Afghanistan, he brings opium in the form of a gooey paste, packaged in bricks. From Badakhshan in the northeast, he brings crystal — a sugary substance made from heroin. And from Jalalabad, in the east on the road to Peshawar, he brings pure heroin. All of this goes through Baramcha, an unmanned border town in Helmand near Pakistan. Sometimes he pays off the national soldiers to use their vehicles, he said. Sometimes the national policemen. Or he hides it well, and if there is a tough checkpoint, he calls ahead and pays them off. "The soldiers get 2,000 afghanis a month, and I give them 100,000," he explained with an angelic smile. "So even if I had a human head in my car, they'd let me go." It's not hard to see why Razzaq is so successful. He has a certain charm and looks like the modest tailor he once was, not a man steeped in illegal business.

Razzaq's smuggling career began in Zahedan, a remote and unruly Iranian town near the border with Afghanistan and Pakistan. It is filled with Afghan refugees who, like Razzaq and his family, fled after the Russian invasion in 1979. Razzaq apprenticed as a tailor under his father and eventually opened his own shop, which the Iranians promptly shut down. They said he had no right as a refugee to own a shop. He began painting buildings, but that, too, proved a bureaucratic challenge. He was paid in checks, and the bank refused to cash them without a bank account, which he could not get.

Razzaq was newly married with dreams of a good life for his family. So one day he took a chance. "I had gotten to know smugglers at my tailoring shop," he told me over a meal of mutton and rice on the floor of my hotel room. "One of them was an old man, so no one ever suspected him. The smugglers asked me to go with him to Gerdi Jangel" — an Afghan refugee town in Pakistan — "and bring back 750 grams of heroin to Zahedan. The security searched us on the bus, but I'd hidden it in the heels of my shoes, and of course they didn't search the old man. I was so happy when we made it back. I thought I was born for the first time into this world."

So he took another chance and managed to fly to Tehran carrying four kilos in his bag. Each time he overcame another obstacle, he became more addicted to the easy cash. When the Iranian authorities imported sniffing dogs to catch heroin smugglers, Razzaq and his friends filled hypodermic needles with some heroin dissolved in water and sprayed the liquid on cars at the bus station that would be continuing on to Tehran, Isfahan and Shiraz. "The dogs at the checkpoint went mad. They had to search 50 cars. They decided the dogs were defective and sent them back, and that saved us for a while." Eventually, he said, they concocted a substance to conceal the heroin smell from the new pack of dogs.

After the fall of the Taliban, Razzaq moved back to Helmand, built a comfortable house and began supporting his extended family with his expanding trafficking business. Razzaq's main challenge today is Iran. While the Americans have turned more or less a blind eye to the drug-trade spree of their warlord allies, Iran has steadily cranked up its drug war. (Some 3,000 Iranian lawmen have been killed in the last three decades battling traffickers.) To cross the desert borders, Razzaq moves in convoys of 18 S.U.V.'s. Some contain drugs. The rest are loaded with food supplies, antiaircraft guns, rocket launchers, antitank missiles and militiamen, often on loan from the Taliban. The fighters are Baluch from Iran and Afghanistan. The commanders are Afghans.

Razzaq's run, as he described it, was a scene out of <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="30657">"Mad Max." Three days were spent dodging and battling Iranian forces in the deserts around the earthquake-stricken city of Bam. Once they made it to Isfahan, however, in central Iran, they were home free. They released the militiamen, transferred the stuff to ordinary cars and drove to Tehran, where other smugglers picked up the drugs and passed them on to ethnic Turks in Tabriz. The Turks would bring them home, and from there they went to the markets of Europe. </object.title>

Should he ever run into a problem in Afghanistan, he told me, "I simply make a phone call. And my voice is known to ministers, of course. They are in my network. Every network has a big man supporting them in the government." The Interior Ministry's director of counternarcotics in Kabul had told me the same thing. Anyway, if the smugglers have problems on the ground, they say, they just pay the Taliban to destroy the enemy commanders.

Razzaq has at times contemplated getting out of the smuggling trade, he said, but the easy money is too alluring. Depending on the market, he can earn from $1,500 to $7,500 a month. Most Afghans can't make that in a year. Besides, he said, "all the governors are doing this, so why shouldn't we?"

Losers Become Winners

In December 2001, not long after the Taliban were routed, I visited the Shah Wali Kot district, several hours' drive on unpaved roads from Kandahar, a Mordor land of rock mountains shaped like sagging crescents and mud-baked houses melting into the dunes. The Taliban leaders had fled, mostly to Pakistan. Gul Agha Shirzai, formerly a local warlord and soon-to-be new governor, and his soldiers had swarmed into power while the Americans set up their operations base in Mullah Omar's Xanadu-like residence. I was with a large group of Populzai, the clan of the Afghan president, Hamid Karzai.

We were in a big guest room with more than a dozen men gathered in a circle, all wearing the kind of turbans that look like gargantuan ice-cream swirls. The ones in black turban swirls were giggling, chatting and slapping one another on the back. The ones in white turban swirls were sulking, grumbling or mute. In this group, the miserable white turbans were Taliban men. They had just lost their pickup trucks, weapons, money, prestige and jobs, all of which had gone to the gleeful black turbans.

Today those miserable white turbans have taken to the mountains to fight. The gleeful black turbans are under siege. I saw one of the black turbans this summer, the Shah Wali Kot district leader, in the garden of the Kandahar governor's palace. He was a mess. He chuckled loudly when I asked him how it was back in Shah Wali Kot. "Frankly, we are just defending ourselves from the Taliban," he said. "Our head is on the pillow at night, but we do not sleep."

That small division among the Populzai in Shah Wali Kot echoes the larger division of the Pashtun into two main branches: the Durrani and the Ghilzai. The Durrani, Karzai's tribe, have dominated for the last two centuries in Afghanistan and regard themselves as the ruling elite. In the south, the Ghilzai were often treated as the nomadic, scrappy cousins. With the exception of Mullah Omar, who had been a poor Ghilzai farmer, the leaders of the Taliban tended to be Durrani. These days, the perception among the southern Ghilzai is that they are persecuted, that the jails are filled with their people, while the Durrani in the south received all the Japanese, U.S. and British contracts and jobs. From what I could gather during my weeks in Afghanistan, these perceptions were mostly true. But even if they were exaggerated, such perceptions, in an illiterate society, have a way of quickly morphing into reality.

Take Panjwai, a district just outside Kandahar, where hundreds of Taliban massed this summer, taking advantage of the changeover from American soldiers to a NATO force of Canadian troops. One afternoon I met a red-haired propagandist and writer for the Taliban in a Kandahar office building. With his slight lisp, chain-smoking habit and eclectic reading — French novelists and Arabic philosophers — he seemed more a tormented graduate student than the landless villager from Panjwai he was. Panjwai is a mishmash of tribes, and the Taliban were exploiting the grievances of the Nurzai, a tribe that has felt persecuted and unfairly targeted for poppy eradication. Traders in Kandahar, he said, were donating money to the Taliban. Landowners were paying them to fight off eradicators. The Taliban were paying poor, unemployed men to fight. And religious scholars were delivering the message that it was time for jihad because the Americans were no different from the Russians. Just a few weeks earlier, the Taliban went on a killing spree in Panjwai. They beheaded a tribal leader in his home, shot another in the bazaar and hanged a man near a shrine with a note tacked on his body: <object.title class="Movie" idsrc="nyt_ttl" value="290327;46304;111485">“SPY.”</object.title>

The Taliban were feeling bold enough that one afternoon Mullah Ibrahim, a Taliban intelligence agent, dropped by my hotel for lunch. He was a Ghilzai, from Helmand, and told me he had tried to lead a normal life under the official amnesty program. Instead, he was locked up, beaten and so harassed by Helmandi intelligence and police officers that his tribal elders told him to leave for Pakistan and join the Taliban there. Then, about a year ago, he decided that he was tired of fighting and living as a fugitive and accepted a reconciliation offer from an Afghan general. Pakistani intelligence got wind of this and imprisoned him; upon his release, the Pakistanis gave him money and a motorbike and pressured him to go back to war. He is still tired of war, but the Pakistanis won’t let him live in peace, and now if he tries to reconcile with the Kabul government, he told me, the Taliban will kill him.

When fighting broke out on the main highway near Kandahar, I saw that the police had tied up a group of villagers — but the Taliban had all escaped. One of those village men, his hands bound behind his back, told me that he had peeped out from his house earlier that day and saw some 200 Taliban with new guns and rocket launchers. They wanted food and threatened him and other villagers. “But I am not afraid of them,” he said loudly. “I am only afraid of this government.” Why? “Look at what they do. They can’t get the Taliban, so they arrest us. We have no hope from them anymore. And when we call and tell them Taliban are here, no one comes.” As an engineer from Panjwai who had been an Afghan senator during the Communist era told me: “We are now like camels. In Islam, a camel can be slaughtered in two different ways.

“The Taliban are using rivalries and enmities between people to get soldiers, the same tactics as the mujahedeen used against the Russians,” the engineer continued. “Just like in Russian times they come and say, ‘We are defending the country from the infidels.’ They start asking for food. Then they ask the people for soldiers and say, ‘We will give you weapons.’ And that’s how it starts. And the emotions are rising in the people now. They are saying, ‘Kaffirs have invaded our land.’”

Qayum Karzai, the president’s older brother and a legislator from Kandahar, seemed utterly depressed when I met him. “For the last four years, the Taliban were saying that the Americans will leave here,” he said. “We were stupid and didn’t believe it. Now they think it’s a victory that the Americans left.”

With the Americans on their way out and the NATO force not yet in control, the Kandahar Police were left on the front line: underfinanced, underequipped, untrained — and often stoned. Which is perhaps what made them so brave. One afternoon I ran into a group who said their friends had just been killed when a Talib posing as a policeman served them poisoned tea. A shaggy-haired officer in a black tunic was standing by his pickup, freshly ripped up by a barrage of bullets, and staring at my feet. “I envy your shoes,” he said, looking back at his own torn rubber sandals. “I envy your Toyota,” he said and laughed. And then looking at my pen and notebook, he said, “I envy you can read and write.” It’s not too late, I offered feebly, but he tapped his temple and shook his head. “It doesn’t work anymore,” he said. “I smoke hash. I smoke opium. I’m drinking because we’re always thinking and nervous.” He was 35. He had been fighting for 20 years. Four of his friends had been killed in the fighting the other night. He had to support children, a wife and parents on a salary of about $100 a month. And, he said, “we haven’t been paid in four months.” No wonder, then, that the population complained that the police were all thieves.

At Kandahar's hospital I met a 17-year-old policeman (who had been with the police since he was 14) tending to his wounded friend. He was in a jovial mood, amazed he wasn't dead. He said they had been given an order to cut the Taliban's escape route. Instead they were ambushed by the Taliban, ran out of bullets and had no phones to call for backup. "We ran away," he said with a nervous giggle. "The Taliban chased us, shouting: 'Hey, sons of Bush! Where are you going? We want to kill you.'"

Last month, NATO forces struck back around Panjwai with artillery and aerial bombardments, killing an estimated 500 Taliban fighters and destroying homes and schools. But unless NATO can stay for years, create a trustworthy police force and spend the millions necessary to regenerate the district, the Taliban will be back.

Deciding to Fight

Inside the old city walls of Peshawar, Pakistan, a half-hour drive from the Afghan border, in a bazaar named after the storytellers who enthralled Central Asian gold and silk merchants with their tales of war and tragic love, sits the 17th-century Mohabat Khan Mosque. It is a place of cool, marble calm amid the dense market streets. Yousaf Qureshi is the prayer leader there and director of the Jamia Ashrafia, a Deobandi madrasa. He had recently announced a pledge by the jewelers' association to pay $1 million to anyone who would kill a Danish cartoonist who caricatured the Prophet Muhammad. Qureshi himself offered $25,000 and a car. I found Qureshi seated on a cushion behind a low glass desk covered with papers and business cards — ambassadors, N.G.O. workers, Islamic scholars, mujahedeen commanders: he has conversed with them all. His office resembles an antiques shop, the walls displaying oversize prayer beads, knives inlaid with ivory and astrakhan caps. It was day's end, and Qureshi was checking the proofs for his 51st book, called "The Benefits of Koran."

Qureshi told me that he meets with Pakistan's president, Pervez Musharraf, about twice a year. Qureshi understands Musharraf's predicament: "The heart of this government is with the Taliban. The tongue is not." He didn't claim total insider knowledge, but he said, "I think they want a weak government and want to support the Taliban without letting them win." Why? "We are asking Musharraf, 'What are you doing,' and he says: 'I'm moving in both ways. I want to support the Taliban, but I can't afford to displease America. I am caught between the devil and the deep sea.'"

Not long ago, Qureshi said, he received three emissaries from Mullah Omar who wanted Qureshi to warn another religious leader to stop preaching against the Taliban. "I refused," he said. Later Sheikh Yassin, one of the messengers, was arrested by the I.S.I., Pakistan's military intelligence service. So why, I asked, does Qureshi say the I.S.I. is supporting the Taliban? "That is the double policy of the government," he replied. Even in the 1990's, he said, Prime Minister Nawaz Sharif was supporting the official Afghan government of Burhanuddin Rabbani while the I.S.I. was supporting his opponent, Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, as he rained thousands of rockets upon Rabbani's government and the citizens of Kabul. Qureshi told me that if he and local traders didn't want Al Qaeda or the Taliban to flourish, then they wouldn't. "We are supporting them to give the Americans a tough time," he said. "Leave Afghanistan, and the Taliban and foreign fighters will not give Karzai problems. All the administrators of madrasas know what our students are doing, but we won't tell them not to fight in Afghanistan."

The new Taliban fighters in Afghanistan are of three basic types. There are the old war-addicted jihadis who were left out of the 2001 Bonn conference, which determined the postwar shape of Afghan politics and the carve-up of the country. There are the "second generation" Afghan refugees: poor, educated in Pakistan's madrasas and easily recruited by their elders. And then there are the young men who had jobs and prestige in the former Taliban regime and were unable to find a place for themselves in the new Afghanistan.

Coincidentally, there are also now three fronts. One is led by Mullah Omar's council in Quetta. The second is led by Jalaluddin Haqqani, a hero of the jihad against the Soviets who joined the Taliban. Although well into his 80's, he orchestrates insurgent attacks through his sons in Paktia, Khost and Paktika, the Afghan provinces close to Waziristan, where he is based. Finally, there is Gulbuddin Hekmatyar, the former leader of Hezb-i-Islami, the anti-Soviet fighters entrusted with the most money and arms by the U.S. and Pakistan. He had opposed the Taliban, living in uneasy exile in Iran until the U.S. persuaded Tehran to boot him out; he sneaked into the mountainous eastern borderlands. Since the early days of Karzai's government, he has promised to organize Mullah Omar's followers with his educated cadres and finance their jihad against Karzai and the American invaders. Old competitors are coming together in much the way the mujahedeen factions cooperated to fight the Russians.

DOJ_NMG_0084923

Hekmatyar adds a lethal ingredient to this stew: his ties and his followers extend all through Afghanistan, including the north and the west, where he is exploiting factional grievances that have nothing to do with the Pashtun discontent in the south.

An Afghan I met outside Peshawar — for his safety he asked me not to use his full name — was typical of the 20-something Talibs who had flourished under the Taliban regime. He was from Day Chopan, a mountainous region in Zabul Province, northeast of Kandahar. When the Northern Alliance and the Americans took Afghanistan, he escaped through the hills on an old smuggling route to the North-West Frontier Province.

It was familiar terrain. A.'s father had been a religious teacher who studied in Sami ul-Haq's famous Haqqaniya madrasa near the Khyber Pass and preached jihad for Harakat, one of the southern mujahedeen parties whose members filled Mullah Omar's ranks. Those old ties still bind and have provided a network for recruiting. A. grew up in madrasas in the tribal Pashtun lands of Waziristan, where he learned to fire guns as a child in the American-financed mujahedeen camps. As a teenage religious student in Wana, the capital of South Waziristan, he would go door to door collecting bread for his fellow Talibs. Behind one of those doors, he saw a girl and fell in love. When his father wouldn't let him marry the girl, he threatened to go fight in Afghanistan. His father would not relent, and A. signed up at the local Taliban office in Peshawar. "We got good food, free service, everything was Islamic," he told me. "It was the best life, rather than staying in that poor madrasa." His father soon did relent, and A. became engaged, but he was only 15 and had no money. So he went back to the Taliban and was soon working beside the deputy defense minister. "Of course, then there were bags of money," he said.

A., now 28, was living in an Afghan refugee village that used to belong to Hekmatyar's group. Weak with malaria, he was nevertheless plump and jovial, even funny at times. Only when the Pakistani intelligence services came up did his already sallow hues pale to old bone.

After fleeing the American bombardment in 2001, he told me, the Taliban arrived in Pakistan tattered, dispersed and demoralized. But in the months after the collapse, senior Taliban leaders told their comrades to stay at home, keep in touch and wait for the call. Some Taliban told me that they actually waited to see if there was a chance to work with Karzai's government.

"Our emir," as A. referred to Mullah Omar, slowly contacted the commanders and told them to find out who was dead and who was alive. Those commanders appointed group commanders to collect the underlings like A. Weapons stashed away in Afghanistan's mountains were excavated. Funds were raised through the wide and varied Islamic network — Karachi businessmen, Peshawar goldsmiths, Saudi oil men, Kuwaiti traders and jihadi sympathizers within the Pakistani military and intelligence ranks.

Mullah Omar named a 10-man leadership council, A. explained. Smaller councils were created for every province and district. Most of this was done from the safety of Pakistan, and in 2003 Mullah Omar dispatched Mullah Dadullah to the madrasas of Baluchistan and Karachi to gather the dispersed Talibs and find fresh recruits. Pakistani authorities were reportedly seen with him. Still, neither Musharraf nor his military men in Baluchistan did anything to arrest him.

It was a perfect job for Dadullah, whose reputation for bravery was matched by his savagery and his many war wounds, collected in more than 25 years of fighting. In 1998, his fighters slaughtered hundreds of Hazaras (Shiites of Mongol descent) in Bamiyan Province, an act so brutal it was even too much for Mullah Omar, who had him disarmed at the time. Dadullah's very savagery, filmed and now often circulated on videotape, coupled with his promotional flair, were just the ingredients Omar needed to put the Taliban back on the map.

Today, Quetta has assumed the character of Peshawar in the 1980's, a suspicious place of spies and counterspies and double agents. It is not just the hundreds of men in typical Afghan Pashtun clothing — the roughly wound turbans, dark shalwar kameez, eyes inked with kohl — who squat on Thursday afternoons outside the Kandahari mosque in the center of town, comparing notes on the latest fighting in Helmand or the best religious teachers. Rather, as I wandered the narrow alleyways of the Afghan neighborhoods, my local guides would say, "That's where Mullah Dadullah was living" or "That's where Mullah Amir Khan Haqqani is living." (Haqqani is the Taliban's governor in exile for Zabul Province.) Mullah Dadullah is now a folk hero for young Talibs like A. And all the Taliban I met told me that every time Dadullah gives another interview or appears on the battlefield, it serves as an instant injection of inspiration.

By 2004, A. said, he was meeting a lot of Arabs — Saudis, Iraqis, Palestinians — who taught the Afghans about I.E.D.'s (improvised explosive devices) and suicide bombings. "They taught us how to put explosives in plastic," he told me. "They taught us wiring and triggers. The Arabs are the best instructors in that." But now the Afghans are doing fine on their own. Pakistani jihadis in Afghanistan received their training, they told me, from Pakistani officers in Kashmir.

The southerners have also forged ties with the Pakistani Taliban in Waziristan. There is a free flow of arms and men between Waziristan and the Afghan provinces across the border. According to A., even Uzbeks from the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan have joined some of the fighters now in A.'s home mountains in Day Chopan.

It was disheartening to hear A. describe his first encounter with Americans, who were trying to set up a base in a remote region of Zabul. Though they were building a road where no roads had gone before, he could perceive that asphalt only as a means for the Americans to transport their armored vehicles and occupy Muslim lands. A friend of his joined us as we were talking. He had just arrived in Pakistan from the Day Chopan region and said that the Americans were like a cyclone of evil, stealing their almonds and violating their Pashtunwali (the Pashtun tribal laws). In this instance, he meant the law by which even a cousin will not enter your house without knocking first.

A. is now a media man in Pakistan, coordinating the editing of films for discs, censoring them in case there are commanders who don't want their faces seen and distributing them. He proudly offered me the latest disc of Mullah Dadullah beheading some "spies for the Americans." He said he had sold 25,000 CD's about the fighting in Waziristan.

He was full of contradictions. He said that if he didn't have a house in Day Chopan, he would never spend a single night there because there was no education, no electricity, no power, nothing, just a heap of stones. Yet he did not want America to change all that. "We don't like progress by Americans," he declared. "We don't like roads by Americans. We would rather walk on tired feet as long as we are walking in an Islamic state."

Was it all just bravado speaking? Was an opportunity to build bridges to young men like A. somehow lost or just neglected? It was hard to tell. But when the I.S.I. subject came up again, his tone changed. "They are snakes," he told me. He said that they were trying to create a new, obedient leader and oust the independent-minded Mullah Omar, and for that, the real Taliban hated them. Then he said: "I told you that we burn schools because they're teaching Christianity, but actually most of the Taliban don't like this burning of schools or destroying roads and bridges, because the Taliban, too, could use them. Those acts were being done under I.S.I. orders. They don't want progress in Afghanistan." An Indian engineer was beheaded in Zabul in April, he said, and that was also ordered by Pakistan, which, from fear of the influence of its enemy, India, was encouraging attacks on Indian companies. "People are not telling the story, because no one can trust anyone, and if I.S.I. knows I told you," he said, he would be dead.

Pakistan's Assets

There are many theories for why Pakistan might have wanted to help the Taliban reconstitute themselves. Afghan-Pakistani relations have always been fraught. One among the many disputes has to do with the Durand Line, the boundary drawn up by the British in 1893 partly to divide the Pashtun tribes, who were constantly revolting against the British. The Afghan government has never recognized this line, which winds its way from the Hindu Kush mountains of North-West Frontier Province 1,500 miles down to the deserts of Baluchistan, as its border. Nor have the Pashtun tribes. The Pakistanis may hope to force Karzai to recognize the Durand line in exchange for stability.

Another theory is that Musharraf must appease the religious parties whom he needs to extend his power past the end of his term next year. Musharraf bought them off, gave them control of the North-West Frontier Province and Baluchistan and let them use the Taliban. And finally, the Pakistanis see Afghanistan as their rightful client. They want an accommodating regime, not Karzai, whose main backers are the U.S. and India, Pakistan's nemesis.

Pakistan's well-established secular Pashtun nationalist political leaders remain distraught that their lands have again become sanctuaries for the Afghan Taliban and the Pakistani religious parties, which, since elections in 2002, rule these provinces and are completing a Talibanization of the region. The secular leaders point to another layer in Pakistan's games: keeping the tribal areas autonomous enables Pakistan's intelligence services to ward off the gaze of Westerners and keep their jihadis safely tucked away.

One thing you notice if you visit the homes of retired generals in Pakistan is that they live in a lavish fashion typical of South America's dictatorship-era military elite. They control most of the country's economy and real estate, and like President Musharraf, himself a former general, they do not want to relinquish power.

Although there is a secularist strain in the Pakistani military, it has been aligned with religious hard-liners since the army's inception in 1947. Many officers still see their duty as defending the Muslim world, but their raison d'être has been undermined by the fact that though Pakistan was founded as a refuge for South Asia's Muslims, more Muslims today live in India. They seem to envy the jihadis' clarity. The militants had no identity crises. According to Najim Sethi, a prominent Pakistani journalist, military officers often have "a degree of self-disgust for selling themselves" to the Americans, and they still bear a grudge against the United States for abandoning them after the Afghan jihad and, more recently, for sanctioning Pakistan over its nuclear program. The standard army phrase about the Americans was, he said, "They used us like a condom."

Officers spoke to me as if they were simply translating the feelings of the jihadis for a tone-deaf audience, but they sounded more like ventriloquists. One retired colonel I spoke to was a relative of a Taliban leader from Waziristan, Abdullah Massoud, who had earned both sympathy and reverence for his time in Guantánamo Bay. Massoud was captured fighting the Americans and the Northern Alliance and spent two years there, claiming to be a simple Afghan Talib. Upon his release, he made it home to Waziristan and resumed his war against the U.S. With his long hair, his prosthetic limb and impassioned speeches, he quickly became a charismatic inspiration to Waziristan's youth.

Since 2001, some of Waziristan's tribes have refused to hand over Qaeda members living among them. Under intense American pressure, Pakistan agreed for the first time in its history to invade the tribal areas. Hundreds of civilians and soldiers were killed. American helicopters were seen in the region, as were American spies. The militants (with some army accomplices) retaliated with two assassination attempts against Musharraf late in 2003. He struck back, but as the civilian casualties mounted and the military began to balk at killing Pakistanis, Musharraf agreed to a deal in the spring of 2004 whereby the militants would give up their guests in return for cash. Pakistani officers and the militants hugged and shed tears during a public reconciliation. But the militants did not relinquish their Al Qaeda guests, and they took advantage of the amnesty to execute tribal elders they said had helped the Pakistani military. The tribal structure in Waziristan was devastated, and the Taliban took to the streets to declare the Islamic emirate of Waziristan. Since Musharraf signed a truce with the militants last month, attacks launched from Waziristan into Afghanistan, according to NATO, have risen by 300 percent.

"Muslim governments are not able to face the Americans," the retired colonel from Waziristan said, explaining the mujahedeen mind-set. "If Muslim governments should stand up against duplicity and foreign hegemonic designs, and they don't, who will? Someone has to stand up to defend the Muslim countries, and it's this that gives the jihadis the courage and zeal to stand up to the worst atrocities. This is the core issue of the mujahedeen movement. You call it the war on terror. The mujahedeen call it jihad." And so, essentially, did he.

One afternoon, in the midst of a monsoon, I sought out one of the founders of the pro-jihadi strategy, the retired general Mirza Aslam Beg. He lived in Rawalpindi, the military capital half an hour from Islamabad, in a brick and tile-roofed mansion with a basketball hoop, flowing greenery and Judy, his one-eyed cocker spaniel. The house was immaculate, with marble floors, rugs, fine china and porcelain on display behind glass and an amusing portrait of Aslam Beg as a young, Ray-Banned, pommaded officer. His mansion sits across the street from Musharraf's.

Aslam Beg played a leading role in the military's creation of "asymmetrical assets," jargon for the jihadis who have long been used by the military as proxies in Kashmir and Afghanistan. He was chief of the army staff from 1988 to 1991, while the Pakistani nuclear scientist A.Q. Khan was selling the country's nuclear technology to Iran, Libya and North Korea. Beg held talks with the Iranians about exchanging Iranian oil for Pakistani nuclear skill.

Aslam Beg likes to remind visitors that he was one of a group of army officers trained by the C.I.A. in the 1950's as a "stay-behind organization" that would melt into the population if ever the Soviet Union overran Pakistan. Those brigadiers and lieutenant colonels then trained and directed the Afghan jihadis.

In the 1980's, "the C.I.A. set up the largest support and administrative bases in Mohmand agency, Waziristan and Baluchistan," Aslam Beg told me. "These were the logistics bases for eight long years, and you can imagine the relations that developed. And then Chechens, Uzbeks, Tajiks, Saudis developed family relations with the local people." The Taliban, he said, fell back after 2001 to these baselines. "In 2003, when the U.S. attacked Iraq, a whole new dimension was added to the conflict. The foreign mujahedeen who'd fought in Afghanistan started moving back to Afghanistan and Iraq." And the old Afghan jihadi leaders stopped by the mansion of their mentor, Aslam Beg, to tell him they were planning to wage war against the American occupiers.

As the rain outside turned to hail, banging against the windows, Aslam Beg ate some English sandwiches that had been wheeled in by a servant. "As a believer," he went on, "I'll tell you how I understand it. In the Holy Book there's an injunction that the believer must reach out to defend the tyrannized. The words of God are, 'What restrains you from fighting for those helpless men, women and children who due to their weakness are being brutalized and are calling you to free them from atrocities being perpetuated on them.' This is a direct message, and it may not impact the hearts and minds of all believers. Maybe one in 10,000 will leave their home and go to the conflicts where Muslims are engaged in liberation movements, such as Chechnya, Palestine, Iraq, Afghanistan and Kashmir. Now it's a global deterrent force."

The Authentic Jihad

The old city of Lahore, with its broad boulevards and banyan-tree canopies, remains the cultural and intellectual heart of Pakistan. It is home to a small elite of journalists, editors, authors, painters, artists and businessmen. Najam Sethi, editor in chief of The Friday Times, and his wife, Jugnu Mohsin, the publisher, are popular fixtures among this crowd. Like so many of Pakistan's intellectuals, they have had their share of run-ins with government security agents. For pushing the bounds of press freedom, Sethi was dragged from his bedroom during Nawaz Sharif's reign, beaten, gagged and detained without charge. Musharraf, in his new autobiography, claims that Nawaz Sharif wanted him to court-martial Sethi for treason, an act that seemed ludicrous to him, and he refused.

I met him one afternoon at the newspaper's offices as he was preparing his weekly editorial. He is a tall, affable man with smiling eyes and large glasses. And he got right down to business, providing an analysis of why Pakistan had decided to bring its "assets" — by which he meant the Taliban and Kashmiri jihadis — off the shelf.

In the days following 9/11, when Musharraf gathered together major editors to tell them that he had no choice but to withdraw his support for the Taliban, Sethi raised the touchy issue of the other jihadis. He said that if Musharraf was abandoning the Taliban, he would have to abandon the sectarian jihadis (fighting the Shiites), the Kashmir jihadis, all of the jihadis, because they were all trained in mind by the same religious leaders and in body by the same Pakistani forces.

In January 2002, Musharraf gave an unusually long televised speech to the nation. He reminded the people that his campaign against extremism was initiated years before and not under American pressure. He vowed that Pakistan would no longer export jihadis to Kashmir, that he was again placing a ban on several jihadi organizations, that camps would be closed and that while the madrasas were mostly educating the poor, some were centers of extremist teaching and would be reformed. A month later, Musharraf was at the White House next to President Bush, who praised him for standing against terrorism.

Sethi characterized Pakistani authorities as believing that the U.S. in Iraq "will be a Vietnam." He said: "Afghanistan will be neither here nor there. So we cannot wrap up our assets. We must protect them." The I.S.I. realized it could help deliver Al Qaeda to the U.S. while keeping the Taliban and the jihadis on the back burner. At the same time, Musharraf's moderate advisers were telling him that holding on to those assets would eventually boomerang. And soon enough, the assets began to come after Musharraf — while the people of Pakistan were turning against him for being pro-American. "So going after jihadis who were protecting the Taliban came to a halt," Sethi said.

Meanwhile the landscape next door in Afghanistan was changing. The warlords were back in action. The drug economy was surging. By 2003 and 2004, Musharraf's men were becoming hysterical about what they saw as a growing Indian presence in Afghanistan, particularly the Indian consulates in Kandahar and Jalalabad, the Pashtun strongholds that Pakistan considered its own turf. Karzai was doing business with Indians and Americans and was no longer a Pashtun whom Pakistanis would want to do business with.

As Sethi spoke, I recalled a meeting I had with one of Kandahar's prominent tribal leaders. He recounted a visit from a former Pakistani general who had been active in the I.S.I. The general invited Kandahar's leaders to lunch and warned them not to let the Indians put a consulate in Kandahar and to remember who their real benefactors were. Today there is a consulate there, and Indian films and music are sweeping through the Pashtun lands. What is more, many Pakistanis believe India is backing the Baluch insurgency in Pakistan's far south, clouding the prospects for the new, Chinese-built port in Gwadar. The port is Pakistan's single largest investment in its economic future and has been attacked by Baluch rebels.

DOJ_NMG_0084927

In many ways, Pakistani policy is already looking beyond both Karzai and the Americans; they believe it is prudent to imagine a future with neither. That future will be shaped by the past: the past with India, the past with the Soviet Union, the past with America. For Pakistan's hard-liners, at least, the obvious choice was to take their assets off the shelf and restart the jihad.

A Difficult Choice

On the wall outside the Eid Ga madrasa, in Kuchlak, a parched town near Quetta, Afghan students and teachers were debating the merits of jihad. One boy had just fled an American assault on Day Chopan in Zabul Province. He had never been to Pakistan before. He was frenzied, in shock. As a student from Kandahar led the others in dusk prayer, a young boy whispered to me, "I like America." They were hardly a unified group. One young Helmandi told me, "We want our traditions of Islam and Sharia, not your democracy," while another argued for peace. Then the Helmandi asked, with genuine confusion: "Why are Muslims being tortured everywhere in the world, and no one is there to stand up for them? But if you touch one Westerner, the sky is on your head?"

Most madrasas in Pakistan are run by the Jamiat Ulema-e-Islam, the religious-party alliance that has joined with Musharraf to keep the popular parties of Benazir Bhutto and Nawaz Sharif from regaining power. The J.U.I. madrasas usually endorse jihad, although even here I met madrasa students who were against the war. They subscribed to a vision of jihad as a struggle for self-improvement and the improvement of society. Mawlawi Mohammadin, a cleric from Helmand, went so far as to tell me that these are the true roots of jihad, though he confessed that his is a lonely voice. He was afraid of everyone — Taliban, Pakistani intelligence, even his pupils. "If we start openly supporting Karzai, we could be killed by our own students," he told me with nervous laughter. Only a month earlier, a Taliban official from Helmand who had reconciled with Karzai's government was gunned down by assassins on a motorbike in Quetta.

Mohammadin said that it is now open season for jihad in Afghanistan under J.U.I. guidance. Government ministers were even attending funerals to praise Pakistani Pashtuns who had died fighting in Kandahar. He estimates that there are some 10,000 Taliban fighters in Baluchistan. Despite the intimidation, he says he feels that his mission is to steer his students away from war.

One of these was Mohamed Nader, who had just attended a cousin's funeral and was wondering what it all meant. His cousin's family was poor, and without their knowledge, he had gone to earn money first by harvesting poppies in Helmand and then by fighting for the Taliban. Finally he was killed. Among the biggest problems, Nader told me, was that the cohesion of the Afghan family has been shredded by decades of poverty and refugee life in Pakistan. In a typically strong Afghan family, young adults obey their parents, even asking for permission to go fight. But here, boys just run off.

Rahmatullah was one of those who had run off and returned. He was skinny and disheveled, having just faced heavy fighting in Kandahar. Though an Afghan, he had grown up in Baluchistan, near the border, in an area where he said 200 fighters were now living. The mullah at his madrasa told all the students that it was time for jihad. And the I.S.I. was paying cash. But his father was old and against the war; he pleaded with him to abandon fighting. So he sent Rahmatullah to his friend Mohammadin, hoping he might open another path for his son. Rahmatullah told me that he wasn't sure yet which mullah he would listen to.

St. Louis Public Schools Receive Grants To Prevent Violence (SLBJ MO)

St. Louis Business Journal, October 20, 2006

Twelve St. Louis public schools have received grants totaling $249,901 from the federal government to fund gang prevention classes, according to an October newsletter from Area Resources for Community & Human Services (ARCHS).

In June, U.S. Attorney General Alberto Gonzales announced the distribution of nearly $15 million in federal Gang Resistance Education and Training (GREAT) grants to school-based community programs. St. Louis was the only Missouri recipient of this year's grants.

The St. Louis Metropolitan Police Department (SLMPD), in partnership with ARCHS, received the $249,901 GREAT grants. Six full- and part-time SLMPD officers will staff the program, and ARCHS will serve as the fiscal and administrative agent of the grant, according to the newsletter.

DOJ_NMG_0084928

The GREAT program consists of a 13-week middle school curriculum, an elementary school curriculum, a summer program and family training.

The GREAT grant money will provide school-based, classroom curriculum led by law enforcement officers. The program's primary objective is prevention and is intended as an immunization against delinquency, youth violence and gang membership, according to the newsletter.

The GREAT program will begin this fall and plans to reach 3,190 students in 12 St. Louis public schools:

Long Middle CEC

Mel Carnahan Middle

Northwest Middle

Stevens Middle

Yeatman Middle CEC

ARCHS represents the St. Louis area as one of 21 community partnerships authorized by Missouri state statute. The community partnerships work with state government departments to improve the funding, management and delivery of human service programs.

IMMIGRATION:

RISE IN BRIBERY TESTS INTEGRITY OF U.S. BORDER (LAT)

By Ralph Vartabedian, Richard A. Serrano And Richard Marosi

The Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2006

EL PASO — Bribery of federal and local officials by Mexican smugglers is rising sharply, and with it the fear that a culture of corruption is taking hold along the 2,000-mile border from Brownsville, Texas, to San Diego.

At least 200 public employees have been charged with helping to move narcotics or illegal immigrants across the U.S.-Mexican border since 2004, at least double the illicit activity documented in prior years, a Times examination of public records has found. Thousands more are under investigation.

Criminal charges have been brought against Border Patrol agents, local police, a county sheriff, motor vehicle clerks, an FBI supervisor, immigration examiners, prison guards, school district officials and uniformed personnel of every branch of the U.S. military, among others. The vast majority have pleaded guilty or been convicted.

Officials in Washington and along the border worry about what lies below the surface. "It is the tip of the iceberg," said James "Chip" Burrus, assistant director of the criminal investigation division of the FBI. "There is a lot more down there. The problem is, you don't know what you don't know."

What is known — from court cases, other public records and dozens of interviews — is alarming enough. Some schemes have displayed considerable sophistication among Mexican drug lords, and their success shows a discouraging willingness by public employees to take tainted money.

Though America's southern border may evoke images of a poor backwater, it is alive with vast amounts of ill-gotten wealth, shadowy organizations that ply the waters of the Rio Grande, and brazen schemes that seem borrowed out of Cold War espionage.

Perhaps the most revealing example of smugglers' savvy was their cultivation of the highest-ranking FBI official in El Paso, Special Agent in Charge Hardrick Crawford.

FBI agents thought they had turned alleged drug kingpin Jose Maria Guardia into an informant, but Guardia was working as a double agent for the Mexican drug lords. He drew Crawford into a personal friendship, and provided a job for Crawford's wife, a country club membership for the couple and family trips to Las Vegas.

In August, after the chummy relationship became public, Crawford was convicted on federal charges of trying to conceal his friendship with Guardia. He could be sentenced to up to five years in prison and fined half a million dollars.

Drug rings once planted a mole in a federal agency, and officials worry others are lurking. The rings have entangled U.S. agents in sexual relationships. And they have amassed files on individual U.S. agents, with details about their finances, families and habits — even the kind of bicycles their kids ride.

"They hire guys to watch the narcotics agents," says Lee Morgan II, who retired as the head of the Immigration and Customs Enforcement office in Douglas, Ariz., this year. "They know what time we get up in the morning. When we go to work. What kind of car your wife drives.

"We had an informant tell us he saw a film of us as we exited our office that was being shown in Mexico. They had our license plate numbers."

The Mexican criminal networks can afford lavish payoffs. Bribery payments have topped $1 million.

Paul K. Charlton, U.S. attorney for Arizona since 2001, is convinced border corruption is worsening — and jeopardizing the trust that U.S. communities place in their government.

"The concern for me is that we can very quickly develop a culture that would be more accepting of that kind of misconduct," Charlton said. "You only have to look south of the border to see what happens when a certain level of corruption is accepted."

Officials warn that the risk of public corruption will grow as Congress and the Bush administration respond to public demands to improve border security. Customs and Border Protection, a part of the Department of Homeland Security, wants to add 10,000 employees to its workforce of 42,000, most of whom are already stationed along the Mexican border.

"If you increase the number of people on the border, you are going to get more corruption," said the FBI's Burrus.

More security, more corruption

Stepped-up border security also makes corruption all the more necessary to smugglers.

"As we tighten up on the border, it will make it harder for the traffickers to get across," said Johnny Sutton, U.S. attorney for Texas' Western District. "You have to be creative about getting your poison into the U.S. Obviously, corrupting the officials is a part of it."

Critics blame sloppy hiring practices, inadequate training and weak internal controls. Agents are vulnerable because morale in the agency is "pathetic," stemming in part from illegal immigrants' phony allegations against agents that have unfairly ruined careers, said T.J. Bonner, head of the union for Border Patrol agents.

Border Patrol Chief David V. Aguilar rejects those claims, saying morale is good thanks to more staffing and better equipment. Wages for public employees in the poor border economies are respectable; Border Patrol agents start at about $35,000 a year and can exceed $65,000 with overtime.

Aguilar said the Border Patrol had increased ethics training at its academy and set up anticorruption programs in the field, and he said it conducted new background checks on its agents every five years. "We are doing everything we can to root out these agents, these criminals, within our organization," Aguilar said.

But such efforts sometimes stand little chance against the greed of weak agents and the power of smugglers with money to spread around.

"They are going to try to find ways to breach our enforcement efforts," said Aguilar. "They will try to flank us, tunnel us, fly over and to corrupt our efforts."

While corruption is growing, the number of internal investigators overseeing a vastly expanding workforce is stagnant or even shrinking.

Aguilar, who must rely on other agencies to investigate the Border Patrol, has demanded more prompt and thorough investigations. Others complain that infighting within the Department of Homeland Security has hobbled enforcement.

(All the major border agencies are part of Homeland Security: Customs and Border Protection includes the Border Patrol, which polices the entire border except for ports of entry themselves, handled by Field Operations; Immigration and Customs Enforcement, or ICE, which handles major border-related investigations including corruption cases; and Citizenship and Immigration Services, which handles routine immigration matters.)

DOJ_NMG_0084930

Michael Maxwell resigned this year as head of internal affairs for the Citizenship and Immigration Service after clashing repeatedly with Homeland Security over a shortage of resources. When he left, 3,000 allegations of misconduct, including 100 reports of bribery, were uninvestigated, he said.

"Nobody is seriously addressing corruption," Maxwell said. "The corruption is pervasive."

The Alvarez brothers

Though a tiny fraction of federal, state and local employees at the border have been corrupted, it takes only a few to help move large amounts of drugs or illegal immigrants.

Typical are the Alvarez brothers, Juan and Jose. Juan, a senior Border Patrol agent and canine handler at the station in Hebbronville, Texas, spearheaded an operation with his brother that allowed more than 30,000 kilos of marijuana into this country from 2003 to 2005. With Jose serving as an intermediary between his brother and a drug ring in Nuevo Laredo, Mexico, the two netted $1.5 million in bribes. They bragged that they offered a "100% passage guarantee."

Their "green-light" tactics were so well developed that smugglers could have moved "nuclear weapons" over the border, said Asst. U.S. Atty. Marina Marmolejo.

She said in court that they had planned their operations down "to the very last minute," checking who was on border duty each day and what checkpoint surveillance equipment was in use, and making sure that agent Alvarez "was the only one out there manning traffic." It was, she said, "perfectly planned."

Until red flags started popping up. The brothers took trips to Las Vegas. A $20,000 cash deposit was made on a home. One brother bought a $2,500 Tag Heuer watch. A wife making $8 an hour suddenly opened a bank account with $7,000.

Juan was sentenced in February to 20 years in prison, Jose to 17. U.S. District Judge George Kazen was unmoved by their expressions of remorse. Across the Rio Grande, Kazen said, police corruption was destroying the local Mexican community, making it "not much better than Iraq." He warned that the U.S. side was becoming equally dangerous because of cops gone bad.

"You hate to see that cancer come here," he said.

Government help

The narcotics networks sometimes get direct help from local Mexican governments. Last year, federal prosecutors in Arizona charged Police Chief Ramon Robles-Cota of Sonoyta, Mexico, a small town near the Lukeville border crossing, with drug trafficking and bribery.

His swings into Arizona were chauffeured by one of his officers, Julio Cesar Lozano-Lopez, who admitted in federal court that he drove his chief into Arizona twice in 2005 to meet with Border Patrol agents and spread bribe money around. The chief remains free in Mexico.

In a 2005 wake-up call about the scope of border corruption, a major FBI-led sting in Arizona netted 71 guilty pleas by National Guard members, state prison guards and a federal inspector. Known as Operation Lively Green, the sting demonstrated that large numbers of government employees at the border were willing to take a bribe.

But nobody in government has measured all the criminal cases across every jurisdiction, agency and state.

The Times examined case files, public announcements and other public records dating to 2004 and interviewed officials in every U.S. attorney's district along the border as well as local and federal law enforcement agents and key county prosecutors.

Nearly half of the cases were associated with Lively Green and another major FBI sting in Arizona, code-named Double Driver, which caught 26 Arizona Department of Transportation clerks in 2004 who were issuing fraudulent driver's licenses.

Even excluding those stings, the number of indicted individuals still shows a steady growth: 17 in 2004, 35 in 2005 and 52 so far in 2006.

The longer-term trend also appears troubling. One of the few historical benchmarks is a General Accounting Office report on border corruption that counted all the cases of corrupt immigration, customs and Border Patrol agents during the mid-1990s.

The GAO identified 28 such cases in five years. The Times review of the same job categories turned up 38 cases in just the last three years.

Not just drugs

In the past, border corruption was mainly associated with narcotics. But increasingly, immigrant smugglers — who command huge fees from people trying to cross illegally into the U.S. — are also making payoffs.

DOJ_NMG_0084931

The terrorist attacks of Sept. 11 called attention the risks posed by human smuggling: Though no terrorists are known to have slipped across the Mexican border yet, many law enforcement officials are deeply worried that corrupt inspectors might let it happen.

"Who's to say a potential terrorist can't get in that way?" asks Jack W. Hook, a special agent in charge of the Department of Homeland Security's inspector general's office in San Diego.

Mario Alvarez and Samuel McClaren, senior U.S. Border Patrol agents in El Centro, Calif., helped launch a program that jailed dozens of such human smugglers. In March, they were told to come to El Centro headquarters to receive an award. Instead, they were arrested in front of stunned fellow agents.

They eventually pleaded guilty to taking cash bribes to release immigrants from detention centers and then falsify reports that they had returned the individuals to Mexico. They were caught when another Border Patrol agent obtained a telephone call list from a captured smuggler and found their number on it.

For every criminal indictment, there are many more cases that never reach public attention.

ICE is investigating 2,097 criminal cases, the agency says, and operates a hotline that received 7,500 allegations of internal misconduct in fiscal year 2005.

Most corruption cases involve federal employees, but local officials, including police, are also on the take.

Jesus Lorenzo Meza was hired three years ago as a police officer in Edinburg, Texas, even though — unknown to the police chief — Meza and four of his brothers had been running an elaborate drug smuggling operation for years, according to an indictment. They used boats and other means to move more than 15,000 pounds of marijuana and 500 kilos of cocaine.

Federal agents, quietly tracking their movements, logged more than 2,000 telephone conversations. But the FBI and the U.S. Drug Enforcement Administration never told Police Chief Quirino Munoz about their ongoing probe or warned him against hiring Meza, the chief has complained.

The task of arresting Meza was left to his fellow officers, who confronted him in April at the end of his night shift at the jail, seized his badge and locked him in a cell. Now, the chief said, his 100 officers are demoralized. Meza awaits trial.

Criticism of screening

The escalating corruption among federal employees has drawn charges that Homeland Security's screening and training of new employees is sloppy.

Oscar Ortiz, praised in a job performance review as a "remarkable" Border Patrol agent, became a partner in a smuggling ring that trafficked dozens of illegal migrants through the rugged backcountry east of San Diego.

Ortiz turned out to be an illegal immigrant himself, and had been detained in 2001 on suspicion of smuggling illegal immigrants in his car.

Fernando Arango of Rio Rico, Ariz., was hired as a customs inspector even though he had fled a drug smuggling charge 15 years earlier. Last year, he was charged with taking $50,000 to wave through the border checkpoint a recreational vehicle that he believed contained 200 kilograms of cocaine.

Though federal officials voice outrage over corruption, a sharp debate exists below the surface over whether resources are sufficient to combat the problem.

Some trace the problem to the merger of several agencies to create Homeland Security. Before the merger, the Customs Service alone had about 180 internal investigators for its 22,000 employees, said former Customs Commissioner Robert Bonner.

They were reorganized into ICE, which now has 160 investigators to oversee about 72,000 employees across three border-related agencies.

"It diminished our ability to be as vigilant and on top of the corruption issue as we were in the past," said Bonner, who fought to keep internal investigators in the new agency. "The whole thing became more fragmented."

The FBI is rushing more agents to the border to address the problem, said Burrus, the assistant director. In most of its field offices, the FBI allocates 20% of its agents to public corruption cases. Along the border, it is 40% to 60%. In recent years, it has boosted public-corruption staffing by a third.

"We are doing the best we can with the resources we have," Burrus said. "There will never be enough resources."

DOJ_NMG_0084932

Even the most ambitious review of job applicants won't necessarily ferret out all of the problems. Many convicted agents have said financial pressures and other personal dilemmas drove them to cross the line. Smugglers often know how to push the right button.

A Border Patrol agent, part of a narcotics and immigrant network in El Paso, explained to a judge last year how smugglers sought to recruit him.

Agent Aldo Erives said the drug dealers knew that he hitchhiked to his classes at a local college.

"Come on," he said they told him, "you can buy a car if you pass a load through the checkpoint."

In the dryer

Sometimes, federal agents initiate the corruption.

In El Paso, Santiago Efrain, an ICE agent assigned to help guard a detention center, allegedly told the lawyer for a jailed Mexican smuggling suspect that for $20,000 he could get the charges dropped and the suspect safely back to Mexico. Efrain allegedly said he normally charged $30,000 for this kind of favor but was willing to cut a deal.

The Mexican lawyer alerted U.S. authorities, who sent an undercover agent to meet with Efrain at the local Starbucks. Efrain, wearing his duty uniform, allegedly accepted the $20,000 and was promptly arrested. He is awaiting trial.

Also yet to go to trial is David Duque Jr., a Border Patrol agent in Falfurrias, Texas, north of McAllen. He is charged with bribery for allegedly advising a government informant how to package cocaine in order to get it past the police dogs at the border checkpoints. He asked for $2,500 for every kilogram of cocaine that got through, authorities say.

According to the indictment, Duque instructed that payment should be left in his clothes dryer.

"Law enforcement officials have confirmed that Duque has a dryer located outside his residence on the porch," the indictment duly noted.

A Set Of Borders To Cross (WP)

By Sylvia Moreno

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

NIXON, Tex. -- Seventeen-year-old Guillermo Antonio Iraheta Hernandez traveled thousands of miles from his native El Salvador only to land in limbo.

Left behind more than a decade ago by his parents, illegal immigrants living in Northern Virginia, Iraheta made part of his trek to the United States hidden in the baggage compartment of a Mexican bus. But soon after surreptitiously crossing the Rio Grande into Texas, he was picked up by the Border Patrol and brought here to a converted nursing home run by the federal government where 136 children from Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala are temporarily housed.

Iraheta is but one drop in a new and fast-growing stream of illegal immigration to the United States, those under 18 who are sneaking into the country without their parents. Authorities say the phenomenon is growing and includes girls traveling alone and even toddlers being carried by older siblings or entrusted to smugglers.

Many of those who are apprehended by the Border Patrol end up in a burgeoning network of shelters set up by the U.S. Department of Health and Human Services. There they run up against Washington's paradoxical approach to the problem of children who entered the country illegally without their parents. The government agency that runs the shelters tries to reunite the children with relatives living here, regardless of their legal status. Another federal agency works to deport them -- as well as their parents. Iraheta's mother and father are reluctant to come forward to claim their son, fearing that would lead to being sent back to El Salvador. So are his sisters, who are also in the country illegally. Even uncles who are legal U.S. residents living in Texas have stayed away.

"They're afraid this might not be in their best interest," said Iraheta's sister, Dina. "Nobody wants to help him. Nobody wants to do anything, and that's the problem."

Iraheta, whose father paid a smuggler $6,000 to bring him into the county, said he would like to attend high school and college in the United States, perhaps to study literature.

"Every day I pray that someone in the family will come forward to help advance my case," the teenager said.The Path of Hope

DOJ_NMG_0084933

Last fiscal year, the Border Patrol apprehended 115,000 unaccompanied minors, up from 98,000 in 2001. Almost 7,800 children landed in the federally funded system of shelters last fiscal year, which ended Sept. 30, 2005 -- 25 percent of them girls, 20 percent under 15.

Fueling this immigration is the crackdown on border enforcement and illegal immigrants, authorities and immigration experts say. Adults in the United States without legal papers who used to risk trips to Central America to retrieve children and make the illegal trip back across the Mexican border are hiring smugglers instead. Documented immigrants waiting years for approval from immigration officials to bring their children to the United States legally are also turning to traffickers.

So the children come alone, undertaking arduous journeys, including treks across deserts and rivers, led by smugglers who will not hesitate to abandon those who are sick or weak or cannot keep up. Many of the girls are sexually abused along the way.

Robert Garza, director of operations of the shelter in Nixon, where Iraheta is living, said that when he started his job three years ago, he was taken aback by the young ages of the children brought in by immigration authorities and the youngsters' stories about their journeys.

"I thought, how can a parent send a child on that long journey, not knowing what's going to happen?" Garza said. "But it's the environment they come from. There is no hope, and the only way out of that environment is to come to America. That's how they see the United States -- as hope."

Most of the children in the shelters come from Central America. Children from Mexico who are caught at the border are immediately returned, though the ones who make it into the United States may end up in shelters if they are caught by immigration authorities. In the past two years, the shelter system across the Southwest has grown to 21 from five. Most are in Texas.

Some, like Texas Sheltered Care in Nixon, are plush worlds compared with the living conditions the juveniles left behind. The shelter in Nixon offers classes in English, math, carpentry and computer skills. The children get round - the - clock supervision, plus counseling, medical care and recreation -- even yoga classes and outings to bowling alleys or local football game pep rallies.

The shelter's walls are decorated with colorful posters depicting the seasons and inspirational sayings in English and Spanish. Large flags on the wall announce the residents' home countries: Honduras, El Salvador, Guatemala, Brazil. A courtyard garden, tended by the children, is dotted with wooden crosses they made to memorialize loved ones who died back home -- part of the grief counseling offered by one social worker. They get bused weekly to the local swimming pool, once a whites-only facility. Today it is an illegal-immigrants-only pool and is owned by Texas Sheltered Care.

Mostly, though, the children wait, hoping social workers can cajole their parents or other kin to claim them before Immigration and Customs Enforcement lawyers can persuade an immigration judge to deport them.

"We're a social service agency. We aren't law enforcement," said Maureen Dunn, director of HHS's Division of Unaccompanied Children's Services, which runs the shelters. "We want to make sure kids are safe and well cared for and that they are safely reunified."

Dunn's agency was created in 2004 as the result of a lawsuit settled on behalf of immigrant children. Before the ruling, children generally were sent to juvenile detention centers to await deportation. Now, the agency's goal is to reunite unaccompanied immigrant children with their parents or close relatives. If that occurs, the children are then ordered to appear in an immigration court for a hearing that might lead to their deportation. But no one knows how many keep that court date or how many just melt into the country's underground world of undocumented immigrants.

"It's kind of a gaping hole in the new wall that's supposedly going up against illegal immigration," said Don Barnett, a fellow with the Center for Immigration Studies, which favors tighter borders and immigration controls.

To get custody of their children, many of these parents must appear in person. While HHS will not turn them in, many fear capture at Border Patrol checkpoints on highways and in airports, or by the increasing number of local police agencies that have been given the power to enforce immigration laws. Some immigrants also just don't believe the assurances of social workers that they are not an arm of la migra .

DOJ_NMG_0084934

"I told them 'No, this is like a school, there are no police here,' " Iraheta said, describing how he tried to reassure his parents and persuade them to claim him. "But they're scared to come get me; they don't have the courage."

Many children languish in shelters for weeks, attending immigration court hearings periodically, until a judge issues a deadline for reunification or a deportation order.

"I feel sorry for any child that doesn't get reunified, especially if it's [with] the parents or siblings," said Jose Munoz, one of the Nixon caseworkers. "Some of it is due to being undocumented, and some of it is they're scared to travel. . . . What happens is that it becomes an emotional roller coaster for the child."

Nelvin Johac Lara Pineda, 17, left Honduras with one goal: Get to the United States, get a job, and send money home because his parents and five younger siblings are being threatened with eviction from their small home.

The boy's father, a field laborer, borrowed money last year from an acquaintance to tide the family over while he was ill and unable to work. Lara worked the fields, too, having left school after fifth grade to help his father support the family. But this year, with both of them working, they made enough to cover only the interest payments and none of the loan principal. The lender began threatening the family with eviction.

"I want to help my father, and I don't want my family to end up on the street," said the doe-eyed boy. "For me, it's no problem to be out on the street. But not for my parents or my brothers."

Lara left Honduras in early May, walking for six days through Guatemala and traveling through Mexico atop freight trains. He swam the Rio Grande into Texas one night in late May and was promptly apprehended by the Border Patrol. He was transferred to Nixon on June 6.

Lara gave his caseworker at Texas Sheltered Care the names of cousins and other distant relatives in the United States who were called to see if they would sponsor his release from the shelter. Undocumented also, they did not want to step forward for fear of being deported.

In mid-September, an immigration judge in San Antonio issued a deportation order for Lara, and the teenager cried and cried. "I don't know what we're going to do," he said later. "I've talked to Papi and he still fears that they will be evicted. I couldn't realize what I came to do. I guess that's it."

After the order, his clothing was restricted: Like other children with deportation orders, he had to wear red shorts, a white T-shirt, white socks and brown slippers at all times so the shelter could keep track of him and make sure he didn't try to run away.

Earlier this month, Lara was put on a plane by ICE agents and sent back to Honduras.

But not all stories end that way.A Bittersweet First Meeting

Last December, after years of telephone conversations, Yeni Patricia Castillo Medrano, a tall, soft-spoken 17-year-old from El Salvador, met her father for the first time. Having obtained legal papers to live in the United States and travel back home, her father, who lives in Northern Virginia, visited El Salvador for the first time in 17 years.

She was thrilled to meet him, yet Castillo admitted the visit didn't go well. "I treated him badly; I spoke to him badly," she said. This is a normal reaction, immigration experts say, from children whose parents leave home to make a better life for their families. But in late August, Castillo told her father in a telephone conversation that she wanted to join him. He paid almost $7,000 to a smuggling ring to bring her to him.

Castillo and four other teenagers from her village illegally entered Mexico from Guatemala aboard a makeshift raft, traveled in the baggage compartment of a bus through Mexico and floated on inner tubes across the Rio Grande.

By the time the Border Patrol apprehended Castillo in south Texas, the girl had been walking through desert and brush for almost four days. Dehydrated and ill from heat exhaustion, she was taken to a hospital for an overnight stay.

Twenty days after arriving at the Nixon shelter, Castillo flew from Houston to Reagan National Airport, where she was reunited with her father, Mardoqueo Castillo.

The girl and her father hugged tightly upon meeting, and she cried. She was sad, she said, to leave the girlfriends she had made at the Nixon shelter, but glad to be with her father.

"How would I not be happy to be here with my loved ones?" she said, before walking out of the airport terminal, her head on her father's shoulder, her hand in his.

CONGRESS-ADMINISTRATION:

Paulson Pulls For U.S. Markets (WSJ)

By Deborah Solomon

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- With just two years to make his mark, new Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson is focusing much of his attention on making American financial markets more competitive.

So far, his efforts have mainly involved meeting and jawboning. He is well-positioned to help tweak some rules, but his power could wane next year if Democrats make significant gains in the November elections.

Since taking the reins in July, the Wall Street veteran has reinvigorated the President's Working Group on Financial Markets, which had languished. He also has backed a private-sector effort to recommend changes to laws and rules that critics say handicap U.S. financial markets. And he raised business hopes that the government will ease a controversial rule created by the Sarbanes-Oxley law in response to corporate scandals.

Mr. Paulson is chairman of the Working Group, which coordinates government policy on financial markets and includes the heads of the Federal Reserve, Securities and Exchange Commission and Commodity Futures Trading Commission. Mr. Paulson has insisted that they meet about every six weeks. Before his arrival, the group met every few months and sometimes as infrequently as once a quarter.

"The issues that are natural for the President's Working Group to deal with are issues that he has thought a lot about while he was on Wall Street and to which he clearly has wanted to devote a lot of attention while he's here in Washington," said Randal Quarles, who recently stepped down as Treasury undersecretary for domestic finance.

The Working Group is a significant lever to influence policies outside the Treasury's bailiwick. The committee is "where he can have influence over the process and can shape the debate," said Rob Nichols, president of the Financial Services Forum, a group of chief executives from that industry that met with Mr. Paulson and President Bush last week. Mr. Nichols, a former Treasury spokesman, said Mr. Paulson talked about "what we can do to keep the U.S. economy competitive and keep the capital markets competitive."

Mr. Paulson's efforts are a response to a growing business concern that the regulatory and legal environment puts U.S. capital markets at a global disadvantage. Mr. Paulson often points out that more initial public offerings of stock are being issued on exchanges outside the U.S. Business leaders complain that the costs of doing business in the U.S. are increased by provisions of Sarbanes-Oxley, class-action lawsuits and a state and federal law-enforcement crackdown on corporate misbehavior.

The U.S. Chamber of Commerce on Friday held a public forum in Washington to publicize such issues. "If our capital markets become less competitive, the cost of capital rises, [stock] listings and investment opportunities go overseas," said David Chavern, the chamber's chief of staff.

Mr. Paulson is having the Working Group look at the systemic risk posed by hedge funds and derivatives, and the government's ability to respond to a financial crisis, officials said.

He has ordered his chief of staff, Jim Wilkinson, to oversee the creation of a Treasury command center to track markets world-wide and serve as an operations base in a crisis. The center would revive a market-monitoring room closed in a 2003 budget cut. Mr. Wilkinson has relevant experience: A former spokesman for the U.S. in Iraq, he was a White House aide during the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks.

Mr. Paulson, a former chief executive of Goldman Sachs who declined to comment for this article, has said the regulatory pendulum "may have swung too far" in response to corporate scandals. He is expected to sound the capital-markets-competitiveness theme in future speeches. He also has emphasized restraining the growth of federal spending, but that will require congressional cooperation, a particular challenge if Democrats take control of one or both houses of Congress.

The secretary doesn't need much congressional cooperation on other priorities, including persuading China to keep moving toward market capitalism and shoring up the competitiveness of U.S. capital markets through rule changes.

DOJ_NMG_0084936

Much depends on his persuasiveness. The Treasury's jurisdiction is limited. The controversial Sarbanes-Oxley rule -- which requires that companies assess their internal controls to ensure their financial reporting is accurate and reliable -- was crafted by the SEC and the Public Company Accounting Oversight Board. Both plan revisions before the end of the year.

Mr. Paulson, aware of the ticking clock on the Bush presidency, wants to move quickly. He told the organizers of the private Committee on Capital Markets that he wanted recommendations by next month.

"He explained what the political cycle was and that Treasury would be thinking about this issue come the new Congress in January, and if we were going to have an impact on that process, we would want to get this out by end of November," said Hal Scott, a Harvard Law School professor who heads up the panel.

The committee includes business leaders and academics but not consumer or shareholder-rights activists. It will draft a report looking at legal-liability issues, the Sarbanes-Oxley rule, shareholding rights and the regulatory process, including whether the SEC should weigh costs and benefits more explicitly before adopting rules. Mr. Paulson didn't help create the group, but he called it "important to the future of the American economy and a priority for me."

Gary Gensler, an assistant secretary for financial markets in the Clinton Treasury, said Mr. Paulson should be careful how he wields his power.

"I think that we have very competitive markets and have had for a very long time," Mr. Gensler said. "That's not to say it's not worth looking, but I think the hallmark of the U.S. markets is efficiency tied with a set of clear rules. ... There's always pressure that comes from groups to roll something back. What would be a mistake, though, is to think we need some wholesale changes."

The Third Battlefront: Money (USNEWS)

By Anna Mulrine

U.S. News and World Report, October 23, 2006

As fighting in Iraq and Afghanistan continues with brutal intensity, the Army is waging a high-stakes war on the home front as well. While President Bush signed the 2007 defense budget into law last week, Army officials were already pressing their case for 2008 funds in one of the more unusual and intrigue-filled budget battles in recent Pentagon history. It is a fight that highlights the deep stresses on a force tussling for more money and manpower while it struggles to protect expensive modern combat systems-systems that critics contend are overly ambitious in a time when war-worn equipment remains in need of critical repairs and posts across the country are struggling to pay their electric bills.

The Army fired the first salvo in its budget battle back in mid-August, when its leaders skipped a deadline for submitting their budget plan to the office of Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld. Instead, with Rumsfeld's blessing and the backing of Secretary of the Army Francis Harvey, Army Chief of Staff Peter Schoomaker took his case directly to the White House Office of Management and Budget. Schoomaker is pressing for nearly $139 billion in fiscal 2008, some $25 billion more than the Army was offered-a budget gap that is, for example, double the government's annual spending for customs, immigration, and border protection combined.

Rumsfeld's decision to allow Schoomaker to go directly to OMB was "a shocker," says a senior Pentagon official. The move was regarded by some as a Rumsfeldian maneuver to mousetrap the White House and by others as an abdication of responsibility. "If the sec def isn't setting those spending priorities, then what the heck is going on?" the official adds. The bottom line, say Pentagon officials privately, is that the Army is on its own to fight this battle. Says Congressional Research Service analyst Stephen Daggett: "I don't think there's any precedent for it."

Rival services. The question now becomes how much money the Army will get-and who pays. The latter hinges on whether OMB will increase its $462 billion "top line" budget for defense spending or whether the Army's needs will force cuts for the other services. "We're taking bets," says one senior congressional staffer. But with OMB's pledges to reduce the deficit, the odds-on favorite is the latter. That prospect, predictably, does not sit well with the Navy and Air Force, which have each traditionally received 30 percent of the defense budget's pie, versus the Army's 25 percent. Air Force Chief of Staff Michael Moseley has noted that his force had to cut some $12 billion from the budget it submitted in mid-August and 40,000 jobs from its civilian and uniformed ranks.

DOJ_NMG_0084937

The Army, by contrast, is pushing to expand, backed by congressional calls last week to increase the force by as many as 50,000 new soldiers. But troops are increasingly hard to recruit, and they're expensive-a rule of thumb is that each one requires $100,000 to find, train, and equip. At the same time, the Army is trying to protect the centerpiece of its so-called transformation plan, the Future Combat System, a network of light armored vehicles as tough as tanks, connected by high-tech communications systems. "That really irritates other senior service members because they're giving up stuff right and left," says Loren Thompson, a defense analyst with the Lexington Institute, who adds that the Army will most likely get "a lot more money, but not everything it wants." In hard budget times, services have long traded troop strength for modernization, adds Steven Kosiak, analyst at the Center for Strategic and Budgetary Assessments. "The question is, do they really need this stuff? The FCS is a very ambitious plan that has a lot of problems. It's probably more ambitious than necessary."

Senate's Baucus Uses Treasury Pick To Press Tax Gap (WSJ)

By Robert Guy Matthews

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- The Senate Finance Committee's top Democrat, Max Baucus, has since summer held up confirmation of the man nearly everyone, including Mr. Baucus, agrees is an excellent choice to be the Treasury Department's chief tax official.

The reason for Mr. Baucus's stance on Eric Solomon's confirmation: He wants Treasury to explain how it will solve the tax gap. The tax gap, or the difference between the estimated amount owed by all taxpayers and what they actually have paid, currently totals $290 billion, or about 16% of the money owed.

The tax gap, which has been surging since the 1990s, now averages about $2,200 per taxpayer. If the federal government were to close the gap completely, it would have a small surplus for the just-ended fiscal year instead of its reported $248.1 billion deficit.

According to the Internal Revenue Service's most recent analysis of the problem -- based on a sample of individual taxpayer data for 2001 -- 80% of individuals who failed to pay what they owed did so due to honest errors or misinterpretation of the tax code. The remaining 20% either knowingly paid less than they should or failed to file a return altogether. The IRS has yet to update its analysis of corporate taxpayers.

Numerous solutions have tried to address these problems, but none have proved effective so far in markedly decreasing the gap. Government officials don't even agree on its size. The Treasury Inspector General for Tax Administration, in an audit of IRS policies released this summer, said the agency likely has underestimated the amount that taxpayers owe by as much as 100%.

The IRS says it collects about 83% of the taxes owed to the government.

Efforts to narrow the tax gap have run into barriers. Last year, a presidential tax-overhaul panel proposed measures to simplify the tax code. It said many underpay taxes because they don't understand the complex rules. But its recommendations have yet to be implemented, in part because they could cost the Treasury money by reducing taxes owed.

Another approach is cracking down on those who underpay taxes on purpose. But the IRS would have to drastically increase the number of examiners and spend millions of dollars to upgrade computers so it could check a higher percentage of the 130 million individual and 25 million corporate returns filed each year.

Currently, the IRS examines fewer than 1% of returns, said Nina Olson, National Taxpayer Advocate, an independent office within the IRS that represents taxpayer concerns.

Nearly half the individuals who underreport their taxes on purpose have understated their net business income, said the IRS. Compliance among self-employed or contract workers runs as low as 30%, at least in part due to the IRS's difficulty in tracking their income.

Past get-tough policies have sparked complaints. In the late 1980s, the IRS sought to crack down on suspected tax dodgers with aggressive audits, increased property seizures and onerous regulatory procedures. The campaign triggered grumbling by taxpayers, and Congress held a series of hearings.

Lawmakers ordered the IRS to tone down its collection methods and focus on providing services to taxpayers. Congress also passed several laws limiting the IRS's autonomy.

DOJ_NMG_0084938

As a result, the IRS swung to the other extreme in the late 1990s, scaling back the number of its auditors and pursuing fewer court cases. Corporate taxpayers and high-wealth individuals took the opportunity to hatch complicated, and sometimes illegal, tax shelters that have deprived government coffers of billions of dollars, said IRS Commissioner Mark Everson.

The IRS recently started to pursue some of these cases, but that usually means long, complicated processes. Mr. Everson said he aims to strike a balance between tough enforcer and service-oriented agency but ultimately to collect as much money due the Treasury as possible.

Mr. Baucus has less-ambitious goals. The flap over Mr. Solomon's nomination to head Treasury's tax division is one of the few levers that the Democratic lawmaker has against the Bush administration.

Last week, he and Sen. Charles Grassley, chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, said they will study eight strategies to close the tax gap drafted by the Joint Committee on Taxation. The measures include strengthening requirements for reporting offshore income.

But Mr. Baucus also wants Treasury to articulate clear benchmarks in its tax-gap plan, he said, such as deadlines for shrinking the figure. "The Treasury Department's tax-gap plan isn't the complete and credible product I asked for," he said.

Scalia Sees Shift In Court's Role (WP/AP)

By John Heilprin

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

Deeply controversial issues such as abortion and suicide rights have nothing to do with the Constitution, and unelected judges too often choose to find new rights at the expense of the democratic process, according to Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia.

Scalia, during a panel Saturday on the judiciary sponsored by the National Italian American Foundation, dismissed the idea of judicial independence as an absolute virtue. He noted that dozens of states, since the mid-1800s, have chosen to let citizens elect their judges.

"You talk about independence as though it is unquestionably and unqualifiably a good thing," Scalia said. "It may not be. It depends on what your courts are doing."

He added, "The more your courts become policymakers, the less sense it makes to have them entirely independent."

Scalia, a leading conservative voice after 20 years on the court, said people naturally get upset with the growing number of cases in which a federal court intrudes on social issues better handled by the political process.

"Take the abortion issue," he said. "Whichever side wins, in the courts, the other side feels cheated. I mean, you know, there's something to be said for both sides."

"The court could have said, 'No, thank you.' The court could have said, you know, 'There is nothing in the Constitution on the abortion issue for either side,' " Scalia said. "It could have said the same thing about suicide, it could have said the same thing about . . . all the social issues the courts are now taking."

Scalia said courts didn't use to decide social issues. "It is part of the new philosophy of the Constitution," he said. "And when you push the courts into that, and when they leap into it, they make themselves politically controversial. And that's what places their independence at risk."

Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., the newest member of the Supreme Court, agreed that "the same thing exists, but to a lesser degree, with the lower courts."

About 400 people turned out at the Hilton Washington for the talk. William S. Sessions, a former FBI director and federal judge and Lynn A. Battaglia, a Maryland appeals court judge, also participated in the discussion.

Scalia expressed disdain for the news media and the general reading public, and suggested that together they condone inaccurate portrayals of federal judges and courts.

"The press is never going to report judicial opinions accurately," he said.

"They're just going to report, who is the plaintiff? Was that a nice little old lady? And who is the defendant? Was this, you know, some scuzzy guy? And who won? Was it the good guy that won or the bad guy? And that's all you're going to get in a press report, and you can't blame them, you can't blame them. Because nobody would read it if you went into the details of the law that the court has to resolve. So you can't judge your judges on the basis of what you read in the press."

Alito complained that people understand the courts through a news media that typically oversimplifies and sensationalizes. He said people's ability to amplify their comments globally about judges and their opinions on the Internet takes a toll on the judiciary.

"This is not just like somebody handing out a leaflet in the past, where a small number of people can see this," he said. "This is available to the world. . . . It changes what it means to be a judge. It certainly changes the attractiveness of a judicial career."

Scalia chimed in: "I think what Justice Alito says about being careful about, you know . . . be nice to your judge. Take a judge to lunch. No, you can't do that."

Later, Scalia observed, "It so happens that everything that is stupid is not unconstitutional."

Fostering A Facebook For The Feds (WP)

By Stephen Barr

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

MySpace. Friendster. Facebook. YoungFeds?

A nonprofit public service group launches YoungFeds.org today -- featuring blogs, message boards, video clips and, yes, some old-fashioned career advice.

"The goal is to get people in the young feds community to provide content or give direction to the content," David Roberts , 26, a leader and organizer of the online clubhouse, said as he loaded material onto the new Web site from a laptop computer Friday.

Roberts and other organizers hope the Web site will connect under-35 professionals across government and, with the help of a little buzz, grow into an online networking place for the federal sector.

The organizers of YoungFeds envision the site becoming a destination for young government workers where they, not the organizers, will create a sense of community. Over time, organizers hope, the YoungFeds site will permit users to set up blogs, create profiles, link to friends, search out other young employees in their agency, and post events on a calendar so that users can meet one another in person at breakfast forums and evening receptions.

Roberts is a staff member at the nonprofit Council for Excellence in Government, which is sponsoring the YoungFeds project in partnership with Geico, the insurance company. The project is being guided by a group of some 35 young people, in and out of government, called "35 Under 35," or "35<35."

Antony DiGiovanni , 34, is part of the steering group, and he has written what the Web site calls an "UnCommentary" about working on temporary assignment at a Capitol Hill subcommittee as a "detailee" from his agency, the Energy Department. It's called "The Devil Shouldn't Be in the Details."

About 20 percent of federal employees are 35 or younger, and many work in offices where up to 60 percent of the staff will be eligible to retire in the next 10 years.

When DiGiovanni joined Energy in 2000, he said, "I got the sense that young people feel isolated in the federal government." A Web site for younger employees, he said, could be "a promising way to help people find each other."

In addition to "UnCommentary," the YoungFeds site will feature "ProFile," accounts of young people who are making a mark in government; "Sound Bytes," featuring user-produced podcasts, webcasts and YouTube videos; and "Brand U," a summary of a hot topic in government and what a young person would need to do to take advantage of the trend.

Like many other Web sites, YoungFeds will gather feedback for a poll, called "The Gauge," to see what, for example, viewers think of new pay-for-performance rules, their office's Friday casual dress code and food in government cafeterias.

More serious offerings will include "Big League Advice" from current or former federal officials on how they climbed the ladder to success, and "Working Points," a sort of been-there-done-that column that steers young employees to data and practices that they might find useful in their professional lives.

DOJ_NMG_0084940

The site's organizers do not want to be seen as competitors to associations and membership groups, such as Young Government Leaders, but as a place that welcomes them.

"Our hope is that individuals and organizations use the site and live activities as a like-minded community to improve government," said Tony Nicely, Geico's chairman and president.

Patricia McGinnis, president of the Council for Excellence in Government, said she expects "the infectious ingenuity of this network to multiply as word spreads about what it means to be a young fed."

DiGiovanni said he plans to send e-mails today informing colleagues of the YoungFeds launch in hopes of creating some buzz about the project. "It could be more than just a Web site, and bring people together for sharing ideas," he said.

Fantasy Sports? Child's Play. Here, Politics Is The Game. (NYT)

By Cindy Chang

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

When Ellen Montgomery's co-workers relive the latest Chicago Bears victory or commiserate over the hometown team's defeat, she has nothing to add to the conversation.

Ms. Montgomery, 27, a grass-roots organizer, says she has "zero" interest in sports and is even less equipped to engage in the statistics-laden talk of fantasy sports leagues that dominates at many water coolers in sports-crazy cities like Chicago. The hours sports fans spend tracking their favorite players are for Ms. Montgomery devoted to scouring the legislative agendas of members of Congress.

Now, she and fellow policy buffs have an outlet for their competitive urges. Fantasy Congress, a Web site created by four students at Claremont McKenna College in Southern California, made its debut three weeks ago. Through word of mouth and blog entries, it has attracted nearly 600 participants from states including Texas and Florida, from as far away as Denmark and, of course, from the Beltway.

For those who have no idea how many yards Peyton Manning threw for on Sunday but can cite every legislative amendment proposed by Senator Richard Durbin, Democrat of Illinois, the game could be an alternative to the prevailing fantasy sports culture.

Congress is in recess, and many Fantasy Congress leagues are still recruiting players or are waiting until after the Nov. 7 elections to get started. It remains to be seen how the game will play out over a long legislative session. But policy enthusiasts like Ms. Montgomery say they are thrilled that there is finally something for them.

"Especially this time of year, all you hear is people talking about fantasy football leagues," Ms. Montgomery said. "I couldn't care less if I tried, either about real football or fantasy football. But hey, I actually pay attention to what goes on in Congress."

Just as in fantasy football or baseball, each player picks a team — in this case, 4 senators and 12 House members of varying seniority levels — and competes with other players in a league typically managed by a friend or a co-worker. Members determine whether to play for money or the thrill of victory. But that is where the similarities end.

On the Fantasy Congress Web site, www.fantasycongress.us, leagues have names like "We the Peeps" and "Foley4Prez," in addition to the usual school and workplace affiliations.

Players accumulate points as the legislators they have chosen go about their business on Capitol Hill. A House member or senator earns five points for introducing a bill or an amendment, and more points for negotiating successfully each step in the legislative process.

Players can change their team members once a week, so if a scandal-plagued lawmaker resigns there is an opportunity to pick someone new. As of now, legislators can be on multiple teams within a league, but the site's creators plan to introduce an exclusivity rule that would limit a legislator to playing for only one team.

A list updated daily on the Web site shows the cumulative point rankings of each legislator. Representative Don Young, Republican of Alaska and chairman of the Transportation and Infrastructure Committee, is first in the House with 1,905 points. Senator John W. Warner, Republican of Virginia and chairman of the Armed Services Committee, leads the Senate with 1,991 points.

DOJ_NMG_0084941

"There's so much more that impacts how a member of Congress can push their agenda forward than just one simple metric," said Jeremy Cogan, press secretary for Representative Grace F. Napolitano, Democrat of California, offering an explanation for why his boss was tied for last in the House rankings with Representative Ike Skelton, Democrat of Missouri.

The Web site's creators say they plan to add other ways to earn points, like floor speeches and news media references, but for now, the bill-based system is the sole measure of legislative productivity, making for a range of team-picking strategies.

Ms. Montgomery selected her team based on a combination of hard calculation — politicians running for re-election are less likely to be active on the legislative front, she reasoned — and sentimentality. Representative Rodney Frelinghuysen, a Republican from the New Jersey district where she grew up, has netted her zero points so far.

She is in first place in her league, while a friend who could not bring himself to pick any Republicans — even though the majority party has an edge in this scoring system — is in last place.

"It's about majority and seniority," said John J. Pitney Jr., a professor of government at Claremont McKenna. "You look at who's been very active, whose issues are coming up. Sometimes it's appropriations, sometimes defense or international relations." Professor Pitney was an adviser to the creators of Fantasy Congress and plans to start a team.

Andrew Lee, the senior who came up with the idea for the game and then enlisted the help of three technically skilled classmates, has a wonky side, to be sure. Mr. Lee has been a devotee of water-rights policy since childhood and at 21 has had three Washington internships. On his four-day fall break, he flew home to Colorado to work on two Democratic campaigns.

Mr. Lee is also a Denver Broncos fan and has dabbled in fantasy baseball. In his dorm room, a poster of Jake Plummer, the Broncos' quarterback, hangs across from legislators-in-action photographs from Congressional Quarterly.

One day during his freshman year, Mr. Lee was watching CNN while his roommate exulted over the results of a fantasy football team. He thought, Why not devise a similar game that would pit government aficionados against one another?

He hopes that Fantasy Congress, in addition to being fun, will teach people about their representatives and the legislative process. Professor Pitney says he will make students in his class on Congress play next semester.

If the ins and outs of Congressional business are unlikely to have the hold on the imagination that E.R.A.'s and R.B.I. do, turning those maneuverings into a game may win a few converts to the geek side.

"Everyone knows about football, but more people need to know about Congress," Mr. Lee said. "If as many people knew about Congress as knew about football, baseball and basketball, we'd all be more educated."

Bush Touting Economy Ahead Of Election (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 23, 2006

President Bush, who gets higher marks for handling the economy than running the Iraq war, is spending two days this week trying to convince voters Republicans are the best stewards of matters affecting the wallet.

White House advisers said Sunday that Bush is not trying to change the subject from a deteriorating situation in Iraq, and that he will continue to talk about Iraq and the war on terrorism as the Nov. 7 election nears. Bush advisers said they think the president should get more credit for recent positive economic news.

Overall, the economy grew at a 2.6 percent pace from April through June, compared with a 5.6 percent pace over the first three months of the year, which was the strongest spurt in 2 1/2 years. Still, voters remain uneasy even though gasoline prices have started dropping, the stock market is hitting record highs, and interest rates on credit cards and adjustable mortgages are leveling off.

White House spokesman Tony Fratto said Bush intends to mention how optimism about the economy and rising hopes for strong third-quarter earnings lifted the Dow Jones industrial average past 12,000 for the first time on Wednesday. The Conference Board's index of U.S. leading economic indicators rose last month, and the government reported last week that consumer prices fell in September by the largest amount in 10 months.

America's voters care deeply about pocketbook issues. Eighty-eight percent of likely voters say the economy is an important issue — on par with the percentage of people who view the situation in Iraq and terrorism as crucial matters, according to an Associated Press-Ipsos poll.

The AP-Ipsos poll this month found that 37 percent of likely voters say they approve of Bush's handling of Iraq overall. Forty-two percent approve of his handling of the economy.

White House political director Sara Taylor said that the economy is a key issue in about two dozen House races, including campaigns in Pennsylvania, Minnesota, Ohio and Washington state. Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to regain the House and a gain of six seats to reclaim the Senate.

"It's going to have an important impact on certain races around the country," Taylor said. "I think it's an important issue that's not getting a ton of attention."

On Monday, Bush is participating in a small business round-table at Urban Trust Bank in Washington. The bank, set up to provide mortgages, student loans and investment opportunities mainly to minorities, was founded by Robert Louis Johnson, who started BET — formerly Black Entertainment Television. Later, Bush is doing an interview with CNBC anchor Maria Bartiromo.

On Tuesday, he is campaigning in Sarasota, Fla., for businessman Vern Buchanan, who is in a tight House race against Democrat Christine Jennings, a former bank executive. The prospect of losing Florida's conservative 13th District to Democrats brought high-profile Republicans — Gov. Jeb Bush, Sen. Mel Martinez and Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney — to the area last week.

Economists Expect Rate Cut Next Year (USAT)

By Barbara Hagenbaugh And Barbara Hansen

USA Today, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — A slowing economy and declining inflation mean Federal Reserve policymakers' next interest rate move will be a cut, not an increase, economists polled by USA TODAY say.

But such a cut won't come when the Fed meets this week, they say. And they don't expect a sharp decline in short-term interest rates, which influence borrowing costs across the economy, anytime soon.

More than half of the economists say the Fed will cut interest rates in the first half of 2007. Although their outlooks vary widely, economists on average expect the Fed will cut rates just once next year, then sit on the sidelines through the end of 2007. The 53 economists were surveyed Oct. 13-18.

One cut could help the slowing housing market. A small drop in interest rates “would cause the teaser (mortgage) rates to come down a little bit and widen the number of prospective home buyers,” Wachovia senior economist Mark Vitner says.

Putnam chief economist David Kelly says the Fed will cut rates once in the second quarter to bring them to a level that neither stimulates nor slows the economy. But, “so long as the economy sort of rounds this corner and reaccelerates, I don't think they have an excuse to cut more than once.”

Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke and his colleagues meet Tuesday and Wednesday to discuss interest rate policy. All but one of the economists expect the Fed policymakers will leave the target for short-term interest rates at 5.25%, the highest in nearly six years, for a third-consecutive meeting.

The Fed raised rates 17 times from June 2004 to June 2006.

The economists say leaving rates alone now is the correct move: Two-thirds say Fed policy is “just right.” The remaining third are evenly split between saying rates are too high and rates are too low.

“If I were on the Fed, I would have dropped (rates) already,” SunTrust Bank chief economist Gregory Miller says. He says the economy has slowed significantly and notes lower rates could help mitigate the “dramatic drop” in the housing sector.

Other survey details:

•Fifty-five percent of the economists say home prices will not decline in 2007, while 45% predicted a nationwide price drop next year. Economists listed the housing market as one of the biggest weaknesses currently in the economy.

•Economists expect the unemployment rate to gradually rise to 5% by the end of the third quarter, vs. 4.6% in September. The increase reflects an economy that is expected to grow below the pace seen in 2004 and 2005.

•Three-quarters of the economists expect inflation to fall in the next six months.

Why Fed Might Keep Rates On Hold Longer Today Than It Did In 1995 (WSJ)

By Greg Ip

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Investors looking for a road map to the Federal Reserve's next moves on interest rates often look to 1995.

At the time, the Fed had raised interest rates steadily after a long period of unusually low rates. With the U.S. economy slowing, it paused for five months and then started cutting rates.

Many investors have been looking for that cycle to repeat itself and expect the Fed, which last raised interest rates in June, to begin cutting rates at some point in the next few months.

This year differs from 1995 in ways that suggest the Fed could stay on hold longer. One is that interest rates are lower now than back then. Another is that Fed officials' tolerance for inflation is quite different today.

"We have to watch carefully to make sure that [inflation] doesn't rise or even remain where it is," Fed Chairman Ben Bernanke said three weeks ago. In other words, it isn't enough that core inflation, which excludes food and energy, stops rising; the Fed wants to ensure it will be lower a year or so from now.

Mr. Bernanke's predecessor, Alan Greenspan, never laid down so explicit a marker. When Mr. Greenspan became Fed chairman in 1987, core inflation, at about 4%, was above most definitions of "price stability," (the Fed's statutory goal) including his.

However, Mr. Greenspan never put a number on what represented price stability. Transcripts of deliberations by the Fed's policy-setting Federal Open Market Committee in 1994-95, while showing plenty of concern about inflation pressure, show little discussion, especially by Mr. Greenspan, of whether the inflation rate at the time was acceptable. That frustrated some of his colleagues.

At one point, Robert Forrestal, then president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, complained that, "We talk about price stability and lower inflation, and inflation being quiescent, and so on, but I don't know what our level of tolerance is."

An important reason Mr. Greenspan didn't put a number on price stability was that declining to do so made it easier to cut rates in the face of a weak economy even if inflation was above his long-term goal. He eventually achieved price stability by taking advantage of circumstances, an approach dubbed "opportunistic disinflation." Disinflation means declining inflation.

A recession and weak expansion in the early 1990s helped nudge inflation lower, and "pre-emptive" rate increases in 1994-95 kept it from rising again. Accelerating productivity growth in the late 1990s, which enabled the economy to grow rapidly with less strain on existing capital and labor, nudged inflation lower still. Mr. Greenspan later declared that price stability had been achieved by mid-2003, when core inflation was between 1% and 1.5%.

Core inflation has since risen to 2.9%, according to last week's report on September's consumer-price index; it's a bit lower using the Fed's preferred-price index. Though the Fed has no official target for inflation, Mr. Bernanke and many of his colleagues have often suggested a ceiling of about 2%, and all agree today's rate is too high. Still, most investors expect the Fed to leave short-term rates unchanged at 5.25% at its policy meeting tomorrow and Wednesday.

Having known price stability, and then lost it, today's Fed is under added pressure to regain it. But Mr. Bernanke doesn't intend to restore price stability immediately regardless of the cost in terms of jobs. His central forecast is that as energy prices retreat, so will their indirect impact on core inflation, bringing the core rate back to around 2% by 2008. Yet the Fed is still counting on some slowing in economic growth to bring that about. That is one reason it is not alarmed, and is indeed pleased, that since June, annualized growth has probably slipped below 2.5% and is expected to continue at that rate through mid-2007.

"The economy appears to have entered a period of below-trend growth," San Francisco Federal Reserve Bank President Janet Yellen said last week. As long as that continues, it will "gradually...reverse any underlying inflationary pressures." Rather than "opportunistic disinflation," the Fed's current strategy could be called "deliberate disinflation."

A steeper slowdown or looming recession would probably prompt the Fed to shift its attention to growth from inflation, and thus to cut rates. Fed officials are aware that 2006 has parallels not just to 1995 but to 2000. In 2000, as now, strong growth had been fueled by strong investment -- business then, residential now -- and related asset prices -- stocks then, home prices now.

In 2000, Fed officials last raised rates in May, then maintained a public bias toward higher rates for seven months as, privately, their inflation worries receded and growth worries grew. In part, they feared a premature shift to easier monetary policy would reinflate the stock bubble. In retrospect, the Fed didn't realize how far tech investment would fall, undermining the entire economy. Though officials today believe housing isn't like the Nasdaq Stock Market was in 2000, they keep an open mind.

Uncertainty about housing is a major reason the Fed paused when it did in its rate-raising campaign, and that creates another distinction. Even adjusted for inflation, short-term interest rates, which the Fed controls directly, are lower now than at the same point in either the 1995 or 2000 cycles, and long-term rates are even lower.

Treasury-bond yields, minus consumers' long-term expected inflation rate, are just 1.7%, compared with 2.8% in September 2000 and 3.4% in May 1995. "Financial conditions remain quite supportive of borrowing and spending," Fed Vice Chairman Donald Kohn said three weeks ago. "Market interest rates are not high."

Fed officials still debate why long-term rates are so low. It may reflect pessimism about long-term economic growth and investment prospects world-wide, and so give the Fed a reason to worry less about inflation and more about growth. Nonetheless, moderate rates make it harder to argue monetary policy is especially tight right now -- and thus, make the case for rate cuts less compelling.

In Deregulation, Power Plants Turn Into Blue Chips (NYT)

By David Cay Johnston

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

Four big investment firms bought a group of Texas power plants in 2004 for $900 million and sold them the next year for $5.8 billion.

Sempra Energy, parent of the utility in San Diego, bought nine Texas power plants with two partners in 2004 for $430 million, selling two of them less than two years later for more than $1.6 billion.

Goldman Sachs and its partners bought power plants in upstate New York, Pennsylvania and Ohio starting in 1998 and sold them in 2001 at a profit of more than $1 billion.

These extraordinary profits have come during a decade-long effort in about half the states to overhaul the business of producing electricity — in the name of stimulating competition and lowering utility bills.

But even as some investors have profited handsomely by buying and sometimes quickly reselling power plants, electricity customers, who were supposed to be the biggest beneficiaries of the new system, have not fared so well. Not only have their electricity rates not fallen, in many cases they are rising even faster than the prices of the fuels used to make the electricity. Those increases stand in contrast to the significantly lower prices in other businesses in which competition was introduced, such as airlines and long-distance calling.

Some electricity customers are also being saddled with monthly surcharges to cover construction costs for plants that were sold at bargain prices and then resold at huge profits. Some of these surcharges will continue for years.

Analysts cite several reasons that the new system has not been as successful as hoped.

Regulators required some utilities to sell their power plants so that independent electricity producers could compete on equal footing with those plants. But not enough new competitors emerged.

And sometimes regulators allowed utility holding companies to transfer plants from their regulated utilities to unregulated wholly owned subsidiaries. When some of these unregulated sister companies still found it hard to turn a profit, regulators allowed the plants to become regulated companies again, so they were virtually guaranteed state-approved profit rates.

By last year, only 63 percent of the nation's electricity generating capacity was owned by utilities, down from almost 90 percent 10 years ago. Often customers did not come out ahead, critics of the new system say.

Take the case of the Texas power plants. After the Texas Legislature, urged by Enron and big industrial customers, voted to make electricity generation a competitive business, the utility serving the Houston area sold 60 power plants that generate most of the power for the area to four investment firms — the Texas Pacific Group, the Blackstone Group, Kohlberg Kravis Roberts and Hellman & Friedman — which soon resold the plants at the $5 billion profit.

But state regulators have ordered electricity customers to pay an average of $4.75 monthly for 14 years to finish paying for the construction of the power plants, plus interest.

And the utility that sold the plants, Centerpoint, is suing for even higher payments from customers. Houston-area consumers now pay among the highest electricity rates, nearly double the national average.

Supporters of deregulation said customers would benefit from healthy competition among a growing number of electricity producers. But such competition has not developed. For one thing, many of the new power plants failed because, unlike many of the old plants, they almost all used natural gas to produce electricity. Demand for natural gas soared, and the price for that fuel tripled, making electricity from these plants too costly to be competitive.

The value of these plants collapsed, and some owners sought refuge in bankruptcy court. That is when investment firms, anticipating a much higher price for the plants' electricity, bought them for as little as 20 cents for each dollar spent to build them.

And in fact the investment firms calculated doubly right: By paying so little for the plants, they made the construction costs of new plants by competitors seem prohibitively expensive. Over the last five years, few new power plants have been built, although demand for electricity has risen.

The story has been different for electricity customers. Many of the power plants that were sold are still owned by the utilities' parent companies; they were simply transferred from the regulated utilities to unregulated sister companies. Some regulators allowed utilities to favor the sister companies with long-term contracts even if they did not offer the best price for electricity.

In fact, independent electricity producers argue that their modern generating plants often sit idle while older, inefficient plants owned by politically powerful utilities and their unregulated sister companies whir around the clock under long-term contracts. For example, Calpine, an independent generating company, and some big industrial customers have complained that Entergy, the Louisiana utility holding company, is favoring its own plants when Calpine's power would be cheaper. Congress has ordered studies of the issue.

Because utilities are still allowed to pass on the cost of the power they buy, they have little incentive to choose a cheaper supplier. Electricity customers therefore end up paying more than they would have to if electricity production were truly competitive.

After Baltimore Gas & Electric transferred its 12 power plants to an unregulated affiliate and became only a distribution company, it continued to buy 70 percent of its electricity from the plants because there were not enough independent generators to supply the area's needs. Baltimore Gas & Electric sought a 72 percent rate increase this year, causing such an outcry that Maryland regulators gave it only an immediate 15 percent, but with big additional increases virtually guaranteed over the next few years.

Paul Allen, a spokesman for the utility's parent company, Constellation Energy, said that Baltimore Gas & Electric rates had been frozen since 1993 and that the increase largely reflected the higher price of producing electricity, including the cost of fuel. He said a rate increase was inevitable regardless of the new system.

But Robert McCullough, a utility economist and consultant, disagreed and blamed the new system. He said that in places like Baltimore, where a utility's plants were sold to an unregulated sister company, "the same energy is generated by the same plants, owned by the same owners, and sold to the same customers, simply at a vastly higher price."

Ralph Nader, head of the watchdog group Public Citizen, said that many power plants were sold for artificially low prices and that state regulators often failed to protect customers. He said regulators should have required price protection to shield consumers from a "double header corporate gouge, where the defenseless customer is paying twice for the same power plants."

The American Electric Power Company, which owns utilities in 11 states, sold nine of its Texas power plants to SEMPRA, the parent of a San Diego utility company, and the Carlyle Group in 2004 for $430 million. SEMPRA and Carlyle quickly resold two of the plants for $1.6 billion.

American Electric wanted customers to pay an average of $9 a month for 14 years to cover the difference between the cost of building the plants and the lower price for which it sold them, plus interest. But because the resold plants went for 15 times as much per unit of generating capacity, state regulators questioned whether the utility should have sold the plants for higher prices. Still, regulators have required customers to pay on average $5 per month for 14 years, or more than $800 each.

There are persistent allegations that many plants have become inordinately profitable for their new owners; in some cases, disputes have arisen over just how profitable the plants are. In Connecticut, three plants together earn at least $700 million in annual profits, money that is over and above the 10 percent profit they would earn if they were still in the regulated system, Attorney General Richard Blumenthal said. He wants the state to end the new system and return to a more regulated system or even have a state agency provide power.

The plant owners, P.S.E.& G. and Dominion, said that the profit estimates were "wildly exaggerated" and that most of the power was sold at fixed prices with profits not significantly different from what regulated plants would earn. They did not release precise profit figures.

In Ohio, the state's consumer advocate, Janine Migden-Ostrander, said the potential savings from a competitive electricity industry were undercut by favoritism that regulators showed to utility companies.

In effect, she said, Ohio regulators allowed an extremely favorable price when unregulated sister companies acquired power plants. The lower the price a sister company pays for a power plant, the more difficult it is for an independent power producer that must build an expensive new plant to compete. That "is how the utilities killed the market before it could be started," she said.

Lynn Hargis, a longtime utility regulation lawyer who now volunteers as counsel to Public Citizen, said the terms under which power plants were sold are "the equivalent of selling your grandmother's house for the price she paid 60 years ago, less depreciation. No one would do that."

The utilities say that no one knew at the time the plants were sold that they would later soar in value. Floyd Le Blanc, a spokesman for Centerpoint, the Texas company that sold the 60 Houston-area plants, said, "We complied with all legal and regulatory requirements." His remarks were echoed by other utilities.

But even after buying plants at low prices, some utilities have been unable to profit in a competitive setting after decades of operating in a regulated market, where profits are virtually guaranteed. State governments have provided a refuge.

Corporate parents with both regulated utilities and unregulated power plant companies have persuaded sometimes reluctant regulators to allow them to put failing plants into the hands of the regulated utilities, where they were almost certain to turn a profit, said Richard Stavros, executive editor of Public Utilities Fortnightly, a trade magazine. That has happened in Arizona, Missouri, Texas and other states.

Arizona Public Service, for example, brought five plants owned by its unregulated affiliate, Pinnacle Energy West, into the utility. The staff of the state board that regulates utilities at first opposed the deal, saying it was not in the best economic interests of customers. But the staff relented after Arizona Public Service promised it would not add any power plants to its regulated operations before 2015, which may encourage others to enter the market.

The Federal Energy Regulatory Commission recently approved a deal to move a Texas power plant back into a regulated utility, although it expressed concern that allowing utilities' parent companies to salvage their failed investments in the competitive market could be unfair to competing generating companies.

The sale back to utilities of power plants that are not making money is "a disturbing national trend," said Jan Smutny-Jones, executive director of Independent Energy Producers in Sacramento, Calif., a trade association for power plant owners.

"It's a great deal," he said, "having ratepayers cover your managerial mistakes."

Olden Days Seniors In Vermont Are Finding They Can Go Home Again (WSJ)

By Lucette Lagnado

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

BURLINGTON, Vt. -- While a patient at a nursing home here, Albert Blow picked up the phone one day in 2004 and called his ex-wife. "If I had a gun," he said, "I would shoot myself."

Mr. Blow, a former security guard felled by a heart attack and stroke, had gone to the nursing home for what he hoped would be a few months of rehabilitation. Paralyzed in an arm and a leg, his stay grew to more than a year. He feared he would never live independently again.

Now Mr. Blow, 71 years old, is back in his own place, thanks to an unusual Vermont experiment that seeks to shift government money from nursing homes into private homes. The state pays for his ex-wife to care for him.

In an effort being watched around the nation, Vermont is trying to give elderly people a choice of where they want to be cared for: in an institution or at home. To create more home-care workers, the state has been paying for family members to care for aging relatives, at about $10 an hour. If Vermont's program works, it could influence a wider change in the multibillion-dollar industry that cares for the aged.

"We are never going to build another nursing home," says Patrick Flood, commissioner of Vermont's Department of Disabilities, Aging and Independent Living. "It is an outdated model."

As the number of older Americans -- and the cost of caring for them -- soars, the federal government is pushing efforts like the one in Vermont. Advocates say in-home care could improve the lives of many seniors, while saving the government money. But the idea faces huge hurdles, including opposition from the nursing-home industry and a culture of dispersed, busy families that has become accustomed to having others care for their loved ones.

In July, the federal Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services announced grants totaling $1.75 billion to states to encourage them to do what Vermont is doing -- find alternatives to institutional care. Besides home care, Vermont is encouraging assisted-living facilities, privately run boarding homes for seniors and elder day-care centers. All this would be a big change from the last four decades, during which nursing homes became the dominant, and often only, option for a frail senior dependent on federal programs.

For more than 40 years, federal law has said that poor seniors are automatically entitled to nursing-home care. That has sent hundreds of billions of dollars to nursing homes. But in-home care hasn't been considered an entitlement equally eligible for government funds.

"It is a crazy situation," says Vermont's Commissioner Flood. "The service that people don't want and is more expensive" is guaranteed by the government, while "the service people prefer and is cheaper, isn't."

According to a 2002 Vermont study, it cost the state $122 a day for a senior to be institutionalized versus $80 a day to receive care at home.

Vermont is one of the first states to get federal approval to offer home care as an option equal to nursing-home care under Medicaid, the government program that subsidizes health care for the poor. The state is calling home care an "entitlement." Under Vermont's "Choices for Care" program, Medicaid sets a budget limit for the state to care for seniors and people with disabilities. Vermont then uses a combination of federal and state money to reimburse in-home caregivers.

Mr. Blow says he found nursing-home life regimented and monotonous -- "all the same stuff, morning, noon and night," he says. While he once had a passion for poker, he says he lost interest in cards and other activities. He says he couldn't afford to hold on to his apartment or his car.

Medicaid allows nursing homes to use the income of patients -- such as Social Security or pension payments -- to help pay for their care. But that can add to the finality of their stay, says John Barbour, executive director of the Champlain Valley Agency on Aging, the nonprofit group that helped Mr. Blow get his own place. "It makes it impossible for people to go back home because for the most part they don't have the ability to maintain another residence."

Karen Gissendanner, a social worker with the agency, met Mr. Blow by chance. Her father-in-law was Mr. Blow's roommate. She recalls being struck by how despondent he seemed. "I saw him wilting and withering," she says. At the nursing home, "all they saw was a man who needed a lot of care," she says, "They didn't see the possibilities."

Kindred Healthcare Inc., a Louisville, Ky.-based for-profit chain that, through a subsidiary, manages and is part-owner of the nursing home where Mr. Blow lived, wouldn't discuss his case in detail, citing privacy concerns. A spokesman for Burlington, Vt.-based Fletcher Allen Health Care, a not-for-profit academic medical center that owns 50% of the nursing home, noted the "stressful" circumstances Mr. Blow found himself in and said "it is understandable that he would feel very distressed about his situation and his future." The spokesman added: "I am pleased to learn this patient is now in an appropriate residential situation that is far more satisfactory to him."

In a statement, the nursing home itself, called Starr Farm Nursing Center, said it "is proud of the quality of care that was provided to Mr. Blow while a resident of our facility." Due to resident confidentiality, the facility said it can't comment on specifics of individual cases. It called the Choices for Care program a "forward-thinking initiative" and said it is "working with the state to find appropriate discharge options for our residents."

With help from the nonprofit agency, Mr. Blow moved out of the nursing home. His Social Security and pension money now go to pay for a one-bedroom apartment geared to the disabled. The state uses Medicaid funds, distributed through a home-health agency, to pay Charlene Anair, 56, his ex-wife, to care for him.

Their current arrangement, coming 16 years after their divorce, works better than their marriage did, both say. "I wasn't that good of a husband," Mr. Blow says. "I was never true to any woman."

"He put me through hell," says Ms. Anair, who was his third wife.

Yet, as a former licensed nurse, she was moved to see the man she had known as tough reduced to helplessness and despair. She now earns $9.27 an hour caring for him. Ms. Anair helps him dress, escorts him to cardiac therapy twice a week, shops for groceries, and even takes him to visit his parents' graves. Asked why she devotes herself to his recovery, she laughs: "I really don't know -- the nurse in me." She adds: "It is like this is where I am supposed to be."

Mr. Blow says he is making progress. Before, he could neither deal nor hold a hand of poker. Now he can at least hold the cards. He eats what he likes, when he likes. He recently took a bus trip to see the fall foliage. For his birthday last month, Ms. Anair got him a puppy named Odie.

On a sunny afternoon, Mr. Blow left his apartment in his motorized wheelchair, maneuvering streets on his way to his favorite destination: the Veterans of Foreign Wars hall. Inside a large dimly lit room with a bar, a pool table and a jukebox, friends gathered to play pinochle. Mr. Blow was greeted like a hero. "We deal for him," said Larry Clark, one of his buddies. "He's good -- very good."

Mr. Blow picked up his cards and began to play.

Shifting Balance

Nationwide, most of the billions in government money spent each year to care for the elderly go to nursing homes. In 2005, Medicaid spent $38 billion on institutional care for the elderly, or 82% of its long-term care budget. It spent $8 billion, or 18% of the total, for home or community-based care.

That balance has been slowly shifting, according to an analysis of the last five years by the Centers for Medicare & Medicaid Services. In 2002, 87% went to institutional care, while 13% went to home or community care.

The nursing-home industry has voiced opposition to Vermont's initiative, saying it will hurt its business and isn't in the best interests of all seniors.

"We knew that this was probably the death knell for some of our nursing homes," says Mary Shriver, executive director of the Vermont Health Care Association, which represents nursing homes.

She says home care may not be suitable for everyone. "Is the infrastructure there for the people who may need 24-hour, seven-day-a-week care?" she asks. In a letter to Medicaid, Ms. Shriver challenged whether home care is really more cost-effective than institutional care, as Vermont contends.

Under the Vermont program, elderly people typically receive 25 to 30 hours of care a week. If caretakers live with an elderly relative, they aren't compensated beyond a set number of hours. Seniors who live on their own may be unattended for significant stretches, including nights or weekends, because of limits on the number of hours of care they can receive or because of a shortage of available home-care workers.

The state says that not every elderly person needs 24-hour care. Officials contend that even in a nursing home, residents don't get around-the-clock attention. A state analysis found that nursing homes provide one-on-one care only a couple of hours day, if that, says Bard Hill, a state official who works closely with the Vermont commissioner.

"Someone may not be sitting by your side 24 hours a day," says Ms. Shriver, "but there is someone there at 3 in the morning, midnight, 2 in the afternoon, you name it." The industry also argues that private homes may not be as safe as nursing homes. In a letter to Mr. Flood, state legislators, and the governor, Ms. Shriver noted, for instance, that "all nursing homes in Vermont must have sprinkler systems," as well as fire drills.

Finally, the state's plan "is relying on families and I am not sure that is possible," she says. "This is a very mobile society."

DOJ_NMG_0084949

The American Health Care Association, which represents more than 10,000 nursing homes and care facilities around the U.S., has voiced "significant concerns" to Medicaid about Vermont's program, says Janice Zalen, senior director of special programs. The group is "concerned that people would not be getting the care that they needed -- both amount and quality," she says.

Vermont is a "laboratory" and what happens there has implications for the country, Ms. Zalen says. But other states may not be able copy Vermont's effort, she says, because it's a small, "homogeneous" state with a strong infrastructure for home and community care that other states lack.

The home-care option doesn't work for everyone. A nurse working on behalf of Vermont's program went to the bedside of 101-year-old Rose Cadieux in July. Ms. Cadieux had lived independently until a fall weeks earlier landed her in the hospital. As with many seniors, she was sent to a nursing home for rehabilitation.

"What do you think will be your next step?" the nurse asked.

Ms. Cadieux seemed flustered. "I don't know," she said. "At my age, you never know."

"As much as possible, we would like people to have a choice," said the nurse, Toni Morgan, handing her information about the new initiative.

"I was living on my own," said Ms. Cadieux. "I was happy."

The nurse told her that under the Choices for Care program, she could potentially obtain care in her own home. "Oh my God, I'd love it," she said.

But if the family isn't able to provide home care, it is difficult for the state to step in. Ms. Cadieux's son died years ago. The person who has looked after her is her daughter-in-law. "I am the only one she has," says Peggy Cadieux, her 72-year-old daughter-in-law. But she is frail herself, and says she can no longer handle the responsibility.

Weeks later, Rose Cadieux lost her apartment. She is now a permanent resident of the nursing home. Her daughter-in-law says she visits often.

For people who really need full-time care, "there are only two ways to get it," says Mr. Barbour, of the nonprofit agency on aging. "You pay privately -- which virtually no one can afford -- or you have a family or other support network that is able to provide it." Sometimes, he says, "nursing homes are the only choice."

Ready to Change

Some in the nursing-home industry say the business is ready to change. "There is an old proverb, if the horse on which you are riding has died, get off," says Larry Minnix, president of the American Association of Homes and Services for the Aging, which represents 5,600 not-for-profit long-term care providers. "Nobody has told any industry that they are guaranteed to exist in their current form."

At a summit in Baltimore this summer, a group of executives from 65 nursing homes and long-term care facilities around the nation discussed ways to deliver care at home. Traditional nursing homes may have to convert to assisted- or independent-living facilities, Mr. Minnix says. Some already are.

The Vermont program has also been funding other types of living arrangements, such as small boarding houses for the elderly. These privately run homes are an alternative that state officials often view as better and more cost-effective than large institutions.

To make housing alternatives work, advocates say there needs to be more community support available. Joanne Corbett runs Project Independence, a nonprofit elder day-care center in Middlebury. The center, open six days a week, 12 hours a day, offers classes, a putting green, concerts, movies and a glee club. It even cares for many seniors with Alzheimer's disease. Ms. Corbett hopes the center will soon be open Sundays too, providing seniors with activities and giving caretakers a break.

"We are not anti-nursing home," she says. "We simply try to stall it and in most cases we can prevent it."

Vermont's program is a model for other states, says Wendy Fox-Grage, senior policy adviser with the AARP's Public Policy Institute. "It is turning the ship around."

Still, America's system for caring for the aged is a very big ship, which for more than 40 years has sailed in the direction of subsidizing hospitals and nursing homes and the thousands of jobs they create.

DOJ_NMG_0084950

So far, Vermont has found it isn't easy to change the flow of dollars. One year into its "Choices for Care" program, Vermont has achieved incremental results: There are 2,131 residents in nursing homes, 155 fewer than in October 2005. There are 1,111 people receiving home care, or 123 more than last year at this time. Another 500 or so Medicaid patients -- who aren't quite eligible for nursing homes yet need help -- were able to get care at home under this program, according to the state.

Nursing homes have become such an intrinsic part of the way Americans care for the elderly that it may be exceedingly hard to go back to an older, family-based system of care. The advent of nursing homes coincided with a rise in two-income families, more women going to work and people living much longer.

Kathryn Lawler, who heads Aging Atlanta, a project focusing on ways to help the elderly live at home, says nursing homes fulfilled a need. "To be completely crass, you can send your mother there and all would be taken care of -- it is a one-stop shop. You would come, bring her flowers, but your responsibilities would be pretty limited."

The U.S. health-care system, she says, also fuels the use of nursing homes. Hospitals, under pressure to keep stays as short as possible, often discharge patients to nursing homes. Life-altering changes sometimes are made quickly. Family members, unsure of what to do with ailing, aged relatives may go along with the move to an institution, because the government will pay for the care. "Life is so busy, and at the moment where a decision is made, it seems easier to go to a nursing home," says Ms. Lawler.

"It is a direct chute from hospitals to the nursing homes," says Jackie Majoros, Vermont's nursing-home and long-term care ombudsman.

In Vermont, the government subsidies for home care have allowed some families to get closer to aging relatives.

Winona Greaves' children and grandchildren were pained to see what happened to the 96-year-old matriarch after her nursing-home admission. Unhappy and lonely, she stopped eating.

Fearing they were about to lose her, the family resolved to bring "Gram" home. Her granddaughter, Laurie Bailey, 49, left her job to look after her grandmother. Vermont's program has made it economically feasible by letting her earn $9.25 an hour, about what she earned part-time at the local Price Chopper grocery store, she says. The state approved about 40 hours of work a week for her, increasing her earnings.

"Gram took care of me," says Ms. Bailey, recalling a period years back when she was ill and her grandmother ministered to her. "When time came that Gram needed the help, I quit my job and here I am."

On Sept. 27, 2005, Mrs. Greaves came home, after being in the nursing home for several months. She made the trip to her daughter's home in East Montpelier lying on an ambulance gurney.

When she went to sleep that first night, her 69-year-old daughter, Pauline Coburn, recalls, "I was afraid my mother wasn't going to be alive in the morning."

Instead, Mrs. Greaves stunned everyone by staging a recovery. Within two days, she was alert and eating ice cream. "I'm so glad to be here," she said, according to her case manager's notes for Sept. 29. With her granddaughter helping her, she began taking steps with a walker. Home cooking helped restore her appetite. Sitting in the sunroom cheered her up.

By Thanksgiving, Mrs. Greaves was chipper enough to iron the napkins and mix the cookie dough.

"It is the love," says Ms. Bailey, who gives her grandmother medicines, bathes her, dresses her and files daily reports to the Central Vermont Home Health and Hospice agency, which supervises the care.

State officials believe there is an untapped pool of workers like Ms. Bailey who may want to care for a family member. Sheer necessity has forced Vermont to think creatively. In many states, home-attendant jobs are often held by minority or immigrant women who earn as little as $6 to $8 an hour. Vermont has an educated labor force and many people tend to leave the state for higher-paying jobs. There is a severe shortage of caregivers, so hiring relatives can be ideal. "Our system of long-term care has to find a way to support the natural caregiver," says Commissioner Flood. "The nursing homes broke that."

Next, state officials want Medicaid to pay spouses to be caregivers. That's not allowed under current Medicaid rules, although hiring an ex-spouse is permitted.

The idea of paying relatives is controversial. There is concern that family members may not be qualified to care for seniors, or that the caregivers are being overtaxed. Mrs. Coburn says that even with the support the family receives, it is still hard. There is constant pressure, and any holiday or weekend away must be coordinated so that someone is home to watch over her mother.

DOJ_NMG_0084951

Mrs. Greaves, elegantly dressed and coiffed, sat in an armchair in her small ground-floor bedroom. The former teacher, who once taught in a one-room schoolhouse, still devours a good novel. Her great-grandson, Cyrus, 8, who lives up the hill, is constantly over. She loves watching him play.

"I guess that I surprised everyone," Mrs. Greaves said with a smile. "I was a lot of trouble, wasn't I?"

Her daughter cautions: "Don't make it sound too wonderful. There are four generations in this house. I don't want people to think it is too easy."

As G.O.P. Mopes, Bush Adds The Duties Of Optimist In Chief (NYT)

By Sheryl Gay Stolberg And Jim Rutenberg

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 22 — The capital is filled with Republicans convinced that they will lose the House and maybe the Senate. So last week, the White House and party leaders convened a "friends and allies" teleconference to dispute what Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee, considers flawed conventional wisdom.

For 20 minutes, Mr. Mehlman and the White House political director, Sara Taylor, tried to lift the cloak of gloom that has descended on the top ranks of Republican strategists, using what one of the dozens of lobbyists, donors, party aides and other supporters who listened in later called "happy talk."

President Bush and his political strategists may be the most outwardly optimistic Republicans in Washington these days, and perhaps the only ones. They are doing their best to fend off the sense of impending doom within their party that they fear will become a self-fulfilling prophecy on Nov. 7.

They are enlisting longtime allies for an all-hands-on-deck effort to change the mood for the final push to Election Day, and they are putting out the word for Republicans to keep a lid on any pessimistic talk. They are also planning a travel blitz for Mr. Bush during the final week to 10 days of the campaign.

And though they fully expect to lose seats, they are also keeping their fingers crossed. They are counting on a barrage of last-minute advertising and their 72-hour voter turnout operation to keep Democrats from taking over the House and Senate, even if it means they only eke out a victory.

But those the White House counts on to help raise party morale at such low moments say they are having a hard time of it, when so many polls augur ever-worsening election results and when so many things have gone wrong, including the Mark Foley scandal and grim news from Iraq.

"I'm trying to buck people up, but let's just say I'm hiding all the sharp objects in my office," said Rich Bond, a former Republican National Committee chairman who now runs a consulting firm.

Even Mary Matalin, the longtime Bush family aide and confidante, confessed, "I'm in my stoic mode now," though she said she believed that the party would prove the dire predictions wrong.

Mr. Bush has been saying for months that he believes Republicans will keep control of the House and the Senate, and he is not changing his tune now, even if it means taking the rare step of rebuking his own father.

In an interview shown Sunday on ABC News, Mr. Bush was asked about a comment by the first President Bush, who said this month that he hated to think about life for his son if Democrats took control of Congress. "He shouldn't be speculating like that, because he should have called me ahead of time," the president said, "and I'd tell him they're not going to."

The president's professed certainty, shared with outside friends and advisers, is a source of fascination among even his staunchest allies. In lobbying shops and strategy firms around town, the latest Republican parlor game is divining whether the White House optimism is staged, or whether Mr. Bush and his political team really believe what they are saying.

There are hints that the mood is not so upbeat or unremittingly confident in the West Wing. Mr. Bush and his inner circle, people in regular contact with them say, are well aware of the Democratic surge recorded by polls, and of the stakes for the final two years of an administration already burdened with troubles like the deteriorating situation in Iraq.

A strategist close to the White House said Mr. Bush's own political team had polling that showed as many as 14 House seats were probably already lost to Democrats, just one shy of the 15 seats they need to gain to win control.

Though White House aides said that account was exaggerated, they acknowledged that polls have shown at least that many races with Democrats leading Republicans. "Their attitude is, 'We've got our backs against the wall, but we know how to fight our way out of this,' " said Charles Black, a Republican strategist who has been in regular contact with Karl Rove, Mr. Bush's senior adviser. "They're not unrealistic, but they're optimistic that we can still win."

Officials are telling their friends that they believe a final volley of intensive attacks by the White House will return the party to where it was before the Foley scandal, by casting the election as a choice between Democrats and Republicans over national security and taxes.

Mr. Bush and Mr. Rove are discounting predictions of Republican demise in part because they believe they have turned out wrong before. "I remember 2004," Mr. Bush said in the interview shown on "This Week." "I was history as far as the punditry was concerned."

Mr. Rove has told associates that the party's turnout machinery, through which the White House will continue to pump an unrelenting message against Democrats on taxes and terrorism, gives Republicans an advantage of four to seven percentage points in any given race. Though Democrats call that too generous, they acknowledge that it accounts for at least a few percentage points.

Mr. Rove and Ms. Taylor are said by associates to have spent hours going through data on volunteer efforts, voter registration tallies and financial matchups between candidates throughout the states, and they see a path to victory.

"You've got 452 races this year; many of them are already settled," Tony Snow, the White House spokesman, said in an interview on Sunday. "Our view is fight hard to win the ones you can win. And we think there are enough of those that we will win both houses."

For all the difficulties this year, Mr. Bush is said to have full confidence in Mr. Rove, Mr. Mehlman and Ms. Taylor.

Mr. Bush has always relished political combat. On the campaign trail, he can be seen slapping backs and clapping hands with coachlike enthusiasm, even as he embraces candidates whose campaigns seem like lost causes.

And far more than he lets on, Mr. Bush is a student of politics, up to speed on the nuances of races and tactics. Meeting with conservative talk radio hosts last month, Mr. Bush expressed optimism that Republicans would win. But he also lamented that victory would come in spite of "stupid moves" by some candidates, according to one host, Michael Medved, who participated in the meeting and wrote about it on his Web site.

Saulius Anuzis, the chairman of the Michigan Republican Party, said that on two recent occasions, Mr. Bush indicated that he understood the minutia of the state's electorate and how it would affect the Republican candidate for Senate there, Sheriff Michael J. Bouchard of Oakland County. "He knew more than the perfunctory," Mr. Anuzis said. "He said having the sheriff out of Oakland County, which is a swing county, ought to be a big help."

In some respects, Mr. Bush has been stuck in the stable this political season, with low approval ratings that have made him less of an asset on the campaign trail, unlike in 2002 when he blitzed through the states giving pep talks and rallies as a far more popular president. White House aides say it has been far more important to have the president helping to raise money, often at closed events, than to have him at rallies that cost money to organize.

His schedule has not seemed as packed as Mr. Snow and other aides predicted last month, when they said he was likely to be on the road almost constantly through October. The president's schedule for this week shows him campaigning on only two days, Tuesday and Thursday, in Florida, Iowa and Michigan.

But aides said rallies and fund-raisers in the final week of the campaign would keep him front and center, making an increasingly pointed argument against Democrats.

The president's stump speech is the only place where he publicly contemplates Democratic control, raising it only to motivate Republicans. Mr. Bush's aides say he has refused to let them even be seen planning for a possible Democratic takeover so as not to give volunteers or donors any reason to doubt that their efforts will pay off.

And he demonstrates annoyance with questions about what his administration is doing to plan for a potential Democratic takeover of the House.

"I don't buy into that premise," Mr. Bush told Bill O'Reilly of Fox News. Calling the query a "trick question," he added: "The minute I start answering your question, the word is 'Well, Bush anticipates losing.' I don't anticipate losing."

GOP Losses Could Spark Partisan Warfare (AP-Y)

By Tom Raum, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 23, 2006

The White House is bracing for guerrilla warfare on the homefront politically if Republicans lose control of the House, the Senate or both — and with it, the president's ability to shape and dominate the national agenda.

Republicans are battling to keep control of Congress. But polls and analysts in both parties increasingly suggest Democrats will capture the House and possibly the Senate on Election Day Nov. 7.

Democrats need a 15-seat pickup to regain the House and a gain of six seats to claim the Senate.

Everything could change overnight for President Bush, who has governed for most of the past six years with a Republican Congress and with little support from Democrats.

"Every session you change the way you do business with the Congress. And you test the mood of the Congress, find out what their appetite will be. But it doesn't change your priorities," the president told ABC News.

Former President Clinton had to deal with the Democrats' loss of control of Congress in 1994. But Clinton had something Bush does not: six more years to regain his footing.

Bush has barely over two years left. The loss of either house in voting next month could hasten Bush's descent into a lame-duck presidency.

"If he loses one house here, President Bush will enter the last two years very wounded," said David Gergen, a former White House adviser who served in the administrations of Presidents Nixon, Ford, Reagan and Clinton.

"He will have the capacity to say no to Democratic legislation, but he won't have the capacity to say yes to his own legislation," said Gergen, who teaches at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government.

Democratic victories essentially could block Bush's remaining agenda and usher in a period of intense partisan bickering over nearly every measure to come before Congress.

Loss of either chamber also could subject his administration to endless congressional inquiries and investigations.

The president and chief political strategist Karl Rove last week expressed renewed confidence of retaining both House and Senate; others are not so upbeat.

"All of our numbers look pretty bad and there's no question that there's a jet stream in our face," said House Majority Leader John Boehner, R-Ohio.

Furthermore, some of Bush's fighting in the trenches is likely to be with fellow Republicans as they seek to find a new standard bearer for 2008 — and distance themselves from an unpopular war, the unpopular president who waged it, and congressional scandals that include inappropriate e-mails to House pages from ex-Rep. Mark Foley, R-Fla.

"There's no question that the Republican coalition is stressed over the way Washington has been handling fiscal matters, the Foley affair, the Iraq war," said GOP consultant Scott Reed. "All of these are coming together at the same time."

Already, Republicans are showing divisions on Iraq policy. Fresh skepticism has come from Senate Armed Services Chairman John Warner of Virginia, Texas Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison and former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, a longtime Bush family loyalist.

If Republicans lose their majorities, it will be that much harder for Bush to hold together already splintering GOP cohesion on Iraq.

Bush has been quoted by journalist Bob Woodward as saying, "I'll stay in Iraq even if the only support I have left is from my wife and my dog." A Democratic takeover and Republican defections could make that day seem closer.

While the Senate has been difficult for Bush, even with GOP control, the House for most of his presidency has delivered for him. That could be about to change.

The White House traditionally loses seats in midterm congressional races. The most recent exception was 2002, when Bush's party picked up seats.

Many Democrats see the upcoming elections as a mirror image of 1994, with the parties reversed.

Then, Republicans rallied behind firebrand Rep. Newt Gingrich of Georgia, announced a "Contract with America," and stormed to victory, seizing both House and Senate from Democrats.

DOJ_NMG_0084954

It was a huge blow to Clinton, made worse by the lavish and almost-presidential reception Gingrich received around Washington as he was inaugurated as House speaker.

Doug Schoen, Clinton's pollster then, said those times were bleak, including Clinton's baleful insistence to reporters in early 1995 that "the president is relevant."

But Clinton soon figured out how to enhance his relevance and influence, reaching out to Republicans on some of their own issues, such as welfare law overhaul and "talking about the common good," said Schoen. Clinton went on to easily win re-election in 1996.

But Schoen said he doubts Bush can do the same: "After 9-11, except for a brief period, he's governed from the right. There's so much bitterness and division, it's going to be tougher for him to do it than perhaps it was for Clinton."

Some of Bush's sharpest critics would rise to top positions with a Democratic takeover.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., probably would become speaker. Rep. Charles Rangel, D-N.Y., a foe of extending Bush tax cuts, would become chairman of the tax-writing House Ways and Means Committee.

Rep. John Conyers of Michigan, who has sponsored legislation calling for steps that could open the way to Bush's impeachment, would lead the Judiciary Committee.

If Democrats win the Senate, Democratic leader Harry Reid of Nevada — one of the most outspoken of all Bush critics — probably would ascend to majority leader.

The Republican Party chairman, Ken Mehlman, even raises the specter of a leadership troika of Pelosi, Reid and Democratic party chief Howard Dean, in GOP fundraising mailings to Republicans.

Bush, in his own get-out-the-vote appeal, told Republicans: "The consequences of not succeeding this fall are dire for our agenda for America."

Bush even suggested last week that insurgents in Iraq were stepping up their violence in a bid to influence the elections.

Polls in 2006 show a more dramatic tilt toward the Democrats than polling in 1994 showed a tilt toward Republicans. But redistricting has made far fewer congressional districts competitive.

A Democratic takeover of one or more chambers would all but guarantee that Bush would not get his Social Security overhaul or further tax cuts through Congress.

One Bush initiative that actually might see improved chances is his immigration proposal for a "guest worker" program. That actually has more Democratic than Republican support.

Stephen Wayne, a professor of government at Georgetown University, said a loss of House or Senate would cripple Bush domestically — but might actually give him more room to find a way out of Iraq.

"Were he to choose to moderate the course in Iraq, the Democrats would say, `I told you so' and the Republicans would say, `Thank you,'" said Wayne.

Parties Working To Win The Turnout Battle (WT)

By Donald Lambro

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

The outcome of 2006 congressional midterm elections will be decided by one final, frantic battle -- who wins the voter turnout game.

Fifteen days before voters go to the polls to decide which party will control Congress, the turnout game already is being played out in more than a half-dozen battleground Senate races and 40 to 50 closely contested House elections.

Tens of thousands of volunteer party activists have been canvassing voters, identifying supporters and preparing for a 72-hour get-out-the-vote election blitz that will be far more extensive than in any previous campaign, officials in both parties say.

Both sides are playing to their strengths. Democrats are being helped by an anti-Republican climate because of the Iraq war, and Republicans are touting their record on the economy and keeping the country safe from another terrorist attack.

At this stage of the game, turnout specialists say the Republicans might have the edge in the sheer numbers of volunteers and a more sophisticated, computerized ground operation, which held off a fierce Democratic offensive in 2004.

DOJ_NMG_0084955

"It's a great, sustaining grass-roots operation with a large degree of centralized direction, and Democrats have not done that. It's very sophisticated," said Curtis Gans, a veteran voter turnout specialist who heads American University's Center for the Study of the American Electorate.

Mr. Gans' praise for the organization built by Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Ken Mehlman is privately echoed by some in the Democratic camp.

"We're not going to match the Republicans at their ground game," a senior Democrat involved in party turnout told The Washington Times, acknowledging that Democrats this year "started too late."

That's not the case with the Republican Party's turnout operation, which has built its voter lists and volunteer ground force since 2004 and has been sending weekly voter-contact reports from the precinct level up the political chain of command. Those reports eventually reach the RNC's "turnout war room."

"Republican volunteers have contacted more than 14 million voters this year and more than 7 million since Labor Day alone," Mr. Mehlman said. "We have made 1 million voter contacts every week for the past five weeks, and for six weeks, we have surpassed the number of contacts we made at comparable times in 2004, a presidential election year."

Democratic National Committee (DNC) Chairman Howard Dean, who sent paid DNC organizers to all 50 states, has been "playing catch-up," a Democratic campaign official said. But the party's turnout efforts -- which depend more heavily on paid workers, union members and other groups -- have been more extensive in recent months.

On Oct. 10, "Democrats kicked off the final month of the election with more than 600 voter-contact activities across the country," reaching 3 million voters in its third national organizing day, the DNC said.

In Ohio, a pivotal state where Democrats were expected to make sweeping gains in the state elections, organizers made 100,000 calls to people who did not vote in the last midterm election.

But Republican officials in the battleground states say they have been working on their turnout operation much longer.

In Tennessee, for example, volunteers have "been working on our get-out-the-vote effort for over a year now with the RNC," state party executive director Chris Devaney said. "It's an unprecedented, door-to-door effort based on the operation they had in Ohio in 2004, which won the state for President Bush."

Volunteers are given target numbers of voters who need to go to the polls, based on the Republican vote totals in previous elections.

"They file regular reports on the number of doors knocked on, the Republican voters they've identified," Mr. Devaney said.

Mr. Dean remains optimistic about his party's voter turnout operation.

"We've been laying the groundwork for over a year now, and those early investments are clearly paying off as we head into the final stretch," he said.

Ohio Is A Microcosm Of What's Plaguing GOP Nationwide (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, October 23, 2006

BATAVIA, Ohio - Ohio is a microcosm of what's ailing the Republican Party.

If the state swings Democratic on Nov. 7, it could tip the balance of power in Washington, where Democrats would win control of the Senate if they gain six seats and take over the House of Representatives if they pick up 15 seats.

Ohio voters helped President Bush win in 2000 and 2004, but many say that life seems bleaker now, or that they feel betrayed by the party in power. This fall, Ohio is very much in play.

From Democratic Cleveland in the northeast to Republican Cincinnati in the southwest, Ohio communities are pained by the loss of their sons in Iraq.

Columbus, the capital, is in the center, divided politically and almost alone in doing well economically. The rest of the state is racked by economic pain as Detroit's "Big Three" automakers retrench and manufacturing jobs evaporate - another 34,000 in the past year, according to the Ohio Manufacturers Directory.

Corruption scandals are taking a toll on Republicans here, too. Voters say that Republicans at both the state and federal levels were too caught up in their own messes to serve their constituents.

DOJ_NMG_0084956

"Given what's happened here, I'll probably go Democrat," said Darrell Fowler, 48. Previously he voted for Bush and Republicans. He works at the soon-to-be-closed Ford transmission plant in Batavia, east of Cincinnati.

Among the plant's remaining 1,400 employees is Fowler's fiancee, Melissa Blankenship, 39, a Democrat who said she's very motivated to vote this year. The couple, both of whom have children, said they could be out of work by year's end.

In Cleveland, Paul Schroeder put his consulting business on hold to become a national activist for a troop withdrawal from Iraq after his 23-year-old son Augie was killed there in August 2005. Augie was one of 20 Marines from the same local battalion to die in a three-day span.

"I had been an independent. If there was a good Republican, I'd vote for a Republican," Schroeder said. "This year, my calculus is, who's got blood on their hands? This year, the entire Republican Party has blood on their hands."

Bob Derga, an engineering manager near Canton, whose 24-year-old son Dustin, also a Marine, was killed in Iraq last year, still supports the Republican Party and the war. He says that a Democratic takeover of Congress could make America more vulnerable to terrorism and make his son's death in vain.

And regardless of who's in power, he says, manufacturing probably will never bounce back. But Derga doesn't think his stance will prevail.

"The Democratic slate is going to win handily," Derga predicted. "There's such a strong sentiment that's anti-war, anti-Bush ... it's the herd mentality."

Less than three weeks from midterm elections, independent polls project that Democrats will win the open governor's race in Ohio, a seat Republicans have held for 16 years, and will topple incumbent Republican Sen. Mike DeWine.

While Republicans expect to win some statewide offices, they worry that Democrats could gain between three and five U.S. House seats. Republicans now hold 12 of Ohio's 18 House seats.

"There are several things going on in Ohio that transcend individual candidates," said Ohio State University political scientist Paul Beck. One of them is corruption.

Outgoing Gov. Bob Taft last year pleaded no contest to ethics charges. Rep. Bob Ney, who dropped his re-election bid, this month pleaded guilty in a bribery case involving Washington lobbyist Jack Abramoff.

A high-profile trial is now under way in Ohio for Tom Noe, a GOP fundraiser who's accused of illegally donating to Bush and stealing taxpayer money in a bungled rare-coin investment.

"Many voters are beginning to think there's a price to be paid for near-monopoly control," Beck said. "It's a blanket that's going to affect all of them. We still have three weeks, but right now the Democrats clearly have a decided edge."

These factors, combined with shifting demographics and well-funded Democratic challengers, are jeopardizing GOP House seats around Columbus and Cincinnati once considered safe.

The Republican seats thought to be most vulnerable - based on polling, fundraising, spending on negative advertising, and handicaps by independent analysts - are held by Reps. Deborah Pryce in Columbus and Steve Chabot in Cincinnati, as well as the district being vacated by Ney.

To a lesser degree, two other GOP seats also are considered in trouble: those held by freshman Rep. Jean Schmidt in and east of Cincinnati, and by Rep. Pat Tiberi in the Columbus area.

The nation's seventh-largest state doesn't track its roughly 8 million voters by party affiliation in general elections, the secretary of state's office said. But a University of Cincinnati Ohio Poll released early this month found that by 51 percent to 29 percent, voters think Democrats would do better than Republicans at job creation.

Ohio Republicans are counting on voters such as Peter Wagner, 37, a financial manager for the FBI. He thinks that America has done what it can in Iraq and he'd like to see the troops come home, but he still thinks that Republicans will do better for his state and his country.

Republicans also could get a last-minute boost from voters who worry that even if Democrats are saying the right things, they doubt they can do much better.

Rhonda Kokal, 43, a receptionist, said that her son, 22, is preparing to enlist in the military because he hasn't been able to find a job in two years. She wants the war to end. But she said: "It's not going to be, Democrats are in charge, everybody go home now."

DOJ_NMG_0084957

Bill Combs, a 43-year-old electrical technician and divorced father from Batavia, voted Republican for a decade and twice backed Bush. He said that he figured the GOP's commitment to keeping corporate America healthy would translate to job security at the paper company where he worked.

But Combs was laid off late last year when his company downsized at home and looked overseas. His new job at a plastics plant came with a $6-an-hour pay cut, no pension and a shaky future. He drives a Ford pickup, expensive to fuel, because he wanted to buy American, but the Ford plant is closing anyway, and Combs worries that that will hurt the local tax base, public schools and the housing market.

He plans to vote for Democrats this year. And once his daughter is grown, he plans to leave Ohio.

"I'm not gaining anything in this world," he said, filling his truck with gas. "I don't have a good outlook for ever doing anything but surviving."

Here's a thumbnail sketch of where several key races stand in Ohio less than three weeks before Election Day:

GOVERNOR - An Ohio Poll released by the University of Cincinnati found Democrat Ted Strickland, a white congressman and a minister, leading Republican Ken Blackwell, Ohio's secretary of state and a conservative African-American, 52 percent to 38 percent.

SENATE - The Ohio Poll found Republican incumbent Mike DeWine trailing his Democratic challenger, Rep. Sherrod Brown, 52 percent to 45 percent.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES - The first three GOP House races listed below are considered the most vulnerable to Democratic takeover, while analysts consider the last two, which ordinarily wouldn't be in play, somewhat vulnerable.

-Rep. Deborah Pryce's district in Columbus. A member of the House leadership, Pryce touted her friendship with Rep. Mark Foley of Florida just before Foley was forced to resign in a sex scandal involving former congressional pages. Her opponent, Mary Jo Kilroy, is county commissioner whom voters know and who has financial backing from national Democrats.

-Rep. Steve Chabot's district, from Cincinnati to the Indiana border. Chabot faces a challenge from a locally known and well-funded Democrat, city councilman John Cranley.

-Outgoing Rep. Bob Ney's eastern rural district. The GOP's choice for a successor, Joy Padgett, a state senator, is thought to have an edge over Democrat Zack Space, but Ney's guilty plea this month in a federal corruption case could work against Padgett in the final weeks.

-Rep. Jean Schmidt's district in and east of Cincinnati. Schmidt beat Democratic war veteran Paul Hackett last year in a special election to replace GOP Rep. Rob Portman, now Bush's budget director. She was booed for calling war veteran Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a coward last year in a House floor debate on Iraq troop withdrawal, and Murtha is now campaigning for her opponent, Victoria Wulsin.

-Rep. Pat Tiberi's Columbus area district. He faces a well-funded challenge from a former Democratic congressman, Bob Shamansky.

The Dems' Agenda (USNEWS)

By Danielle Knight

U.S. News and World Report, October 23, 2006

They are among the warhorses of the House of Representatives. John Dingell of Michigan has been in Congress for half a century and chaired the Energy and Commerce Committee for 14 years. Henry Waxman of California has been in the House for 32 years and ran a key subcommittee for 16 years. Charles Rangel has been Harlem's congressman since 1970; John Conyers has represented Detroit since 1965.

For a dozen years, these once powerful Democrats have been in virtual exile, pushed to the back bench while Republicans ruled. But now that may change. Experts say Democrats could pick up as many as 25 seats in November and take control of the House of Representatives.

If Democrats do take over, these veterans will most likely be back to shake things up by chairing powerful committees. Their ability to push through major legislation will be limited because their majority will probably be slim, and President Bush could wield the veto pen. But many Democrats intend to push an aggressive oversight agenda that would investigate the Bush administration's conduct on everything from the war in Iraq to Hurricane Katrina and homeland security. There would be no shortage of fireworks on Capitol Hill.

Republicans have been trying to rally their base by warning that House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, who would most likely become speaker of the House, is too liberal. They issue the same warning about possible Democratic committee chairs like Rangel, Conyers, and Barney Frank. Some doubt the tactic will work; Democratic lobbyist Thomas Hale Boggs Jr., for one, wonders if "anybody outside of Washington knows who Rangel and Conyers are." But Republicans are pressing ahead. If Democrats take the House, they say, expect a leftist agenda of more spending, higher taxes, and maybe even an attempt at impeaching President Bush. "It's just plain scary," insists House Majority Whip Roy Blunt, a Missouri Republican.

Fissures. While Democrats have lofty ambitions-some are calling for sweeping healthcare initiatives or withdrawal from Iraq-their actual legislative plans are more modest, because a slim majority will probably force them to work across the aisle. Otherwise, "we won't be able to get anything done," says Rangel. The Democrats also have fissures of their own to worry about-like what to do about Iraq. In addition, a bloc of some 37 fiscally conservative Democrats-known as the Blue Dog Coalition-could see its membership increase after the elections as a counterweight to more-liberal Democrats' efforts on spending and trade.

But Pelosi and Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid are already trying to promote a vision of party unity. They say they will launch their consensus-based, six-part "New Direction for America" or "Six for '06" plan within days if they take control of the House in early January. The highlights include legislation initiatives that would increase the minimum wage, negotiate lower prices for Medicare prescription drugs, implement all the 9/11 commission recommendations, end tax breaks for oil companies, and increase federal funding for human embryonic stem cell research. "The hardest part, frankly, is limiting the priorities," says Pelosi, who would be the first female speaker.

Posted October 23, 2006 - http://www.csmonitor.com/2006/1023/p25s01-usmb.html John Zogby The pollster discussed possible GOP strategies to win back voters in the upcoming election.

By David Cook

If the 2006 election were held today, pollster John Zogby says that Democrats would pick up 25-30 seats in the House of Representatives, well above the 15-seat gain they need to take control. And the CEO of Zogby International says Democrats are "within striking distance" of picking up the six seats they need to win control of the Senate.

But at a Monitor-sponsored breakfast on Friday, Zogby cautioned that the election was still a little more than two weeks away and that the political dynamics could change in that time.

Zogby argues that Republicans could, at least theoretically, rebound and hold the House and the Senate. He says the combination of the House page scandal and revelations in Bob Woodward's latest book were, "a tipping point and it took the president who had been making gains and the party which had been making gains off message, way off message, and focused the problems on the Republican leadership."

He sees two messages that might work in winning back voters to the GOP. "If the Republicans can get it back on message, it will be about terrorism, it won't be about taxes," Zogby said. Another winning message, especially with the Republican base, "is that they will have to go after the Democratic leadership and say do you really want Harry Reid and Nancy Pelosi?" he says.

Zogby describes Senate Minority leader Reid and House Minority Leader Pelosi as "two very nice, very lovely people...who do not have a compelling national persona and are anathema to Republicans. That could be a winning message."

In Zogby's view, Minority Leader Pelosi, who represents San Francisco, is an especially appealing target for Republicans seeking to energize their political base. "She is a liberal and much more liberal than Hillary [Clinton] including on the war .... She is a lovely person and persona, [but] that doesn't project. There is a harshness that projects over the media that almost plays into the creation of Nancy Pelosi as a pariah...She is kind of the pariah from central casting."

DOJ_NMG_0084959

Polling by his Utica, New York-based firm finds voters confused about "What do you get when you elect a Democrat," Zogby says. "For the longest time, I wasn't seeing any significant shift towards Democrats at all until I polled during and after the Foley-Woodward weekend and then the shift became more a drop in support for Republicans than really a burst toward the Democrats."

Referring to the 1994 movie starring Tom Hanks, Zogby said that, "If the Democrats win, it will be a Forrest Gump victory - essentially things swirled around them over which they had very little control and they ended up scoring touchdowns, designing happy signs, and making money on shrimp."

In the 2006 elections, one of the Democratic Party's core constituencies, organized labor, does not appear to be playing a major role, Zogby said. "The term [organized labor] is becoming oxymoronic...Does that mean that organized labor has no impact? No, not at all. But the impact becomes smaller and smaller." Zogby said his polling shows for voters the key economic issues "are not

The Battlefield Widens For House GOP Seats (LAT)

By Ronald Brownstein, Molly Hennessy-fiske And Jenny Jarvie

The Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2006

LA CRESCENT, MINN. — The temperature is dropping, but six-term Rep. Gil Gutknecht (R-Minn.) is sweating more than usual for this time of year.

In his last two campaigns, Gutknecht breezed to reelection with at least 60% of the vote. But when he stopped at an American Legion hall in this small southern Minnesota town Friday, he faced several tough issues, including the House page scandal, North Korea, Iran and the war in Iraq.

"The body count in October [in Iraq] is so high — how do you feel about an exit strategy?" asked Shan Gruden, a retired teacher who supported Gutknecht in the past but remains undecided today.

Gruden's challenge to Gutknecht captures the dynamic that is widening the battlefield during the final weeks of the contest for control of the House of Representatives.

A growing number of GOP incumbents in seats once considered "safe" — including Melissa A. Hart in Pennsylvania, Ron Lewis in Kentucky, Richard W. Pombo in Tracy, Calif., and Gutknecht here — are struggling this month against a powerful current of discontent with the nation's direction, the performance of Congress and President Bush, and the war in Iraq.

Republican seats at risk have nearly tripled since January, according to the nonpartisan Cook Political Report. Then, 18 GOP seats were endangered; now, 48 are considered in play.

"The battleground is way broader than anyone thought was possible," said Eli Pariser, executive director of the political action committee associated with the liberal group MoveOn.org.

To take back the House, which they lost in 1994, Democrats need a net gain of 15 seats — something they could do, perhaps, without capturing any of these newly competitive seats. But Democratic strategists believe that if the party can break into this second tier of Republican-leaning districts, they could greatly increase their odds of building a majority large enough to survive for longer than two years.

In a measure of the party's growing optimism, the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee plans to announce Tuesday that it will begin airing advertisements in 11 new districts, including eight the party had not considered competitive until recently, party sources say.

Though both sides agree that many of these districts are growing more competitive, in most cases Democrats still face an uphill climb to reach 50%.

"It's one thing to be close," said Scott Lasley, a political scientist at Western Kentucky University, who is tracking the contest between Lewis and Democrat Mike Weaver. "It's another to defeat an incumbent."

At various points this year, for instance, Democrats have been optimistic about upsetting GOP Rep. Marilyn N. Musgrave, whose eastern Colorado district Bush carried with nearly 60% of the vote in both 2000 and 2004.

Her Democratic opponent, state Rep. Angie Paccione, has pressed a spirited challenge, but Musgrave appears to have reestablished an advantage in polls after an advertising barrage from the national GOP that painted Paccione as an "out-of-touch

… liberal." Paccione says the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee has shifted to other races the money it had planned to spend on TV ads on her behalf.

Republican operatives cite that sort of triage as evidence that Democrats lack enough funds to capture many of the GOP-leaning seats that now appear vulnerable.

"In order for them to make any of these races potentially come true, they have to spend money there, and it's unclear how much money they have left or how much in debt they are willing to go," said Carl Forti, communications director for the National Republican Congressional Committee.

Still, in elections characterized by a strong desire for change, such as 1974 and 1994, the current of discontent was powerful enough to sweep in even underfunded challengers. And whatever happens Nov. 7, it is already clear that Democrats have generated intense pressure on many Republicans who have not needed to run full-scale campaigns for years — and did not expect to do so now.

Gutknecht appears to have legitimate competition," said Caledonia Township Chairman Kermit McRae, whose Minnesota town was one of Gutknecht's stops Friday. "Some years you get token competition, but this year the person is campaigning hard — and what I see is the congressman is campaigning hard back."

The race between Lewis and Weaver in Kentucky's 2nd District, which rolls through rural areas southwest of Louisville, is also more heated than usual. In May 1994, Lewis, a Baptist minister, won the seat in a special election that foreshadowed the GOP landslide six months later.

Since 1994, he has never won less than 58% of the vote. Two years ago, Bush won the district with nearly two-thirds of the vote.

But this year, for the first time in a decade, Lewis is concerned enough that he is airing television ads, and local Republicans are uneasy.

"We're going to lose seats, a sure thing," said Clifford Owen, a Republican farmer from Larue County who said he would continue to vote for Lewis.

Weaver, a 67-year-old Vietnam veteran and state legislator, pounds at the disillusionment in this socially conservative district over the page scandal involving former GOP Rep. Mark Foley.

"It's time for voters to do their duty," he said. "The Republican Party claimed they were the party of faith, family values and moral values. Now they have been exposed. It is time for the Democrats to reclaim these values."

Weaver opposes abortion and supports a constitutional amendment to ban same-sex marriage, and he distances himself from the national Democratic Party almost as aggressively as he criticizes his GOP opponent.

But Lewis is working hard to tie him to liberal Democrats like House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi of San Francisco. "People here certainly don't want Nancy Pelosi as speaker of the House," Lewis said.

Though Gutknecht's southeastern Minnesota district isn't as reliably Republican as the Kentucky seat, he's also betting on an ideological contrast in his struggle against Democrat Tim Walz, a high school teacher, football coach and 24-year veteran of the Army National Guard. Last week the National Republican Congressional Committee spent about $100,000 on ads accusing Walz of weakness on illegal immigration.

"There are big differences between the two of us," Gutknecht said. "If that message gets out, then I win this election 55 to 45 [percent] at least."

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee fired back Friday with an ad criticizing Gutknecht for voting against increases in the minimum wage while accepting pay raises, a common argument in Democratic campaigns this year.

But Iraq looms as the greatest risk to the incumbent.

In a new ad scheduled to air Tuesday, Walz stands before empty bleachers and says: "When I coached football, these stands held about 3,000 people. That's a lot. It's also the number of American soldiers who have died fighting in Iraq."

His former students now in the military, he says, "deserve a plan for Iraq to govern itself so they can come home."

Gutknecht, who traveled to Iraq in the summer, said he initially endorsed the war based on imperfect information but believed now that the U.S. must continue the fight.

DOJ_NMG_0084961

"Let's be honest — a lot of people, both Republican and Democrat, voted to go in there," he said. "It may not have been involved with terrorism then, but it is now. It's like a light that's attracting all these bugs and moths."

Gutknecht's accessibility and candor impressed Gruden, the retired teacher, who came to question him at the American Legion hall here. "He seems approachable," she said.

But even after his answer, she said, she is still worried about the war and "all the graft, greed and corruption in Washington." She left for home the same way she had arrived — uncertain who would win her support.

2 Lawmakers With Abramoff Ties In Tight Races (USAT)

By Martin Kasindorf

USA Today, October 23, 2006

TRACY, Calif. — Rep. Richard Pombo's record as chairman of the House Resources Committee has environmental groups so riled that they're spending more than $1 million to beat the seven-term Republican on Nov. 7.

In a normally ironclad GOP district that Pombo won with a 61% majority two years ago, polls show that the environmentalists' TV spots and doorbell-ringing are helping to make him a candidate for the politically endangered list.

The Sierra Club calls Pombo, a Stetson-wearing cattle rancher, an "eco-thug." The League of Conservation Voters says he advances a "radical, anti-conservation agenda." The Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund voted him "wildlife villain of the year." Rolling Stone magazine dubs him "enemy of the earth."

Pombo, 45, entered politics to stop a nature trail from running through his 500-acre spread in Tracy, a San Joaquin Valley agricultural town that's turning into an affordable bedroom community for San Francisco Bay Area commuters. In Congress, Pombo has tried repeatedly to rewrite the Endangered Species Act to make it friendlier to landowners. He has proposed selling 15 national parks.

Brian Kennedy, a spokesman for Pombo, says the environmental groups "need a boogeyman to sell their message and raise money," and that Pombo disagrees with "the very left-leaning … organizations on the best approaches to protecting our environment."

Polls show races tightening for Pombo and Republican Rep. John Doolittle, worrying GOP leaders enough that President Bush flew out this month to raise $400,000 for Pombo and $600,000 for Doolittle in their districts.

As secretary of the House Republican Conference, Doolittle, 55, is the sixth-ranking House GOP leader. He and Pombo were protégés of Tom DeLay of Texas, the former House majority leader who was indicted last year on charges of violating state campaign-finance laws.

Two Democrat-commissioned polls show Pombo in a dead heat with Democrat Jerry McNerney, 55, a wind turbine engineer. An independent poll published Oct. 12 by Seattle-based Constituent Dynamics, a non-partisan group, shows Doolittle leading Democrat Charlie Brown 52%-44%. The poll of 1,000 likely voters has a margin of error of +/-3 percentage points. Brown, 57, is a retired Air Force lieutenant colonel.

After commissioning three private polls it won't release, the National Republican Congressional Committee has spent $625,000 on Pombo. "When a cadre of radical environmental groups is spending millions of dollars on vicious, negative advertising, the Republican Party had to level the playing field," says Jonathan Collegio, NRCC spokesman.

The group also spent $114,000 on Doolittle. "The national atmosphere for Republicans is not as good as it was two years ago," says Richard Robinson, Doolittle's campaign manager.

Pombo's district includes the upscale San Ramon Valley suburbs of San Francisco, including Dublin and Danville. There, "culturally moderate, suburban GOP women don't identify with ranchers as much as in the San Joaquin Valley," says Allen Hoffenblum, publisher of the California Target Book guide to congressional and Legislature races.

Both Republicans are under attack for links to GOP lobbyist Jack Abramoff, who has been convicted of conspiracy and fraud. Though national environmental organizations are angry at Pombo over his stands on conservation, they're zeroing in on Pombo's ties to Abramoff and on the campaign contributions to Pombo from oil and mining companies. "Our polls found his constituents of all parties thought he was way too close to the special interests," says Roger Schlickeisen, president of the Defenders of Wildlife Action Fund.

In Doolittle's race for a ninth term — his district stretches from Sacramento's northeastern suburbs to the Nevada and Oregon borders — Abramoff and an alleged "Republican culture of corruption" have become key lines of attack by Brown. Doolittle is hitting back with ads stressing the Democrat's membership in the American Civil Liberties Union and alleging softness on illegal immigration.

Pombo's campaign committees received $54,500 from Abramoff, his associates and his Indian tribal clients from 1999-2005, according to the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics, a non-partisan group. Abramoff's billing records, released by Senate Democratic staffers, show he billed the Northern Marianas Islands government for lobbying Pombo.

Doolittle, over five years, has accepted $140,000 from Abramoff, associates and clients, according to Federal Election Commission records. Grand-jury-subpoenaed records show that Abramoff's law firm paid Doolittle's wife, Julie, $66,700 for working for a personal charity of Abramoff's. A Senate committee concluded she was blameless in any bribery scheme because she didn't know the money came from a California Indian tribe.

Pombo has given Abramoff's personal $7,500 campaign contributions to charity. Doolittle has kept Abramoff's $14,000 in personal checks, along with $118,000 he received from California defense contractor Brent Wilkes and associates. Wilkes is under investigation in the bribery case of Rep. Randy (Duke) Cunningham, who pleaded guilty in November.

Interviews with voters show most intend to follow party lines, and that Republicans are reluctant to jettison the longtime incumbents because of Abramoff.

"I don't like what I hear (Doolittle) saying," says Steve Abeln, 42, a security-business owner in Rocklin, and a Republican. "But the fact is he's a Republican. I want to keep a majority in Congress."

October's Phony Surprise (WP)

By Robert D. Novak

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

The latest in a series of October surprises leading up to the midterm elections targeted Ken Mehlman, chairman of the Republican National Committee. It depicted Mehlman as bowing to the wishes of disgraced lobbyist Jack Abramoff, the symbol of GOP corruption, in firing an innocent bureaucrat. The problem with the story is that this bureaucrat was a notorious political operative inside the Clinton administration.

At issue was the dismissal early in 2001, the first year of the Bush administration, of Allen Stayman from a State Department post. The accounts alleged that he was sacked because he advocated improved labor conditions in the U.S.-owned Northern Marianas in the Western Pacific, whose government was represented by Abramoff. Nowhere was it mentioned that Stayman left a long paper trail of partisan Democratic activity and hardly could be expected to survive in a Republican administration.

The attack on Mehlman typified the standard October surprise: information about an event years in the past distributed by a partisan operative as a campaign nears its close. The most successful recent example came in 2000, when Al Gore's campaign waited until the last week before the presidential election to release never-before-published information about a drunken driving conviction of young George W. Bush 24 years earlier. That throttled Bush's momentum and very nearly elected Gore.

October surprises have abounded this year. The revelation of Rep. Mark Foley's past improper advances to former congressional pages dominated the news for two weeks and stifled what had seemed to be a Republican upsurge. The subsequent disclosure of questionable land transactions and use of campaign funds by Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid did not get nearly as much attention.

The reports about Reid did not begin to counter the Democratic national campaign theme of a climate of corruption under Republican rule in Washington. The Mehlman story, first reported in the Los Angeles Times Oct. 15, fits the image of Abramoff running rampant in the White House and winning governmental action for his clients with favors for presidential aides.

The not-so-hidden hand promoting this story is the fiercely partisan Rep. Henry Waxman, ranking Democrat on the House Government Reform Committee. Waxman had talked committee Chairman Tom Davis (R-Va.) into a pre-election release showing more than 400 contacts at the White House by Abramoff. E-mails by the Abramoff lobbying operation claimed credit for getting Mehlman, then White House political director, to sack Stayman. Waxman suggested that Mehlman has "violated fundamental ethics regulations and the law."

The response by Mehlman that he does not remember getting rid of Stayman sounds, on its face, like a politician's typically bad memory. But that Mehlman really had no recollection of the case rings true because he did not immediately cite Stayman's political track record.

The reappearance of Stayman's name after a five-year absence rang alarm bells for Republican majority staffers on the House Natural Resources Committee, who battled Stayman when he ran the Interior Department's Office of Insular Affairs. Documents in the committee indicate Stayman's office was engaged in legally questionable political action against several Republican House members -- including the then-majority leader and majority whip, Dick Armey and Tom DeLay.

Supposedly isolated from all political affairs, Stayman's staff in 1997 asked the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee how to contact opponents of Armey, DeLay and Rep. Dana Rohrabacher. Stayman wrote a Democratic National Committee draft press release that year (never consummated) attacking the then-governor of the Marianas.

Earl Devaney, the Interior Department's inspector general, testified to Congress in 2001 that the behavior of Stayman's office was the "most egregious" he had seen in 30 years because of its political activity. Republican Rep. Don Young, then Natural Resources chairman, said Stayman "failed to end a wide range of prohibited political activities" in his office and "may have engaged in them himself."

In the two years before he was fired as a civil servant, Stayman donated $1,400 to the Democratic National Committee and $500 to the Gore campaign. Not surprisingly, Stayman later went to Capitol Hill as a House Democratic staffer. Here is a hardened political infighter, not a hapless bureaucrat. In October surprises, the truth sometimes is the victim.

The Path To Power (NSWK)

By Jonathan Darman

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

The sun is just rising over Chattanooga when Harold Ford Jr. begins to pray. A young African-American congressman from Memphis, Ford is running as the Democratic candidate for Senate in Tennessee. Here, in the shadow of Lookout Mountain, an audience of 300 has come out of the early-morning darkness into the historic Read House hotel to hear Ford praise the Lord and lecture man. Dressed in dark suits and hats fit for a Sunday service, they bow their heads and thank a God who "even now has dipped us in fresh, anointing oil." They shout Hallelujah as a soprano sings "Amazing Grace." And they cheer and clap when Ford welcomes them, and the spirit of Jesus, into the room. "I love Jesus, I can't help it," the congressman tells the crowd. "We serve such a big God," he shouts, and a chorus of Amens agrees.

It is a storied place to pray. "Let freedom ring from Lookout Mountain in Tennessee," Martin Luther King Jr. cried in his "I Have a Dream" speech, and four decades later, the diverse crowd that has gathered here suggests that in many ways, freedom has. Looking out at his audience, Ford offers political pronouncements in the cadence of Scripture. "The politics of destruction," he shouts, "the politics of those who define and malign people, that's all coming to an end." He asks the audience to "heal and make whole this great country of ours" with "a renewed sense of faith." Pointing to the sky, he tells them that "as long as your faith derives from up there, and not down there, we're going to be OK."

Ford's intertwining of the secular and the sacred would make many urban liberals squirm. So would much else that comes out of his mouth today. From the podium, he says he gets "in trouble with my party because I believe a government is only as good as its ability to defend itself and protect itself." (That stance wouldn't actually trouble most Democrats, but the implication that Democrats are weak on defense might.) Later, as he makes his way out of the room, he spots a Fox News Channel correspondent who's flown in from out of town. "Mr. Cameron!" he yells, throwing his arms around Carl Cameron, the network's political correspondent. "So good to see you again." Before the day is done, Ford will reiterate his opposition to same-sex marriage and late-term abortions.

Ford, 36, believes these conservative stands, coupled with an unrelenting attack on his Republican foe's positions on Iraq, homeland security and immigration, is the only way a Democrat can win in today's conservative Tennessee. "If I was doing the textbook thing that Democrats do," he tells NEWSWEEK, "I'd say, 'Republicans want to short Social Security, they want to rob poor children of their college education, they want to deny families the education system.' Don't get me wrong, there's some truth to that. But that's not me. Just let me be myself."

Democrats, even liberal ones, will let Ford be whoever he wants to be, for one simple reason: he may deliver them the Senate. Two weeks before the midterm elections, the Democrats' fate lies not in the hands of the party's much-dissected antiwar left but with a handful of careful, calculating centrists like Ford. Just a few months ago, Republicans were heralding Ned Lamont's defeat of Sen. Joseph Lieberman in Connecticut's senatorial primary as the end of the Democratic Party, its surrender to the angry extreme. But spend a few minutes with Sen. Charles Schumer, the strategic mastermind behind the Democrats' effort to win back the Senate, and Lamont's name barely comes up. (For the record: Lamont is trailing Lieberman, who is running as an independent, by as much as 17 points in the latest polls.) Instead, Schumer is talking up the "common sense" candidates running in states like Tennessee, Missouri and Virginia—candidates who don't sound much like Democrats even when they're assaulting Republican opponents over the war.

For two years the Democratic political establishment has been unabashedly applying one litmus test to candidates: their ability to win. In the Senate, Schumer took flak from activist groups when he backed candidates like Pennsylvania's Bob Casey, who is anti abortion rights. In the House, Demo-cratic Congressional Campaign Committee chair Rahm Emanuel corralled a group of Iraq and Afghanistan vets to run as "macho Democrats" against Republican incumbents. At Howard Dean's Democratic National Committee—well, who's even heard anything from Howard Dean? He's largely taken a back seat to Bill Clinton and Barack Obama in making the Democrats' prime-time case. "The days of Democrats' having to check 28 boxes before they run are over," Schumer says. "We want to win."

Just two years after George W. Bush defeated John Kerry, and four years after Bush defied expectations to prevail in the 2002 midterms, Democratic control of Congress may be within reach. For weeks, leaders of both parties have said Democrats would likely take the House of Representatives, but now the six seats the Democrats need to wrest control of the Senate may well be winnable. Republican strategists are privately bracing themselves for the loss of Senate seats in Rhode Island, Montana, Pennsylvania and Ohio. The GOP is hopeful that a cloud of corruption charges surrounding New Jersey's incumbent Democratic Sen. Bob Menendez could give Republicans a rare shot at picking up a Democratic seat, but Menendez's Republican challenger, Thomas Kean Jr., is struggling to separate himself from Bush and Iraq. The remaining Senate battles lie in border states like Tennessee, where Ford and the GOP nominee, businessman and former Chattanooga mayor Bob Corker, are polling neck and neck. Republicans know the race is a must-win to retain control of the Senate.

Ford's strength in the race springs in part from being that rare Democrat who is unencumbered by complexity and contradiction—with his party and with himself. As he journeyed to rural and conservative parts of his home state in the past year, he referred to "my friend President Bush"—and then proceeded to assail Bush's policy in Iraq. In a recent debate with Corker, Ford said his opponent's shifting stances on the war made him sound "a little like John Kerry"—forgetting momentarily, it seemed, that Ford himself had been one of Kerry's earliest supporters and served as national co-chair of his campaign. But it's one thing to campaign as a rebel willing to flout your party's orthodoxy when it helps attract voters. It's another thing to try to govern that way. If the Democrats take back the Senate in November, they will be hard pressed to maintain the sort of martial discipline they've managed during the campaign; they are, after all, the Democrats, a party with a rich history of disarray.

Ford himself has been running for the history books all his life. As a 4-year-old, he stood on a table to reach a microphone and record a radio ad for his congressman father; in law school his friends called him "Senator." He succeeded his dad in the House at the age of 26. A scion of one of black America's great political dynasties, Ford enjoyed universal name recognition and inherited a list of a thousand contacts when he ran his first campaign. But family is a two-edged sword: the Republicans are making much of the Ford clan's legal woes. (Ford's uncle is awaiting trial on extortion charges and his aunt was ejected from the state Senate after allegations of vote fraud.) Running attack ad after attack ad on "The Ford Family Political Machine," Corker and the Republicans have hinted that Sen. Harold Ford Jr. would engage in similar shenanigans.

But Ford, like so many political sons, is shaped as much by differences with his family as by his similarities. Coming of age in establishment Washington and the Republican South, he learned moderation as a matter of survival, and it carried him away from the fractured racial politics of his family's past. The story of his journey to the political center sheds light on why control of the Senate and the shape of the final years of Bush's presidency may rest on a thousand or so votes tucked in the lush planes and hills between the mud of the Mississippi and the rise of the Great Smoky Ridge.

Ford's political opponents have long called him "Junior," but in Memphis, he's always just been "Baby Harold." His grandfather rose to financial prominence as a funeral director but wanted his children and grandchildren to make their names in the world of politics—and do it fast. Ford's father, Harold Sr., was elected to Congress at the age of 29. Running against a white Republican incumbent, he won by only 400 votes. "It wasn't a Voting Rights district," Ford Sr. recalls. "I had to fight for every vote." With his father in Congress and an uncle, John, in the state Senate, Ford Jr. grew up in the family to see in west Tennessee. Democratic candidates for president, governor, senator and on down the list showed up for Sunday-night supper at their house. Baby Harold sat at the children's table, but he knew the path that had been chosen for him. "Harold's grandfather was an extremely powerful man," says Melvin Charles Smith, the Ford family pastor, "and his father is a very powerful man. So when you talk about a childhood or teenage rebellion, they wouldn't have tolerated anything like that."

Ford's father had 11 brothers and sisters, and young Harold had dozens of first cousins. Attention was hard to find in this environment; trouble was not. Ford's mother, Dorothy, was the enforcer, the one who made sure Harold did his homework, went to church, called his elders Sir and Ma'am. A family friend once encouraged Ford to drop the formalities. "You can call me what you want, son," the older gentleman said. "Yeah, baby, call him what you want to call him," Dorothy agreed, in a pleasant, encouraging tone. "If I dared say his name," Ford recalls, "as soon as the word was out of my mouth she would have come down on me."

After one term in congress, Harold Sr. moved his wife and kids to Washington, and young Harold caught a glimpse of life beyond the clan. Corker has attacked Ford as a creature more of Washington than of Tennessee, and while Ford is quick to note that as a child he was shipped home to Memphis "the day after school got out," he has not lived in Memphis full time since he was a small child. Growing up in Washington, Ford learned early lessons in bipartisanship as he vied for social position with the children of Republicans and Democrats alike. As just another congressman's kid in the capital, his place in the social pecking order would be earned rather than inherited. "It was the best thing they did for us," Ford recalls. "Had we grown up fully in Memphis, everything I did, everywhere I went, I would have been 'Harold Ford's son' ... I love my dad, but I needed to do things for myself, too."

In Washington, Ford attended the exclusive St. Albans school. Nestled beside the National Cathedral atop the city's highest hill, the Episcopal academy looks down on Washington—and on the secular world. Governed by the Anglican instinct to avoid extremes in search of a middle way, St. Albans educated the sons of the elite regardless of party—from Al Gore to two of George W. Bush's brothers. Harold entered in the mid-'80s, and his interests were eclectic, nonideological. "George Will was someone who really impressed him," Ford's father recalls. "His son went to St. Albans."

But as one of only a handful of black students, Ford wasn't just like everybody else at St. Albans. "For me, and for the other kids who were not white, it was a very heterogeneous place," Ford says. "I had to get along with everybody. That helped me later on when I was in situations where you had to say, 'Hey, let's all get together and try to figure this out'."

Life was more turbulent outside the congenial confines of St. Albans. Ford entered the University of Pennsylvania in 1988. It was a time of racial polarization, even at elite colleges. When things grew particularly sensitive after the beating of Rodney King in May 1991, Ford, who'd grown up around more white people than many black students on campus did, felt uniquely qualified to help sort things out. "Sheldon Hackney was the president of Penn at the time," Ford recalls. "He asked me to try to help bring everybody together. I had no problem saying, 'Hey, there's more common ground than difference here'." (Ford, says Hackney, "was unusually sophisticated and self-possessed about campus politics.")

While Ford was playing peacemaker at Penn, his family was coming under attack back home. In 1987, Harold Sr. was indicted, charged with taking nearly $1.5 million in political payoffs disguised as bank loans. He was eventually cleared, but to many in Tennessee, the case suggested there might be a corrupt underside to the Ford family. Most vivid was Harold's uncle John, the state senator, known for his larger-than-life persona in Memphis and for driving at high speeds along Highway 41 between Memphis and Nashville, the state capital.

The fraud charges drained Harold Sr.; by the early '90s, he was looking to pass things along to the next generation. His son, who'd worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign and was attracted to Clinton's centrist politics, wanted to defer law school and take a job in the White House. His father persuaded him to get his degree and plan on running for the Memphis congressional seat shortly thereafter.

Over dinner in his second year in law school, Junior learned his time had come. "I'm not running again," Harold Sr. told his son. "If you want to run, you need to get very serious about it."

Back in Memphis, news of Harold Jr.'s ascension was greeted as evidence of Ford-family arrogance. With a year left in law school, Ford Jr. didn't even have his own place in Memphis and had to commute to his parents' home on weekends to campaign. As the weeks wore on, however, Ford began to distinguish himself from the rest of the family. James Jalenak, an influential Memphis lawyer who helped manage Ford's congressional campaign, recalls preparing 30 rules for debate prep for young Ford. Well acquainted with Harold Sr., Jalenak's list had "Don't lose your temper" as every third rule. "But it wasn't necessary," he says. "Harold was calmer, smarter, more disciplined than anyone else I'd ever met in his family ... A lot of white people who loathed his family here really came to love him." Ford won the seat in November 1996.

Young, attractive and single, Ford was a sensation the moment he arrived on Capitol Hill. Newspapers in Washington and Memphis marveled over his sharp suits and breathlessly wondered about his dating life, even tracking his brief involvement with a Georgetown University student who wrote a sex column for her college newspaper. A relentless flirt, Ford is the perennial crush of young Hill staffers. Unmarried (though he says he hopes for marriage and children soon), he is known both for his active dating life and for respecting the large number of women he brings into his inner circle as colleagues. He became a fixture on cable talk shows and became a regular on the Fox News Channel and on Don Imus's radio program. After giving the keynote address at the 2000 Democratic National Convention, he'd become one of the most recognizable faces in the party.

In Washington, Ford was eager to prove his conservative bona fides. In his new job, he sought out the conservative Southern Blue Dog Democratic caucus and became one of only three African-American members. In his 10 years in Congress, he voted for the federal marriage amendment banning gay marriage, for the Patriot Act and for the war in Iraq. He named Ronald Reagan as one of his historical heroes. Ann Coulter called him "one of my favorite Democrats." Andrew Parmentier, a Republican consultant with the brokerage firm Friedman, Billings, Ramsey, and a former aide to Rep. Dick Armey, befriended Ford after repeatedly running into him in the Green Room at CNBC. "I wasn't quite prepared for how conservative he was on some of the social issues," Parmentier says. "I knew he was a business conservative, but it all [comes down to] the cultural issues. His faith is the No. 1 most important thing for him."

Though no one could ever mistake Ford for Ted Kennedy, he isn't always the off-the-reservation Democrat he makes himself out to be. According to Congressional Quarterly, Ford supported his party upwards of 85 percent of the time in most years since Bush took office. And while Ford is popular among his Democratic colleagues, he is not regarded as ranking among the most skilled bridge-builders in the House.

After all, it has always been clear to anyone who has spent five minutes with him that Ford's ambitions extended beyond just representing Memphis in the House. In November 2002, he launched a last-minute challenge to Nancy Pelosi to become the House Democratic leader.

It was a moment of great anxiety for the Democrats: the party had just felt the full brunt of Bush's post-9/11 power in bruising defeats in the 2002 midterm elections, failing once again to regain the majority it had lost in 1994. Ford argued that Pelosi, one of the party's most visible liberals, was the wrong public face if Democrats wanted to change their ways. "The party elders are 0 to 4," he told reporters, referring to the Democrats' comeback efforts from 1996 to 2002. "In the business world, that's not a good record." To many, Ford's move seemed liked a quixotic and presumptuous power grab. Pelosi had already secured commitments from a majority of her caucus. But establishing himself as a more conservative alternative to the party's leadership helped lay the groundwork for his current statewide run.

Shut out of the party leadership, Ford turned his gaze back toward home. He'd explored running for the Senate twice before. Ford thought he'd finally found his moment when Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist announced he would leave the Senate in 2006. Ford announced his candidacy for Frist's seat in May, in what seemed to many like a long shot: the home of Andrew Jackson, Estes Kefauver and the TVA was becoming solidly Republican—and no black candidate had been elected to the Senate from a Southern state since Reconstruction. Even Ford's father was worried. "My dad looked at it rationally and said, 'Do you really think this is the right thing to be doing?' " Ford recalls. "Everyone had doubts back then." But there were encouraging signs, too. In 2002, Democrat Phil Bredesen, a New Jersey-born businessman who had served as mayor of Nashville, won the state's governorship after framing himself as a cultural conservative and economic reformer.

Ford's Senate campaign did not begin well. The day after he announced, his uncle John was arrested in an FBI sting after allegedly asking for a bribe in exchange for favorable treatment for a company doing business with the state. John Ford denied any wrongdoing but was forced to resign his state Senate seat, and the scandal, known as Tennessee Waltz, gave reporters the opportunity to dredge up 30 years' worth of family lore. Further complicating matters, Ford's aunt Ophelia won a special election for John's vacated seat by only 13 votes; a special committee of the state Senate later charged her with vote fraud.

Ford sought to defuse the issue by incorporating his family into his campaign shtik. "I come from a big family—you may have read about them a few times," he'll tell audiences in white, conservative parts of the state. Earlier this month, at a campaign event in rural Grundy County, he took a question from an elderly white gentleman named John Ford. "I love your name," Ford joked, "but it's a hard name to have, I know."

Without serious opposition in the Democratic primary, Ford was freed to scour the rural reaches of his state. The encounters were sometimes awkward, but Ford seemed to thrive on them. He often tells the tale of his trip to the Little Rebel, a roadside bar with a large Confederate battle flag. Ford entered with trepidation only to be greeted with, "Baby, we've been waiting to see you."

The tale is believable only because Ford so often seeks out similarly strained exchanges. Earlier this year he traveled to Mule Day, an agricultural parade in rural Columbia, Tenn. Columbia's mostly white population seemed somewhat mystified by the energetic black congressman from Memphis. A group of motorcyclists seemed particularly put off by the candidate, but Ford approached them anyway. He smiled as he fondled a SATAN SUCKS button on one of the bikers' leather jackets. "I agree with you," Ford said. "Satan does suck."

Corker and the Republicans have slammed Ford as the "most liberal" member of Tennessee's congressional delegation. Highlighting Ford's votes against reauthorization of the Patriot Act, Corker argues that Ford wanted to weaken the nation's defenses at a time when America can ill afford it. Ford's response has been to hit back harder on Iraq, charging that Corker wanted to "stay the course" in war strategy, and then, when Corker denied this, hammered him for flip-flopping. (Ford favors dividing Iraq into three autonomous states.) Democrats in Washington say Ford has written a new template for swiftness in campaign counterattack. "If he wins, they are going to write textbooks on his campaign," says Phil Singer, spokesman for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

The race is touch-and-go for both campaigns. After shaking up his own staff earlier this fall, Corker is now both attacking Ford's voting record and trying to draw attention to the extended Ford family. One variable no one in either campaign can accurately predict is race. Analysts say that to be competitive, Ford has to earn at least 40 percent of the white vote in Tennessee in a state where segregation is a persistent, if distant, memory (16.3 percent of voters in Tennessee are black). "He's got very solid support from white Democrats but he needs white independents and even some white Republicans to win," says Merle Black, a professor of political science at Emory University. While Ford is ahead by small margins in some polls, recent history (including races in Virginia in 1989 and North Carolina in 1990) suggests that white Southerners will sometimes say they're willing to vote for a black man in a poll but act differently in the privacy of the voting booth. "There could be some of that," says Black. "It's hard to know how much."

For all the baggage, Ford may now need his family more than ever. His advisers have long expected the race to come down to a one- or two-point margin. To win, Ford will have to have unprecedented turnout in heavily black parts of the state—chiefly Memphis and its surrounding areas. As even their enemies admit, no one is better at getting out the vote in Memphis than the Fords. In the final days of the campaign, Harold Sr. is in many ways his son's closest adviser. The two talk "five times a day," according to the younger Ford."I've never met anybody with a better strategic mind about the last 90 days of a campaign than my dad," Ford says.

Praying in Chattanooga two weeks ago, Ford's thoughts drifted to the days after the campaign. He told his audience that as a senator "you're not asked to judge and condemn, you're asked to listen and start bringing together." He vowed that if politicians can "unite around a common theme and a common goal, they can accomplish great things." Democrats this fall have united around the common goal of winning, a goal that expires, no matter what, on Nov. 7. If he carries the day, Ford and his colleagues in both parties must rally together—an elusive task, but a greater thing.

The Old Dominion's New Math (USNEWS)

By Dan Gilgoff

U.S. News and World Report, October 23, 2006

MANASSAS, VA.-When Sen. George Allen arrived at the tiny airport here last week to accept the endorsement of the National Vietnam and Gulf War Veterans Coalition, the group's chairman told him he hadn't cut his ponytail since the 9/11 attacks. The chairman, John Molloy, said it was a show of defiance against Islamic terrorists, inspired by the story of an American frontiersman who grew his hair in defiance of Indian scalpers. That's precisely why the United States can't pull out of Iraq, Allen told him. "If we leave," Allen said, "they'll strike us again."

But in his speech to the assembled crowd of veterans a few minutes later, Allen-whose calls for "staying the course" in Iraq have been playing across the state in TV ads for Democratic challenger Jim Webb-struck a different tone. "It's clear that mistakes were made [in Iraq] and that progress has been far too slow," he said. "We cannot continue to do the same things and expect different results." It's the kind of criticism that vulnerable Republican Senate incumbents, and even the White House, are suddenly adopting as Iraq continues to spiral downward. "If you are embracing the 'We're not going to change anything in Iraq' strategy, you are going to lose," says a top GOP adviser to Senate candidates. "We need smart strategy rather than slogans like 'stay the course.'"

Adjustments. For some Republican senators, though, it may be too late. In the past two weeks, party strategists have privately begun to cede seats in Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Montana and to refocus resources on protecting incumbents in red states like Missouri and Tennessee, where spending from the National Republican Senatorial Committee shot from zero to $2.5 million just since the beginning of the month. While Republicans-along with some Democrats and independent analysts-are still doubtful that they will lose the six seats that would change control of the Senate, the GOP's so-called firewall of protection may now be down to as few as two or three seats. Which means that Virginia could determine Senate control.

No Senate race in the nation has tightened as dramatically as the Old Dominion's. A former Virginia governor, Allen was thought a shoo-in for re-election and was mulling a 2008 White House bid until a video of him calling a Webb volunteer of Indian descent "macaca" was posted online in August, drawing national attention. "Macaca got Webb a lot more press and saved us at least a million dollars in ads," says Webb pollster Pete Brodnitz. Allen's fumbling response to revelations about his previously unacknowledged Jewish ancestry last month-"I still had a ham sandwich for lunch, and my mother made great pork chops"-further alarmed even many GOP officials. Such gaffes helped Webb out-fundraise Allen by $1 million in the past quarter and forced the NRSC to pony up nearly $1 million in response. Allen campaign manager Dick Wadhams blames the rhetorical missteps for recent polls showing the race to be in a dead heat: "It's competitive not because of anything Webb has done."

A GOP Balancing Act (NSWK)

By Richard Wolffe

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Bob Corker needed to add some flair to his flagging campaign. The GOP candidate should have been running a simple Senate race in conservative Tennessee. But he was trailing by several points last month, so the White House and party leaders stepped in. Their solution: a new campaign manager in the form of a rumpled, martini-drinking, cigar-chewing veteran of Tennessee politics. Back in 1978, Tom Ingram helped transform a lackluster candidate for governor—Lamar Alexander—by dressing him in a folksy red plaid shirt. And it was Ingram who put Fred Thompson in a red pickup truck in his 1994 Senate race, turning the Hollywood actor and lawyer into a good ole boy.

What could Ingram change about Corker, the starchy former mayor of Chattanooga? Everything but his clothes, apparently. Speaking to a group of sheriffs last week, Corker was buttoned up in a charcoal pin-striped suit. ("We need to change that," Ingram later grumbled in a Nashville bar.) Still, Ingram has helped turn the Corker campaign around with new ads and a new message—that Corker is a self-made businessman from Tennessee, while his opponent, Harold Ford Jr., has never held a real job outside Washington politics. Ingram dropped ads attacking Ford as a liberal, replacing them with references to the Ford family machine—and by extension, the African-American politics of Memphis. "I'm the candidate of change," Corker told NEWSWEEK over a bowl of chili in a Jackson diner. "My opponent certainly hasn't shown much independence. He votes with his party 80 percent of the time."

Stuck with an unpopular president and an even less appealing party, Corker is distancing himself from the White House and the GOP-led Congress. Yet he also needs the conservative base to turn out to vote—and they are unsettled by his divided loyalties. When Corker stopped by conservative talk radio in Nashville, the questions were unusually hostile. "I know I'm not going to vote for Harold Ford," said one caller after Corker left the studio. "But it's like the lesser of two evils."

Many social conservatives have been wary of Corker since the primaries, when his rivals portrayed him as a pro-choice Democrat. (Tennessee Right to Life has not endorsed Corker because he once opposed limits on state funding for abortion.) More recently, Corker has moved to heal the rift with his primary foes. Former congressman Ed Bryant, who once campaigned as "the real conservative" against Corker, is stumping for him in rural west Tennessee. "Bob may not be as intense as I am," Bryant told NEWSWEEK, "but he's a solid conservative."

Solid may be the best Corker can do, and he's trying to make it his virtue. "I know I'm not the best-looking candidate in this race," he told the group of stony-faced sheriffs. "I know I'm not the most articulate." But he is still the most conservative, and that might just be enough.

Chief Concerns Who Heads Key Committees If Democrats Win The House? A Look At The Roles High-profile Reps. Barney Frank, Charles Rangel, David Obey And Others May Play. (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

With the midterm elections fast approaching, many polls and political strategists are predicting that the majority in the House of Representatives will switch to the Democrats. Republicans have begun appealing to their base of voters by raising the specter of a liberal takeover, starting with Rep. Nancy Pelosi of California. Pelosi, currently Democratic leader, is the first woman to lead a major party in Congress, and there's little doubt she would become the first woman speaker as well. At the same time, Republicans, in an attempt to get conservatives to vote on Election Day, warn of a raft of new, lefty committee chairmen. Those jobs are important because chairmen wield considerable clout, setting the agenda for legislation and oversight of executive branch agencies.

Here's how it could play out on some of the top House committees:

Appropriations Committee

The Appropriations Committee, responsible for funding federal programs and agencies, is currently under the chairmanship of Jerry Lewis1 of California, whose ties to lobbyists are being investigated by the U.S. Attorney's office in Los Angeles. He would likely be replaced by Rep. David Obey2 of Wisconsin, a harmonica player who chaired the commission to write the House's ethics code. Obey, who was briefly chairman of the committee once before when Democrats were in power, is an old-fashioned labor Democrat with strong interest in education and health-research funding. Among his priorities: smaller classes and better-trained teachers, more-affordable health care, and help for family dairy farmers rather than big agribusinesses. He is expected to strongly defend the Appropriations Committee's power from executive branch encroachment, and will likely step up oversight of executive-branch agencies that get their funding through the committee. He's also expected to crack down on the level of earmarks.

HOW THE PROCESS WORKS

So what happens to the leadership of the House if Democrats pick up the net 15 seats they need to take control?

After leaders of both parties negotiate the size of committees and decide how many majority and minority members will be on each, the House Democrats' Steering and Policy Committee nominates members for assignments to the various committees and designates who will be chairman or ranking member, a process that factors in seniority, members' own requests for committee seats or chairmanships as well as some geographic or ideological balance. After that, the Democratic caucus must approve the committee assignments and chairmen. That's where fights can break out over who gets to run what. One exception is the Rules Committee, where members are chosen by the House speaker and minority leader.

DOJ_NMG_0084970

Rep. Nancy Pelosi3 of California, currently minority leader, is expected to become speaker if Democrats return to power. In that role, Ms. Pelosi, who is loyal to rank and file members, would set the tone for the assignment process, likely trying to avoid interparty fights during the process of reorganizing leadership and committee chairmen.

Ways and Means Committee

The Ways and Means Committee4, where all tax bills originate, is currently headed by Rep. Bill Thomas5 of California, an irascible conservative and often divisive figure who played a major role in pushing through a series of tax cuts and the Medicare prescription drug benefit. In a Democratic takeover, Rep. Charles Rangel6 of New York, now the committee's ranking Democrat, would take the gavel and undoubtedly change the agenda. He vigorously opposed the Bush tax cuts for the wealthy, and doesn't want to pass legislation that would increase the deficit. Rangel, an influential politician and unabashed liberal, doesn't shy away from controversy but wants to mend fences on the divided committee. More from Dow Jones Marketwatch7.

Financial Services Committee

The Financial Services Committee8, now headed by Ohioan Michael Oxley9 of Sarbanes-Oxley fame, oversees the financial services sector including the securities, insurance, banking, and housing industries. It would be chaired by the Rep. Barney Frank10 of Massachusetts, who recently told11 Dow Jones Marketwatch that he's interested in expanding affordable housing (likely a joint venture with Rangel), giving shareholders more power to approve executive pay and looking closer at hedge funds. The committee tends to be more bipartisan than others, and that is likely to continue under Frank, a brainy lawmaker with a gay constituency that makes him less dependent on other liberal bases.

Energy and Commerce Committee

The Energy and Commerce Committee12's jurisdiction sprawls over far more than national and international commerce and overseeing energy matters. It also covers telecommunications, consumer protection, food and drug safety, public health, air quality and environmental health. The committee's current chairman is Rep. Joe Barton13 of Texas, pushed through the 2005 energy law, which provides tax incentives and loan guarantees to encourage energy production. If the House turns Democratic, Rep. John Dingell14 of Michigan, who has spent more than 50 years in the House and was chairman before the 1994 Republican sweep, is in line for the job. He's a strong advocate for organized labor and the auto industy, and has long pushed for national health insurance. (Read more15 from Marketwatch.) But Dingell could be challenged by another powerful Democrat, Rep. Henry Waxman16 of California, a former subcommittee chairman and current committee member. The two have frequently teamed up in opposition to the Bush administration's agenda. As ranking member of the Government Reform Committee, the House's main investigative committee, Waxman has proven to been the biggest watchdog in Congress. His staff of investigators and lawyers has turned out hundreds of reports ranging from high drug prices to the U.S.'s Iraq war strategy to waste and fraud in the Iraqi reconstruction effort.

Judiciary Committee

The Judiciary Committee has broad jurisdiction over federal courts and judicial proceedings, civil liberties, law enforcement, patents and trademark issues, and bankruptcy, mutiny, espionage, and counterfeiting. And that's not the whole list. The current chairman, James Sensenbrenner17 of Wisconsin, shepherded the House immigration bill, focusing on enforcement and bucking the White House, which has pushed for a more comprehensive approach that would establish a guest worker program. John Conyers18 of Michigan, the committee's ranking Democrat, is poised to take over, and with Democrats in control of the House, broader immigration legislation is likely to clear Congress. Conyers has advocated a national health insurance program and has pushed for legislation on civil liberties and voting rights.

Other Key Posts

Reps. John Murtha19 of Pennsylvania and Steny Hoyer20 of Maryland have both put up their hand for the majority leader's office. Hoyer, currently the minority whip and more centrist than Pelosi, has been stumping for other Democrats this election season, perhaps helping him lock up support in the caucus. Murtha, who is closer to Pelosi, revived his campaign for the post earlier this month after letting it slide in the face of criticism from other Democrats.

Also, there could be a contest for majority whip between Reps. James Clyburn21 of South Carolina and Rahm Emanuel22 of Illinois. Clyburn is the Democrat's popular caucus chairman, and Emanuel, who as head of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, plays a major role in getting Democrats elected.

Democrat Panels Would Shift Agenda (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

If Democrats win control of Congress in the Nov. 7 elections, national priorities will be reshaped as liberals take the reins of congressional committees.

In the House, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, California Democrat, would be in line to replace House Speaker J. Dennis Hastert, Illinois Republican. The two lawmakers rarely agree on issues such as the war in Iraq, illegal immigration and congressional oversight.

"She would present a great number of problems for the Bush administration," said Craig Holman, legislative representative for Public Citizen, a government watchdog. "There would be a big change in the way things are done on Capitol Hill."

The 2006 Almanac of American Politics says Mrs. Pelosi voted with the liberal position on economic issues 93 percent of the time during the 2003-04 Congress. She voted with the left 88 percent of the time on social issues and had a 81 percent liberal rating on foreign policy votes. Mrs. Pelosi voted against a ban on partial-birth abortion, against the Bush tax cuts and against a ban on human cloning.

Although a leadership change would be significant, the real shift may occur in the committees.

"The Democratic leadership looks more like a left-wing activist club than a group representative of the American people," said National Republican Congressional Committee spokesman Jonathan Collegio. "A San Francisco liberal would head the House; an outspoken tax hiker would head Ways and Means; [and] a rabid impeachment seeker would head Judiciary."

Rep. Charles B. Rangel, New York Democrat, is in line to head the tax-writing Ways and Means Committee. Rep. John Conyers Jr. of Michigan is in the Democrats' top spot for the Judiciary panel, which has control over impeachments. Other Democrats looking for committee chairmanships are Rep. John D. Dingell of Michigan for Energy and Commerce, Rep. Henry A. Waxman of California for Government Reform, and Rep. Tom Lantos of California for International Relations.

The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee did not return repeated requests for comment.

Mr. Holman said a Democrat-led Congress, or even a slimmed Republican majority, would be a positive change for reformers and those who favor greater congressional oversight. Mrs. Pelosi has announced that, as speaker, she would order investigations of the administration's response to Hurricane Katrina and the lead-up to the war in Iraq.

"One of Pelosi's first actions as speaker would be to bring up lobbying and ethics reform legislation," Mr. Holman said. "Even if the Republicans hold on, we're going to see serious ethics reform and a tremendously positive improvement in congressional oversight."

Democrats also are optimistic about winning control of the Senate, though most analysts say that is less likely. Democrats need to pick up 15 seats to win the House and six seats to win control of the Senate.

Speculation has risen that Democrats will try to keep Sen. Joe Lieberman, Connecticut Democrat, from heading the Homeland Security and Governmental Affairs Committee if he wins re-election. Mr. Lieberman is running as an independent, and some liberals fear he would not be forceful enough in countering White House policy on Iraq.

"By mid-November, they will have ironed out a lot of the details," said Betty Koed, an assistant historian with the Senate Historical Office.

If Democrats take a one-seat edge, Republicans could demand near-equal representation on Senate committees, Ms. Koed said.

Senate Minority Leader Harry Reid, Nevada Democrat, has a more moderate voting record than Mrs. Pelosi. During the past cycle, Mr. Reid voted with the liberal side on economic issues 64 percent of the time. He is more conservative on social issues, voting liberal 58 percent of the time. On foreign policy votes, however, Mr. Reid sided with liberals 86 percent of the time.

On the Senate side, the high-profile Appropriations, Armed Services and Foreign Relations committees under Democrats likely would be led by Sens. Robert C. Byrd of West Virginia, Carl Levin of Michigan and Joseph R. Biden of Delaware.

What The Dems Would Do (NSWK)

By Michael Isikoff And Holly Bailey

DOJ_NMG_0084972

Newsweek, October 30, 2006

John Dingell likes to reminisce about the days when Democrats ruled Capitol Hill. Back in the 1980s and early '90s, the irascible Michigan congressman was chairman of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, one of the most influential in the Capitol. Dingell oversaw huge swaths of the U.S. economy, as well as the environment and food and drug laws. At times the chairman seemed more prosecutor than politician. He used his gavel to call dozens of hearings. He'd subpoena high government officials—at the time, that often meant Republicans who worked for Ronald Reagan and George H.W. Bush—and grill them for hours under the hot television lights. Dingell always insisted that witnesses testify under oath, meaning anything less than honest answers could be met with perjury charges. It was Dingell's oversight subcommittee that uncovered the Pentagon's $600 toilet seats and exposed corruption in government agencies. "We emptied the top leadership of the EPA," Dingell recalls with obvious satisfaction. "We put a large number of FDA people in jail."

That was before Dingell was forced to surrender his gavel when the GOP won the House in 1994. If Democrats take it back next month, the party will once again be in charge of all the committees. Dingell—now 80 years old and more ornery than ever—is all but certain to return to his old job. After 12 long, frustrating years as the panel's ranking minority member, a title that left him little more than the power to complain, nothing animates Dingell more than the thought of making up for lost time.

Dingell is careful to say he is not out to get George W. Bush, or the Republicans, and insists he will extend his hand to his GOP colleagues and conduct "oversight thoughtfully and responsibly." He says "there's no list" of things he wants to investigate. But in the next breath, he quickly ticks off a list of things he wants to investigate: The Bush administration's handling of port security and the threat of nuclear smuggling; computer privacy; climate change; concentration of media ownership; the new Medicare Part D program, which he calls a "massive scandal," and the secret meetings of Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force. "This is a hardheaded administration," Dingell says. "So we'll probably have lots of hearings."

The House of Representatives is full of John Dingell Democrats—exiled committee chairmen awaiting the day they can reclaim the center chair on the dais. All carry lists—if only in their heads—of issues and outrages they believe Republicans have failed to probe because such questions would be politically embarrassing to the president. Henry Waxman of California is another Democratic old-timer whose ire never dims. A tireless investigator, he's in line to head the Government Reform Committee, and plans to take aim at Halliburton and alleged rip-offs and contract abuse in Iraq. Then there's Charles Rangel, the New York congressman who's never met a cable show he didn't like. He is set to take over the Ways and Means Committee, and wants to take a hard look at the Bush tax cuts. John Conyers of Michigan has waited for years to head the Judiciary Committee. He's likely to convene hearings on the Patriot Act and domestic wiretapping. In the past, he has suggested the possibility of impeachment hearings for President Bush. "When the Clinton administration was in office, there was no accusation too small for the Republicans to rush out the subpoenas," Waxman says. "When Bush became president, there wasn't a scandal big enough for them to ignore."

Frothy rhetoric like that may appeal to those Democrats who relish the thought of spending the next two years in a state of C-Span-induced euphoria. But much as Democrats might like to see a thousand hearings bloom, there is one thing standing in their way: the Democratic leader herself. Nancy Pelosi, who would presumably become Speaker if the party wins the House, has made it clear that she does not want to turn the Capitol into a courthouse. There will be hearings, and plenty of them, but according to a top Democratic staff member familiar with Pelosi's plans—who, like all aides, wouldn't be named talking about strategy—the would-be speaker intends to keep tight control. The aide says Democratic leaders will have veto power over committee probes—something that in the past was the domain of the committee chairmen themselves.

Pelosi is concerned that too many flying subpoenas would make her party appear petty and revenge-hungry, obsessed with blaming Bush. She does not want anything to interfere with her most important goal: making the Democrats look like leaders instead of obstructionists.

Pelosi knows she probably won't have much success passing laws, not with Bush in the White House and a Senate that may well remain under Republican control. But in a way, that's the point: Pelosi's true focus for the next two years will be to position the Democrats for the 2008 presidential race. (She'll have help from rising star Rahm Emanuel of Illinois, the hard-edged former Bill Clinton aide who now runs the House Democrats' campaign committee.)

The idea is to bring popular bills that the GOP has opposed to the floor of the House—a minimum-wage hike, prescription-drug reform—and dare Republicans to vote against them. It's part of a larger package the Dems are billing as Six for '06, their version of the "Contract With America," which the GOP used to win in '94. Demo-crats plan to enact the 9/11 Commission recommendations and screen all containers at U.S. ports, put more money into counterterror operations and increase benefits for veterans. At home, they say they'll vote for tax deductions for college tuition and cut student-loan rates while raising taxes on big oil companies and corporations that move overseas. They say they'll also put a popular stem-cell-research bill up for a vote.

Democratic leaders are largely sticking with domestic issues in part because they have yet to come up with a coherent plan for the biggest problem of all: articulating a clear way out of Iraq. On the campaign trail, Democrats have been content to bash Republican failures and say they'd do better. The Democrats' official line is to promise a "new direction," and to urge, vaguely, "redeployment." If they win, they'll be forced to say what, if anything, that means.

Pelosi began preparing for power early. Over the summer, when polls started tilting toward the Democrats, Pelosi made her first moves to get the control of the chairmen-in-waiting. She assigned 40 members the job of studying the Democratic House rules and let it be known that she might not always follow the tradition of awarding chairmanships based on seniority. It was a clear warning not to cross her. In July, when she noticed few members were bothering to show up for party caucus meetings, Pelosi quietly leaked another possible rule change: attendance at the meetings would be taken into account in her committee selections. The same went for fund-raising. Members who weren't writing checks to support Democratic candidates might hurt their chances of rising in the leadership.

Once she'd gotten their attention, Pelosi met privately with several senior House members and told them they would get their committees. But she wanted it understood that she was running the place. Pelosi was especially firm with Conyers. She told him she didn't want any "out-of-control investigations," a senior House aide says; not another word about impeachment, she warned. "The impeachment talk gave the other side exactly what they wanted, which was an opening to talk about 'those liberal Democrats'," says the senior House aide. "It couldn't keep happening. We were writing their campaign ads for them."

So far, Pelosi's strategy appears to be working. The closest Conyers now gets to slamming Bush is his promise to conduct "robust oversight" of the administration. But Pelosi's authority wouldn't be put to a meaningful test until after the election, once chairmen assume control of their new committees and are less susceptible to threats and pressure from the top. If an errant chairman disobeys Pelosi and goes off message—or if preapproved hearings just so happen to take a detour and end up as bitter Bush-flogging sessions—it won't be easy to pry him from his chair, if it were possible at all.

The Republicans are playing up just that scenario. In campaign speeches, GOP heavies have taken to spooking voters with a picture of liberals gone wild. At a Kansas fund-raiser, Dick Cheney conducted a roll call, naming Conyers, Waxman and Massachusetts Rep. Barney Frank, the outspoken liberal who stands to head the Financial Services Committee. As if Cheney's point weren't clear enough, he drove home the message: "I don't need to tell you what kind of legislation would come to us by way of committee chairmen like [them]," he said. On Nov. 7, Americans will decide which scares them more: the message, or the messengers.

Don't Make Nice (NYT)

By Paul Krugman

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

Now that the Democrats are strongly favored to capture at least one house of Congress, they're getting a lot of unsolicited advice, with many people urging them to walk and talk softly if they win.

I hope the Democrats don't follow this advice — because it's bad for their party and, more important, bad for the country. In the long run, it's even bad for the cause of bipartisanship.

There are those who say that a confrontational stance will backfire politically on the Democrats. These are by and large the same people who told Democrats that attacking the Bush administration over Iraq would backfire in the midterm elections. Enough said.

Political considerations aside, American voters deserve to have their views represented in Congress. And according to opinion polls, most Americans are actually to the left of Congressional Democrats on issues such as health care.

In particular, the public wants politicians to stand up to corporate interests. This is clear from the latest Newsweek poll, which shows overwhelming public support for the agenda Nancy Pelosi has laid out for her first 100 hours if she becomes House speaker. The strongest support is for her plan to have Medicare negotiate with drug companies for lower prices, which is supported by 74 percent of Americans — and by 70 percent of Republicans!

What the make-nice crowd wants most of all is for the Democrats to forswear any investigations into the origins of the Iraq war and the cronyism and corruption that undermined it. But it's very much in the national interest to find out what led to the greatest strategic blunder in American history, so that it won't happen again.

What's more, the public wants to know. A large majority of Americans believe both that invading Iraq was a mistake, and that the Bush administration deliberately misled us into war. And according to the Newsweek poll, 58 percent of Americans believe that investigating contracting in Iraq isn't just a good idea, but a high priority; 52 percent believe the same about investigating the origins of the war.

Why, then, should the Democrats hold back? Because, we're told, the country needs less divisiveness. And I, too, would like to see a return to kinder, gentler politics. But that's not something Democrats can achieve with a group hug and a chorus of "Kumbaya."

The reason we have so much bitter partisanship these days is that that's the way the radicals who have taken over the Republican Party want it. People like Grover Norquist, who once declared that "bipartisanship is another name for date rape," push for a hard-right economic agenda; people like Karl Rove make that agenda politically feasible, even though it's against the interests of most voters, by fostering polarization, using religion and national security as wedge issues.

As long as polarization is integral to the G.O.P.'s strategy, Democrats can't do much, if anything, to narrow the partisan divide.

Even if they try to act in a bipartisan fashion, their opponents will find a way to divide the nation — which is what happened to the great surge of national unity after 9/11. One thing we might learn from investigations is the extent to which the Iraq war itself was motivated by the desire to have another wedge issue.

There are those who believe that the partisan gap can be bridged if the Democrats nominate an attractive presidential candidate who speaks in uplifting generalities. But they must have been living under a rock these past 15 or so years. Whoever the Democrats nominate will feel the full force of the Republican slime machine. And it doesn't matter if conservatives have nice things to say about a Democrat now. Once the campaign gets serious, they'll suddenly question his or her patriotism and discover previously unmentioned but grievous character flaws.

The truth is that we won't get a return to bipartisanship until or unless the G.O.P. decides that polarization doesn't work as a political strategy. The last great era of bipartisanship began after the 1948 election, when Republicans, shocked by Harry Truman's victory, decided to stop trying to undo the New Deal. And that example suggests that the best thing the Democrats can do, not just for their party and their country, but for the cause of bipartisanship, is what Truman did: stand up strongly for their principles.

Dean Leaves No State Behind (TIME)

By Perry Bacon Jr.

Time, October 30, 2006

Could it be that Howard Dean is really a savvy political strategist? For the past two years, the former Vermont Governor and 2004 presidential candidate has been flying off to Democrat-scarce zones like Mississippi, giving local party officials $8 million to carry out his controversial "50-state strategy." The Democratic National Committee chairman argues that if the Democrats want to win presidential elections, they need to spend to build strong state parties across the country rather than pump all their cash into swing states like Ohio. Other top officials, led by Illinois Representative Rahm Emanuel, the man in charge of electing Democrats to the House on Nov. 7, have fumed at what they consider Dean's boneheaded approach. They wonder why he is investing in a victory in 2020 in Alabama instead of pouring that money into closely contested districts that could help Democrats get the 15 seats they need to grab control of the House now.

DOJ_NMG_0084975

But following the Mark Foley scandal, Democrats are talking about not just winning the House but piling up as many as 40 new seats and also capturing the Senate. And some of the places where they are now competing lie in the blood-red states where Dean has been on his lonely crusade to find blue voters. In Idaho, where President Bush won 68.4% of the vote in 2004, Democrat Larry Grant is close enough to winning a House seat that Vice President Dick Cheney and Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert have made visits to campaign for Grant's opponent. In Kansas, G.O.P. incumbent Jim Ryun had Cheney in town to raise money in his race against Democrat Nancy Boyda. Democrats are holding out hope in two House districts in another Republican stronghold, Nebraska.

Victory in any of those races is still a long shot, but local officials say support from Dean could help put their candidates over the top. He has sent at least two organizers to most states to register voters and rebuild moribund state parties. With the help of Dean's staff, the Nebraska Democratic Party held conventions in 68 of the state's 93 counties this year, up from 36 in 2004; participants signed up to canvass and serve as precinct captains. Grant says staff members from the Democratic National Committee have worked to identify and contact potential voters in his district, a task congressional candidates in most states have to do themselves. Party officials in Idaho and Nebraska credit the communications directors they hired with Dean's funds--neither state had a full-time party flack--with helping coordinate their messages and successfully attack G.O.P. candidates. "If we win a House seat in Nebraska, Howard Dean will get more credit than Rahm Emanuel," says Barry Rubin, executive director of the Nebraska Democratic Party.

That Dean's project might pay dividends this year is surprising to everyone, including its creator. "I didn't expect much to come of this strategy for four or even six years," Dean told TIME. And if one of the red-state candidates wins, Dean may show he can scream even louder in vindication than he once did in defeat.

Courting The Devout (TIME)

By Mike Allen

Time, October 23, 2006

They stayed at home in large numbers instead of voting in the 2000 election, or so Karl Rove has always maintained. They came out for President Bush in 2004 and were key to his re-election, or so they like to claim. Now, just weeks before the Nov. 7 midterm congressional elections, one of the last unknowns of a wild and potentially historic campaign season is: What will Christian conservatives do this time?

With polls suggesting an increased likelihood that Republicans may lose one or both houses of Congress, G.O.P. strategists calculate that a calamitous Category 5 election might be tamed to a merely scary Category 4 if they can somehow conjure a solid turnout of evangelical voters, the white suburbanites who fill the megachurches and can usually be counted on even in light-turnout elections like midterms. Party operatives plan to devote the election's closing weeks to courting Christians more intensely than any other single stripe of the electorate, all but begging the parishioners to give them one more chance even after the Foley scandal.

Leaders of Christian-conservative lobbying organizations are going along with the G.O.P. push, despite their misgivings about Mark Foley, the now resigned Republican Florida Congressman caught sending lewd e-mails to teenage pages, and the lackadaisical response by the House leadership. James Dobson, founder of Focus on the Family, last week told listeners of his radio program, carried on 1,000 stations in the U.S., "Yes, what Mark Foley did was wrong, but it is still important to go to the polls and let our voices be heard ... Take about five people with you and vote. It would be a sin not to." The Family Research Council has been e-mailing "No Time to Be Complacent" bulletins and held a Liberty Sunday turnout rally at the base of Boston's Beacon Hill that was televised to hundreds of church-fellowship halls, evening services and small-group meetings. These leaders have calculated that remaining aloof would just diminish their power. "You only gain clout by activity," says Michael Farris, chairman of the Home School Legal Defense Association. His group plans to send hundreds of teenagers who are home schooled to 10 states in the election's closing week to make phone calls and knock on doors on behalf of conservative candidates.

Like many of his supporters, though, Farris has over time become a more reluctant warrior for the G.O.P. Polls of white evangelical Protestants show that their support for the Republican Party grew substantially from 1999 to 2004, then began a steady decline. An October poll by the Pew Research Center found that just 42% of Evangelicals thought that "governs in an honest and ethical way" described the Republican Party better than the Democratic Party. Also, 31% said they intended to vote for a Democrat, up from the 22% who voted for John Kerry in 2004.

The souring of churchgoers' feelings toward the party is largely the result of frustrated expectations. Before the 2004 election, Bush and other Republican candidates promised to work for a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, then largely ignored the issue once elected. "There's little to show for all the effort," says Farris. Also, many conservative leaders argue that the Foley embarrassment has shown that the party has become too permissive. "The big tent has become a three-ring circus," says Tony Perkins, the president of the influential Family Research Council. The Administration got a fresh blast of animus from such groups last week after remarks by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice at the swearing-in ceremony for the nation's global AIDS coordinator. She referred to the parents of his male partner as his "in-laws," which the Administration says was a mistake based on notes she had been handed and was not any sort of statement of policy. Meanwhile, David Kuo, who has just published an exposÃ© of his stint as deputy director of Bush's faith-based office, used a spate of television appearances to argue that the White House had politically exploited the devout.

Christian conservatives who are sticking by the G.O.P. point out that there have been victories, most notably the confirmation of two conservatives to the Supreme Court. And the President has restricted federal funding for stem-cell research. But recognizing that their followers are out of sorts, leaders like Dobson have expanded their pitch beyond the traditional social issues like abortion and are making the fear of terrorism--Focus on the Family calls it the issue of "national sovereignty"--a central argument for turning out for Republicans. At three Stand for the Family rallies, which drew smaller crowds than similar ones in 2004, Dobson said "World War III," a battle against violent Muslims, "has started, and no one seems to know it."

Republican campaign operatives, meanwhile, are working directly to stoke turnout of these cranky but vital religious voters. Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, battling in one of the nation's closest races, appointed a Conservative Coalition director who organizes volunteers specializing in reaching traditionalists with messages about everything from taxes to marriage. In Tennessee, Republican Senate candidate Bob Corker has organized ministers to reach out to their churches' members on his behalf. For those campaigns, such efforts could be the difference between winning and losing. But that could be true for Christian conservatives as well. Evangelical leaders often complain that Republican officials have not given them sufficient credit for their muscle in the past three elections. If Nov. 7 turns into a G.O.P. wipeout, those same officials can be counted on to blame Christian voters above others. With reporting by With reporting by Perry Bacon Jr.

Running On Experience, A Longtime Incumbent Finds Himself On The Defensive (NYT)

By Abby Goodnough

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

FORT LAUDERDALE, Fla., Oct. 17 — In this season of anti-incumbency, Representative E. Clay Shaw Jr. is gambling that voters will deem his seniority a virtue.

Mr. Shaw, a Republican, plays up his 26 years in the House, constantly reminding voters that he has “a darned good shot” at leading the powerful Ways and Means Committee. He likes to say that his opponent, Ron Klein, a Democratic Florida state senator, if elected now would not attain equivalent experience in Washington until he was of geriatric age.

But whether Mr. Shaw’s strategy will save him or sink him on Election Day is anyone’s guess.

Mr. Klein, 49, has painted his opponent’s seniority as a crippling flaw, and has put Mr. Shaw, 67, on the defensive about the Iraq war, the Medicare prescription drug program and Social Security, with the latter two being vital issues for the legions of retirees living here.

Mr. Klein has called Mr. Shaw a lackey of President Bush, prompting Mr. Shaw to emphasize his differences with the president, whose popularity four years ago helped Mr. Shaw beat back another tough challenger.

“I voted to override the veto on stem cell research,” Mr. Shaw said in a recent debate with Mr. Klein. “When the president was going to allow some of the foreign countries to take over our ports, I stood up to the plate and I said no.”

His struggle reflects the broader challenge Republicans face as they fight to keep control of Congress, but with some striking distinctions: Mr. Shaw is the most senior House incumbent whose seat is threatened, even though Republicans outnumber Democrats in his wealthy Atlantic Coast district, and Mr. Bush remains slightly more popular here than in other parts of the nation.

Mr. Klein, a lawyer and an artful networker who has represented Boca Raton in the Florida Legislature since 1992, has raised more money than almost any other Democratic challenger this year. He has forced the low-key Mr. Shaw, who has battled lung cancer in recent years but says he is now healthy, to run more aggressively than usual.

"Over the years he has actively tried to present himself as this grandfatherly, friendly congressman," Robert P. Watson, a political science professor at Florida Atlantic University, said of Mr. Shaw. "Now he's more feisty than I've ever, ever seen him."

Mr. Shaw's district, to his detriment, borders that of former Representative Mark Foley, a fellow Republican, in a news market that is especially saturated with reports of Mr. Foley's sexually explicit e-mail messages to Congressional pages.

But Mr. Shaw has a financial edge — he has raised $3.9 million compared with Mr. Klein's $3.2 million — and is benefiting from the relatively strong economy here.

"It's one thing to be in a poor farming town in Nebraska, really feeling the pinch," Mr. Watson said. "But here, everybody is driving around in a brand new Mercedes and going golfing all afternoon. It's hard to have the point of view that the country is going down the wrong path."

Florida's 22nd Congressional District runs up the oceanfront in Broward and Palm Beach Counties, through the condominium canyons of Fort Lauderdale and Boynton Beach and wealthy enclaves like Boca Raton, Palm Beach and Jupiter.

After Mr. Shaw won the 2000 election by only 600 votes, Republicans redrew the district to exclude several heavily Democratic sections, including a slice of Miami-Dade County.

Though 40 percent of voters here are Republican, 35 percent are Democrat and 22 percent are unaffiliated, the district still favored John Kerry in the 2004 presidential election, when he won 52 percent of the vote.

"All those unaffiliated voters down there seem to have a tendency to go Democratic when it comes to more national issues," said Aubrey Jewett, a political science professor at the University of Central Florida.

Perhaps for that reason, Mr. Shaw has emphasized a local issue: skyrocketing home insurance rates in the wake of hurricanes. He has proposed creating a national catastrophe fund as a backup insurer, spreading insurance risk for national disasters across the country.

Mr. Shaw has criticized Mr. Klein for taking contributions from sugar companies — which environmentalists blame for the decline of the Everglades — and for representing clients as a lobbyist before local governments. Mr. Klein's law firm opened a lobbying office in Tallahassee this year, but Mr. Klein said he had never lobbied the Legislature.

Like other Democratic challengers, Mr. Klein has hammered away at Mr. Bush's handling of the war, and he has tried to link Mr. Shaw to the president's policies. He says Mr. Shaw votes for bills supported by the president 90 percent of the time (83 percent, Mr. Shaw says), and attacks him for endorsing the administration's stay-the-course plan for Iraq.

Mr. Shaw responds like the exasperated parent of a sophomoric son.

"I've been in secret briefings; you have not," he told Mr. Shaw at a candidate forum in Coral Springs. "I've been in Iraq, you have not. I've talked to the generals, you have not."

Yet, Mr. Shaw also wants voters to know he worked well with a Democratic president, Bill Clinton.

"The greatest moments of the Clinton years came when Democrats and Republicans worked together," his latest advertisement says, pointing to welfare, Social Security and environmental bills that Mr. Shaw wrote and Mr. Clinton signed. "More than almost anyone in Congress, Clay Shaw solves problems across party lines."

Especially since the Foley scandal erupted, Mr. Klein has spoken constantly of ethical lapses among Republicans in Congress and called for an end to the status quo. But Mr. Shaw has not been accused of such lapses and was among the first Republicans to blast Mr. Foley after he resigned on Sept. 29.

"If Klein tries to hop on the Foley thing," Mr. Jewett said, "it might not gain him anything and people might think it's unfair to lump Clay Shaw in there."

Mr. Klein started campaigning early, in March 2005, and already had strong name recognition and support from having served in the Florida Legislature more than a decade, representing areas shared by the Congressional district. He is Jewish, which is potentially an advantage in a district where about 25 percent of the electorate shares his faith.

DOJ_NMG_0084978

But he is burning money faster than Mr. Shaw is, and the costs of the final campaign stretch could be considerable, as the district is split between two news markets. The final weeks are crucial for Mr. Klein, who must attract undecided voters and turn out his Democratic base.

"This is going to be one of those photo-finish things," said Rick Wilson, a Republican strategist in Tallahassee, "where it comes down to who works their base hardest and who puts their message out in front of voters in the last days in a way that resonates."

Both candidates face obstacles in getting out the vote. Mr. Klein could suffer from the lackluster support for Representative Jim Davis, the Democratic candidate for governor, whose name tops the ballot. At the same time, Republicans could stay home out of disgust for the recent Congressional scandals; confidence that Charlie Crist, the Republican candidate for governor and Florida attorney general, could win without their vote; or reluctance to vote for a slate that includes Representative Katherine Harris, the Republican who has run a disastrous campaign against Senator Bill Nelson.

Mr. Shaw discounts such prospects, saying voters here are more loyal to him than to his party. In past elections, he has won more votes in his district than even Gov. Jeb Bush, he said.

Clinton, McCain Stump For N.J. Hopefuls (AP-Y)

By Chris Newmarker

AP, October 23, 2006

Two heavy hitters from Washington came to New Jersey on Sunday to campaign in the tight race between Democratic Sen. Robert Menendez and Republican challenger Tom Kean Jr.

While the focus remained largely on the Senate race, appearances by Sens. John McCain and Hillary Rodham Clinton also looked like a potential preview of the 2008 presidential campaign.

McCain, R-Ariz., told roughly 250 donors at a Kean fundraiser that he believed the Garden State contest would determine which party controls the Senate. Democrats are seeking to pick up six seats to take control.

"The eyes of America will be upon this race, and I think they have a very clear choice," said McCain, who described Kean as a "reformer."

Later Sunday, during a speech in Paramus, Clinton, D-N.Y., touted the work Menendez has done — particularly his efforts to bolster homeland security — since Gov. Jon S. Corzine appointed him in January to complete his Senate term.

Noting that Menendez was a vocal critic of the Bush administration's plan to let a Dubai-owned company buy a stake in several U.S. ports earlier this year, Clinton told the crowd of about 700 people that "Bob wasn't intimidated, he didn't back down. He stood his ground and we finally beat them (Bush administration) back."

McCain and Clinton have both been the subject of rampant speculation over whether they will seek the White House in 2008. McCain said Sunday he would make a decision early next year. Clinton, speaking earlier during a debate in her own Senate race, refused to disclose her plans, saying she had not made up her mind.

Recent polls show the New Jersey race remains close.

A Monmouth University/Gannett New Jersey poll released Sunday showed 48 percent of likely voters favoring Menendez with 39 percent favoring Kean. The poll of 396 likely voters, conducted by telephone from Oct. 16-19, has a sampling error margin of plus or minus 4.9 percentage points.

Out To Show He's Not Just An Old New Jersey Name (NYT)

By David W. Chen

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

TRENTON, Oct. 22 — When Thomas H. Kean Jr. first ran for public office, in a crowded Republican primary for a House seat in 2000, he was blindsided by a campaign flier from one of his opponents that cribbed from Mr. Kean's own résumé.

Drawing attention to selected items via circles and bullet points, the leaflet belittled Mr. Kean's experience, arguing that he, the fortunate son of a popular former governor, had never demonstrated any leadership skills beyond organizing a canoe trip down the length of the Danube River after graduating from Dartmouth.

As Mr. Kean, now a state senator, tries again to land a job in Congress — this time to fill a Senate seat formerly held by his great-grandfather and great-great-uncle — he must still persuade skeptics that he possesses more than just a revered political name. After all, he was appointed not once but twice to legislative posts, winning elections only when he already had the incumbent's advantage, and as a member of the minority party for most of his tenure, he has had few legislative victories.

To admirers, Mr. Kean, 38, has matured into a thoughtful and attentive lawmaker, distinguishing himself in ethics, environmental protection and health care. Hardly doctrinaire, he has espoused positions that are moderate, though clearly more conservative than those of his father, former Gov. Thomas H. Kean. And he has demonstrated political grit in a surprisingly ferocious campaign to unseat the incumbent, Robert Menendez, in what national Republican leaders believe is probably their best chance to capture a Democratic Senate seat.

"Here was the problem in 2000: There was a sense of entitlement that this should be his Congressional seat because his name was Kean," said Kevin Collins, a Republican political consultant. "But this guy is light years ahead of where he was."

Often described as one of the most affable people in New Jersey politics, Mr. Kean may well utter the honorific "sir" more frequently than any other legislator. But behind that toothy overbite of a grin is a man who even some Republicans say can be too accommodating and cautious, leaving the impression that he wants to avoid offending anyone for the sake of future political positioning.

Mr. Kean, asked during a debate last week about his biggest weakness, explained, "I simply want to include as many people as possible in the decision-making process."

But one politician's nuanced thinking can be a critic's flip-flopping.

Walking Fine Lines

Over five years in Trenton and while campaigning this year across the state, Mr. Kean has cast votes or staked out blurry positions on issues including raising the minimum wage, privatization of Social Security, public funding for stem-cell research and gay rights.

"He's trying to appeal to everyone, and at the end of the day he risks appealing to no one," said Mayor Steve Lonegan of Bogota, one of New Jersey's leading conservative Republicans. "You need to make clear, articulate decisions and let your base know where you stand on issues, and you should explain why. And when you disagree, you have to be credible, and I think that's one of his weaknesses."

Mr. Kean is now New Jersey's youngest full-time legislator in an institution whose members typically hold other jobs at the same time. One Democratic legislator who has often collaborated with Mr. Kean, State Senator John H. Adler, said he has seen only one other politician at a similarly early stage of his career who rivaled Mr. Kean in ambition and political calculation, "voting as a conservative when that's necessary, and voting as a moderate/liberal when that's necessary": former Governor James E. McGreevey.

Steven Goldstein, executive director of Garden State Equality, New Jersey's leading gay rights group, described his dealings with Mr. Kean as "the most disappointing I've ever had" over two decades in politics.

Mr. Goldstein, a Democrat who considers Republicans like Mr. Kean's father and former Gov. Christie Whitman to be gay-rights champions, said that when New Jersey was weighing legislation to provide domestic partners some legal benefits in late 2003, the newly appointed State Senator Kean was empathetic and supportive. But the night before a vote in January 2004, Mr. Kean called after midnight and, "I swear on a stack of Bibles," Mr. Goldstein recalled, said he could not vote for the bill because of a likely backlash from conservatives in a future primary.

"Dealing with Tom Kean Jr. is like playing chess with Casper the Friendly Ghost," Mr. Goldstein said. "He believes he can affable his way out of anything — and I'm using affable as a verb — and he does everything in his power not to let you see who he really is."

Mr. Kean explained, in an interview at his Mountainside campaign headquarters, that he voted against the bill because he was troubled by its specifics and "nobody would tell anybody what the cost was." Earlier this year, he voted to expand benefits for domestic partners.

"I think the responsibility of someone in elected office is to try pull people together, is to try to find common grounds," he said. "That's how I conduct my life."

DOJ_NMG_0084980

An Appointment to Trenton

Other than his stinging loss in 2000, the current battle for the United States Senate is Mr. Kean's first competitive election.

In 2001, Republican leaders appointed him to fill the seat of an assemblyman who was dying of cancer and represent a staunchly Republican swath of northern New Jersey.

"Everyone wanted to see Tom get this seat as a sort of consolation for losing the primary," recalled William J. Palatucci, a former finance chairman of the state party. "because he was such a hard worker, and because of who he was, and because he was the future of the party."

Though he was more familiar with federal issues (having worked for a few years in Washington for Representative Bob Franks and at the Environmental Protection Agency) and international topics (having studied Central Asia in graduate school at Tufts), Mr. Kean dived into state issues and was able, despite Democratic control of the Assembly, to push through legislation on the environment and campaign finance, including one measure that strengthened a state ethics commission.

An avid camper, hiker and hunter while growing up on the family estate in Livingston and working as a counselor at summer camps, Mr. Kean sponsored what became known as "Clean Car" legislation in New Jersey, which established rigorous new vehicle emission standards expected to reduce pollution from cars by 20 percent over 10 years.

Mr. Kean traces his zest for campaign finance reform, in part, to that first Congressional race in 2000, when he was attacked by one of the earliest so-called 527 groups, which can spend virtually unlimited sums as long as they do not coordinate with parties or candidates. He sued the Federal Election Commission after the race. He also said he traced his zest for clean government and campaign finance reform to what he saw during that three-month canoe trip along the Danube through Eastern Europe in 1990.

"I came away more fundamentally believing that there needs to be merit-based decision-making that creates economic opportunity," he explained, "because one of the things I saw was you didn't really have competition for contracts."

The political stars aligned again for Mr. Kean in January 2003, when he was tapped by Republican leaders to fill the seat of a retiring state senator. Before leaving the Assembly, he managed to defy the Democratic Speaker, Albio Sires, and advance a bill that would have limited campaign contributions from state contractors.

But on Mr. Kean's last day, Mr. Sires blocked the bill and essentially kicked him out of the chamber. "I have a letter of resignation here," Mr. Sires said, waving a piece of paper in the air as Republicans booed, according to a newspaper account at the time. "You're no longer a member of this body."

The legislation died, but the incident elevated Mr. Kean's profile, feeding speculation that he was considering a run for governor in 2005. He still frequently cites it as an example of his independence.

Questions on Stances

Yet on many issues, particularly polarizing social ones, Mr. Kean has acted much more tentatively.

Bryan Miller, executive director of Ceasefire New Jersey, said that he asked Mr. Kean — who received an F from the National Rifle Association in 2003 — twice to co-sponsor a bill designed to protect children by limiting the use of handguns to authorized adults because "his old man was always great on the issue."

"His answer was, 'Well, I got to talk to my leadership,' then he fell away and wouldn't do it," Mr. Miller recalled. "He showed a complete lack of leadership on it. I was frankly shocked."

Asked about this, Mr. Kean wondered if there was that much difference between supporting a bill and being its co-sponsor. He added, his voice rising in exasperation, that he was one of eight Republicans "to vote for the darn bill."

Another issue on which Mr. Kean has compiled an inconsistent record is stem-cell research. He has stated flatly that he supports embryonic research, and has criticized Mr. Bush's policies limiting federal financing on it. Yet he has voted against bills that would borrow money to build facilities for such research, saying that voters should first approve such projects.

He also voted against, then for, different versions of a bill that established the state's Civil Rights Act in 2004, which permits people to sue in state court when they believe their civil rights have been violated.

"It's like John Kerry: I voted for the $87 billion, then I voted against it," said the Rev. Reginald T. Jackson, executive director of the Black Ministers Council of New Jersey, referring to the explanation Mr. Kerry gave for votes on financing the Iraq war that became one of the most potent weapons against him in the 2004 presidential race.

DOJ_NMG_0084981

Mr. Jackson, who in the past supported moderate Republicans, including Governors Kean and Whitman, was among several African-American clergymen who said the younger Mr. Kean was vague and evasive in endorsement interviews earlier this year. "It's almost like he doesn't want to offend anyone," Mr. Jackson said.

For his part, Mr. Kean said it was not bad, sometimes, to react guardedly, especially on complex issues. And two of New Jersey's leading Republicans, Douglas R. Forrester and Leonard Lance, the Senate minority leader, both praised Mr. Kean's listening skills.

"Most people in the political arena are there because they like to offer their own opinions," said Mr. Forrester, who lost last year's race for governor. "Tom is a much better listener than any other politician of which I can think."

Getting Started

At Dartmouth College, Mr. Kean majored in history, rowed junior varsity heavyweight crew, and was treasurer and vice president of the Psi Upsilon fraternity, graduating in 1990. "Young Men, Old Money," screamed the headline on Playboy's profile of the Dartmouth chapter the spring before Mr. Kean arrived on campus. "They know that the only thing better than the fast track is the inside track."

After college, Mr. Kean's first job was at the Environmental Protection Agency in Washington, where he met his wife, Rhonda Lee Norton, an Ohio native. They live with their two daughters, ages 7 and 3, in a modest colonial style house in Westfield, but plan to move soon into a $1.3 million Tudor, now being renovated, a few blocks away.

While working in Washington, Mr. Kean was a volunteer firefighter and emergency medical technician in Hyattsville, Md., and some who served with him suggested that he run for office there. But Anthony P. Mangelli, a friend who is now a New Jersey state trooper, said Mr. Kean did not see a political future there because "it's a very Democratic area" and "he had a love for New Jersey."

Sure enough, after a few years at Tufts, where he received a master's degree and began work on a Ph.D, Mr. Kean moved to Westfield when his former boss, Mr. Franks, announced his bid for the United States Senate, leaving an open seat. Despite his deep family roots in the state, anonymous mailers from a 527 group attacked Mr. Kean as a liberal carpetbagger from Massachusetts and juxtaposed his picture with Boston figures like Senator Edward M. Kennedy and Larry Bird.

"Never worked in New Jersey," says one mailer from that campaign. "Never paid New Jersey property taxes. Tom Kean Jr. may be a nice young man -- and you may have liked his dad a lot — but he needs more experience dealing with local issues and concerns."

Mr. Kean says that his loss was, in retrospect, "a good thing" because it gave him the opportunity to serve in Trenton. In this year's race, he was so concerned about a primary challenge from a conservative, according to numerous Republicans, that he swerved to the right on some issues and hired top personnel who had worked for Bret D. Schundler, the Republican nominee for governor in 2001.

Should he win this year, Mr. Kean said, he would push to enact the recommendations of the 9/11 Commission, which his father chaired. He would try to make Mr. Bush's tax cuts permanent. And he said he would support efforts to increase the federal minimum wage, though he voted against a similar measure in New Jersey.

He says that he admires Senator Lamar Alexander of Tennessee, as well as Senator John McCain of Arizona. But when asked which Republicans he least admired, or did not look forward to working with in the Senate, he demurred.

"I'm an optimist," he said.

Kean On Politics (WP)

By David Segal

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

HACKENSACK, N.J. If there were a drinking game whose rules required a swig each time Tom Kean Jr. asserted that his Senate race opponent is "under federal criminal investigation," you would be drooling drunk 10 minutes after meeting the guy.

Kean says "under federal criminal investigation" about once every 28 seconds, uttering the words as if they were tragic and beyond dispute. After a day in Kean's company you are prepared to think terrible things about Robert Menendez, the Democratic incumbent.

DOJ_NMG_0084982

So when Kean is asked over a recent lunch if he has unfairly benefited by sharing the name of his father -- the beloved ex-governor of New Jersey and 9/11 commission chairman, Tom Kean Sr. -- it is no surprise that he answers this way:

"Do people want me to change my name?"

Pause.

"My opponents will do anything they can to distract from their own flawed candidate. Bob Menendez is under federal criminal investigation. As far as I know, he is the only candidate for Senate under federal criminal investigation."

In a typical year, the vicious, pile-driving style of New Jersey politics is a dispiriting spectacle for the voters of the state and a kind of Ultimate Fighting amusement for everyone else. But this year is different. This year, the Democratic Party needs six seats to take control of the Senate, and just about any way you run the numbers, the party will fall short if it does not win in New Jersey. Victory here does not assure the Democrats the keys to the upper chamber, but the pros will tell you that without New Jersey, the party doesn't have a real chance.

That fact has handed 38-year-old Thomas H. Kean Jr. -- until now a semi-obscure state assemblyman and the scion of a multi-generational political dynasty -- a breakout role in the midterm drama. Not since 1972 has a GOP candidate won a Senate seat in New Jersey (although the state has put several Republicans in the governor's chair during those years).

But Kean has this race squarely in the "too close to call" category, thanks to name recognition, vigorous campaigning and dogged repetition of that "investigation" mantra. An Oct. 12 poll by Quinnipiac University gave Menendez a slight but statistically almost insignificant edge, 49 percent to Kean's 45 percent.

"He has a really powerful name," Clay Richards, a Quinnipiac pollster, says of Kean. "And whether or not these charges against Menendez are serious, they are hurting him."

The whole investigation matter, which we'll get to, is hardly as cut and dried as Kean indicates. But Kean, who looks like a Mountie and fights like a Crip, isn't selling honesty and integrity so much as a brand name that represents honesty and integrity. It's a pitch with resonance in this state, where politicians routinely scamper offstage chased by ethics charges and mortifying headlines.

Kean's political lineage includes a grandfather who served in Congress for 20 years, as well as a great-grandfather and a great-great-uncle who both served in the Senate. Theodore Roosevelt is a relative, too. And Tom Kean Sr. occupies a hallowed place in the state's history, widely viewed as a man of rectitude who, at least for a few years in the 1980s, restored pride to the state.

"The Kean name suggests a time when things were going pretty well for New Jersey," says Jennifer Duffy, a political analyst with the Cook Political Report. "And Menendez has for years been a powerful figure in Hudson County, and in New Jersey 'Hudson County' is a code word for corrupt, machine-driven politics."Name-Brand Offspring

Americans love a good up-from-nothing bootstrap bio, but when it comes to politics we tend to become shameless nepotists. This political season alone, Democrat Robert P. Casey Jr., the son of a former governor of Pennsylvania, is threatening to unseat Republican Sen. Rick Santorum. In Tennessee, Harold Ford Jr., the namesake of a long-serving congressman, might trade up his House seat for a Senate office. Frank Murkowski, the governor of Alaska, lost his bid for reelection in a September primary, but his daughter Lisa Murkowski still holds the Senate seat -- formerly his Senate seat -- to which he appointed her in 2002. And Jimmy Carter's son Jack, an investment banker who has never held political office, is running for Senate in Nevada.

To say nothing of the White House incumbent.

Kean is no neophyte, but it's unlikely we'd be talking about him were he born to a different family. (It's pronounced "Kane," by the way, which somehow makes it blue-bloodier.) Polls in the state earlier in the year found that as many as one in four voters had mistaken junior for senior, a confusion that after a few months of ads and debates has now all but vanished.

Kean shrugs off the impact of his name. "When my father ran for the state Assembly, the headline said, 'Kean's Son to Run for Assembly,' " he says, over lunch one recent day, reciting one of his favorite refrains. "When my grandfather first ran for Congress, it was 'Kean's son to run for Congress.' "

Kean is sitting at a diner, refueling between campaign events. He has ordered a salad -- "The wetter the better," he tells the waiter, which means heavy on the dressing -- and talks about his past, his family and his positions. He is tall, smart and so cautious that on a few occasions he stipulates as "off the record" thoughts that are almost laughably benign. He has a slight speech impediment that muddles his R's, so that when he laments corruption in the state it sounds a little like "cowwuption." When he pauses between points, his mouth freezes momentarily into a smile.

What you learn is that Kean, like his father, is a moderate, pro-choice Republican. He is against the Bush proposal to provide illegal immigrants with a path toward legal status and eventual citizenship, in favor of federal funding stem-cell research and against a timetable for troop withdrawal in Iraq. He denounces taxes and champions the environment. He has called for the resignations of both Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert, which is perhaps wise given that the president's approval ratings languish in the high 20s here, according to some polls. When Vice President Cheney came in March to stump on Kean's behalf, Kean didn't attend the event because, he said, he was stuck voting in the state Assembly.

So, would the candidate welcome a campaign visit from President Bush?

"He has an open invitation," Kean says.

Okay, but would you welcome that visit?

"He has an open invitation," Kean says, following up with that rictus of a grin. "The president's schedule is far above our pay grade."Lost in Translation?

Earlier in the day, Kean went to a Korean senior citizen home in Palisades Park, where he spoke before a crowd of a couple dozen who had gathered for their daily lunch. He was introduced in Korean, and when the applause faded he quipped, "Thank you for what I hope was an inspiring introduction." Then he started his stump speech, which drew only blank stares until he was interrupted by an elderly Korean woman who asked for the microphone and offered to translate.

"Last year, 57,000 more people left the state than moved in," he thundered. Then he handed off the microphone and nodded during the translation, which seemed to go on for a really long time.

"That is not the state that I grew up in or that you moved to," he declared.

More translating.

"We cannot afford the status quo. The status quo is making this state unaffordable."

"Status quo" baffled the lady with the mike, so Kean patiently searched for a different phrase. This was the very definition of a tough room -- a somewhat indifferent crowd, few of whom understand a word you're saying.

Kean smiled confidently through the whole experience. His strength is radiating intelligence and incorruptibility, and he appears to genuinely enjoy people. Like his father, part of his appeal is a reassuring lack of panache that veers to the stolid. He can also be dry to the point of humor-impaired. Driving away from the senior citizen event, this reporter joked that the Korean emcee had told the audience that Kean is fond of Kim Jong Il.

"Where did you learn Korean?" he wondered.

Asked during a recent radio debate to name his greatest weakness, Kean said, "I can't tell a good joke."

"Was that a joke?" the moderator asked.

Other times, he sounds like he's been body-snatched by his own sound bites, especially when there are cameras rolling. After lunch, he spoke at a forum organized by a real estate business group, and on his way out of the building, he was stopped and asked a question by a local TV reporter.

"Corruption is costing the people of the state of New Jersey too much money," he said, as if reading a cue card. "We can no longer afford a United States senator who is under federal criminal investigation. We can no longer afford a United States senator that steers hundreds of thousands of dollars of taxpayer monies into his own pocket."

Kean was referring to the $320,000 in rent that Menendez earned over nearly a decade, starting in the mid-'90s, by leasing a Union City property he once owned to a nonprofit that accepted federal grants. The allegation is that Menendez might have improperly benefited by steering money to the nonprofit, which was then able to pay its monthly rent.

Word of an investigation into this deal was published in September in the Star-Ledger of Newark, which reported that U.S. Attorney Christopher Christie had subpoenaed records related to the lease. In a subsequent TV interview, Menendez seemed to confirm the basic details when he told George Stephanopoulos on ABC News's "This Week" that he welcomed the investigation and looked forward to "its successful conclusion." Later, Menendez told reporters that he'd misspoken, noting that not every subpoena leads to an investigation.

Whatever it's called, the timing of these news reports had Democrats, and even some impartial observers, grumbling about possible political motives, largely because Christie is a Bush appointee, and because in 1999 he gave money to Kean's unsuccessful campaign for Congress. A spokesman for Christie declined to discuss the investigation or even if there is one. It isn't clear whether Menendez broke any laws; he asserts that a House ethics attorney blessed the deal while Menendez was a congressman in the 1990s.

"It's just mindless negativity," says Matthew Miller, referring to Kean's "investigation" talk. "A few weeks ago, Kean had a slight lead and then he went into this mindless repetition and he's gone backward. Hopefully, [the Kean campaign] won't be smart enough to realize that voters want a candidate who'll tell them what he'll do as U.S. senator."

The Menendez campaign has been counter-slinging with allegations of campaign contribution improprieties and charging that a Kean benefactor is embroiled in an Iraq oil-for-food scandal. The point -- for each campaign, apparently -- is just to tag the other guy as a weasel, as often as possible.'No-Nonsense Guy'

At moments over lunch, Kean sounds like he's actually trying to seem dull. He says he never had a rebellious phase, and that "Field of Dreams" and other sentimental sports flicks are his favorite movies. Of his days as a fraternity brother at Dartmouth, Kean says, as blandly as possible, "I very much enjoyed it."

You'd think, at minimum, he might have grappled in some compelling way with the patrimony of his name. His grandfather, reputedly the first senator to denounce the Holocaust, dedicated a book he wrote called "Fourscore Years" to his descendants in the hopes that they would make their ancestors proud. No pressure there!

Or you might expect Kean would have some good yarns or funny anecdotes about growing up the son of a venerated politician, with a state trooper or two in the house all the time. Maybe that was . . . different?

Nope.

"They were as respectful as humanly possible," Kean says of the in-house cops. As for his treatment by peers in those days, no biggie. "Kids are kids. When I was in camp, I was in camp. When I was in school . . ." Kean went to Pingry, a private school in northern New Jersey. At Dartmouth, where he majored in history, he was considered a thoroughly decent and likable character who was not exactly a dynamo.

"I wouldn't say he's the most charismatic guy," says Tom Parker, the Psi Upsilon president the year Kean graduated and a friend who has helped with fundraising calls. "You don't meet him and say he's Ronald Reagan. But he's a straight, no-nonsense guy."

After graduation, Kean worked at the Environmental Protection Agency, where he met his wife, Rhonda. (The couple now have two daughters, ages 7 and 3.) He then went to work for Bob Franks, the Republican congressman in the district where Kean grew up, and later studied and taught foreign relations at the Fletcher School of Diplomacy at Tufts University.

"I was surprised when he said he wanted to get into politics," says Tom Kean Sr. on the phone, speaking in that Yankeefied accent he picked up attending boarding school and camp in New England. "He was more on the path of a scholar. I never encouraged my kids to get into politics at all. I sort of kept them away from it. I didn't take him to political events. I didn't move into the governor's mansion. I had a rule: no reporters in the house."

At the same time, Kean Jr. is one of those people who from an early age seem to have lived with a political future in mind. That's hardly a sin, and given that politics is the family business, hardly a surprise. But he doesn't quite buy it.

"I always knew that I would give back," he says. "My mother and my father both believe you have to work hard and give back. That's why I was a volunteer firefighter, that's why I worked in a homeless shelter. I always knew I'd give back, elective office or not."

For the moment, he is the principal beneficiary of his noblesse oblige. Last week, Kean announced that he had lent his campaign $400,000 -- money that will be used, among other things, to buy air time for his latest ads. One of those ads shows flickering video of Menendez projected on a concrete wall, as if it's cinema night at the local penitentiary. A voice-over accuses Menendez of helping mobsters and consorting with a cocaine trafficker and notes in bright bold letters that Menendez -- take a swig -- is under "federal criminal investigation."

Women's Vote Could Tip Close Contest (WP)

DOJ_NMG_0084985

By Lisa Rein

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

Their biographies exude machismo: James Webb, the Marine firing his M50 antitank rifles in the jungles of Vietnam, and George Allen, the tobacco-chewing cowboy who as governor once stirred GOP delegates with this line about Democrats: "Let's enjoy knocking their soft teeth down their whining throats."

But Webb, the former Navy secretary, and Allen, the first-term Republican senator, are trying to soften their tough-guy personas as they appeal to the 1.9 million women who represent more than half of Virginia voters. The candidates are virtually tied among likely female voters, a recent Washington Post poll shows.

Allen put his Democratic challenger on the defensive early in the campaign over a magazine article Webb penned 27 years ago that questioned a woman's place at the U.S. Naval Academy and on the battlefield. Webb, who led a Marine rifle platoon in Vietnam, has tried to convince Virginia women that his controversial words reflected a turbulent era, not personal hostility.

Webb has hesitated to address Allen's record on women. But in Allen's 23 years in politics, some votes and policies have dogged him. As governor in the 1990s, Allen said he would accept an invitation to a males-only country club but changed his mind amid criticism. He also opposed coeducation at the Virginia Military Institute. In Congress, he opposed federal legislation giving women unpaid leave after the birth of a child.

Both candidates say their positions have evolved. Webb says that he opened up doors to women as President Ronald Reagan's Navy secretary in the 1980s and that his policies in that era have had a lasting -- and positive -- effect on women's role in the military. Allen argues that when the courts ordered that women be admitted to VMI, he ensured that women were welcomed at the state institution. He also says his policies on crime, education and other issues appeal to women and families.

Whoever can move female voters onto his side may very well win the race, which recent polls show is virtually even. Successful Virginia Democrats, such as Gov. Timothy M. Kaine and his predecessor Mark R. Warner, have held leads among women heading into Election Day, according to preelection polling. Webb might have to win over more women than recent polls suggest he has if he is to win his challenge against Allen.

In a race in which traditional women's issues such as abortion have been largely absent, controversy has instead centered on Webb's past writing and Allen's past votes and policies. Webb is trying to convince voters that he's changed. Allen is arguing that his emphasis on family values appeals to Virginia women.

Records and interviews show that Webb did increase opportunities for women as Navy secretary, but some critics argue that he did so under pressure from superiors.

Webb's article, "Women Can't Fight," appeared in Washingtonian magazine in 1979, three years after women entered the Naval Academy. He questioned their place at an institution whose primary function was to train men as combat leaders. "By attempting to sexually sterilize the Naval Academy environment in the name of equality, this country has sterilized the whole process of combat leadership training, and our military forces are doomed to suffer the consequences," he wrote.

The article has haunted his career. Navy women in the late 1970s were limited to traditional career fields of nursing, administration and communication. Few shipboard assignments were open to them. They were fighting for credibility in nontraditional roles. And many said Webb's words subjected them to hostility.

"It was the talk of the Navy," recalled Linda Postenrieder, a retired surface warfare officer who graduated in the third class to include women at Annapolis. "Even guys who were supportive were asking us why were we there."

Postenrieder denounced the article at an Allen news conference last month and asked Webb to apologize. He did, and she now supports him.

Webb's defenders say his words should be seen in the context of a generation of Vietnam veterans who had endured grueling combat conditions.

"The environment he saw was not one women belonged in," recalled Leon "Bud" Edney, who was chief of naval personnel under Webb. Edney said Webb "had a deep, visceral feeling" that if a man saw a wounded woman, it would be "completely destabilizing."

DOJ_NMG_0084986

Edney was commandant of midshipmen at Annapolis after the release of "Women Can't Fight." He would not let Webb speak there because of the furor. Nevertheless, he said, "It's difficult to take someone's actions coming out of a failed war in Vietnam and fast-forward 27 years to say he is hostile to women."

Webb called the article an "overreach" and said he is now comfortable with the combat roles of Navy women, who today are restricted only from submarines and service as Navy Seals.

Shortly after he began his stint under Reagan, Webb assembled a task force to report on how to increase women's presence on ships. In part, the goal was to grow the pool of recruits: The Reagan administration was pursuing a buildup of its Navy fleet ships with an all-volunteer force. And women were hitting barriers to promotion and complaining of harassment.

"We tried to create fairness, and we did it in the right way," Webb said.

Under threat of a lawsuit, Webb ordered that female civilian technicians be allowed on submarines for short sea trials to test new equipment. Then a bombshell hit.

A panel of senior Pentagon advisers on the status of women in the military issued a damning report on Navy women in the Pacific. Women faced demands for sexual favors and commanders who ignored their complaints, and they were being denied promotions.

Webb responded by opening thousands of new assignments for women, many of them closer to combat, allowing them to serve aboard logistics and ammunition ships, oilers and other vessels, according to records and interviews with former Navy officials. Women also could serve on reconnaissance aircraft based ashore. Webb also required naval officers to receive expanded training on sexual harassment.

Webb has said he opened as many as 18,000 assignments for women, the largest number in Navy history. Reports on Navy operations from the late 1980s put the number at 9,000 to 10,000. "The bottom line is it's in the thousands," Webb spokeswoman Kristian Denny Todd said.

Webb stresses that the changes during his 11-month tenure in the late 1980s were his initiative. But officials who served with him recalled that the pressure on top Pentagon officials to improve women's status was enormous.

"Webb came along at a time when the currents were moving faster than the leadership," said David Baker, a Navy special assistant under Webb. "He had the sense to realize which way the wind was blowing."

Today, five women hold top positions on Webb's campaign staff. He recently picked up endorsements from six high-ranking retired female Army and Navy officers. His wife, Hong Le Webb, is an accomplished securities lawyer, and his ex-wife, Jo Ann Krukar, is active in his campaign.

The Allen-Webb race has barely touched on concerns that dominated Virginia politics in the past: abortion, gun control and pay equity. Today, Webb, a Republican-turned-Democrat who supports abortion rights, cites the growth of inequality, pressures on the middle class and his support for stem cell research. Allen, an abortion opponent, stresses national security and his leadership in guiding women to pursue careers in science and math.

Allen once expressed doubts similar to Webb's on women in the military, calling the government "nannies and pests" on a mission to destroy VMI. It was only when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled in 1996 that single-sex education discriminated against women that he changed his position. Allen aides say that even though he didn't want women at VMI, once the court ruled, he accepted them and worked to make the process of integration go smoothly.

As governor, he pushed successfully for student testing, the abolition of parole and one of the country's toughest welfare-to-work rules, policies his aides say were welcomed by many women. Teenagers were required in 1997 to notify their parents before having an abortion, a law that opened the door to a slew of restrictions by the General Assembly. In the Senate, Allen has opposed Plan B, the emergency contraception pill, for over-the-counter sales.

"He's a genuinely very pleasant guy who's got magnetism," said Karen Raschke, president of the Virginia League for Planned Parenthood and the group's lobbyist when Allen was governor. "But he did terrific damage to women in the commonwealth. . . . He seems to believe in a very activist involvement of the government on the side of one-half of the population."

As a congressman, Allen voted against the Family and Medical Leave Act, which gives workers 12 weeks of unpaid leave for the birth of a child or to care for a sick family member. He said the bill, signed into law by President Bill Clinton in 1993, was a burden on businesses.

These stands plagued Allen in his campaigns for governor and for Senate in 2000. But he fended them off. Loyalists say his record reflects the strong family values that matter to women in a traditional state. "Parental notification was a major piece of legislation that enjoyed large majority support," campaign manager Dick Wadhams said. He noted that welfare reform included a crackdown on absentee fathers to pay child support, a policy with appeal to women.

Women account for 14 of his 50 Senate staffers, payroll records show, although a majority answer mail and hold administrative jobs. Two women hold top jobs on his campaign staff. Betsy Beamer, Allen's former secretary of the commonwealth, explained, "It's not that he ever went out and said, 'Gosh, there are 10 people on this board, we've got to have this many women.' It was about getting the best one for the job."

Staff researchers Rena Kirsch, Meg Smith and Lucy Shackelford contributed to this report.

National Parties Roil Tennessee Race (WT)

By Brian Debose

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

NASHVILLE -- Both the Republican candidate, Bob Corker, and the Democratic candidate, Rep. Harold E. Ford Jr. complain that the national parties are slinging so much "mud" here that they can barely get their points across to voters.

The stakes are huge in Tennessee. Control of the U.S. Senate may hinge on the result here.

Mr. Corker, a former mayor of Chattanooga, asked the Republican National Committee (RNC) to take down an ad that first aired Friday accusing Mr. Ford of taking money from pornographers, and said it hinted at interracial dating -- the ending shows a scantily clad, white blonde winking and saying, "Hey, Harold call me."

"The new RNC ad we have just seen on our local broadcast outlets is tacky, over the top and is not reflective of the kind of campaign we are running," said Tom Ingram, Corker campaign chairman, adding that the campaign asked that a radio ad be pulled two weeks ago.

After viewing the ad, Mr. Ford lost his cool and confronted Mr. Corker, ambush style, just before a press conference at a Friday campaign stop at the Memphis airport. He got in Mr. Corker's face and asked him to stop talking about his family, then asked him to talk about Iraq.

"I really just wanted to ask him about this ad," Mr. Ford said.

Just days earlier, Mr. Corker was asked about other ads that had been aired.

"As you know, we can't talk directly with the [National Republican Senatorial Committee] or the RNC, so I don't know about 'em till I see them, but if we see an ad we don't like, we'll ask for it to be pulled," he said.

Not one of the polls that have come out this month shows either candidate gaining any momentum or building a solid lead. This campaign could be the most widely watched with reporters from Britain, South Korea and Canada following both men around the state.

Most voters and political analysts say that western Tennessee will heavily support Mr. Ford, while the eastern part of the state will go to Mr. Corker, leaving the battleground, where the attack ads are the heaviest, in the state's midlands around Nashville and to the south.

"This is where the battle is, right here. This is where the votes are," said Wendell C. Dawson, a lawyer in Nashville with the state Attorney General's Office, who said that he doesn't necessarily like Mr. Ford because "he's a little too far to the right for me and some of the stuff he says makes me wince."

"But I am like a lot of people in this state. I want change," Mr. Dawson said, adding that he hasn't had much chance to gauge Mr. Corker beyond "from the ads I've seen, he is toeing [President] Bush's line."

DOJ_NMG_0084988

Mr. Dawson represented a chorus of black voters here who are not that fond of Mr. Ford, but who will vote for him because he can bring change, not only change on Capitol Hill, but to the South, where no black person has won a popular election to the Senate.

The candidates couldn't be more different as people, as shown by their campaign styles.

Mr. Corker, a multimillionaire construction magnate who was state finance commissioner and Chattanooga mayor, arrives to speak to the state's 95 county sheriffs, in a black Chevrolet Tahoe with two staffers. He quietly surveys a room, shaking hands and talking with a few people before giving his speech, about how he moved to Tennessee at age 9 and graduated from the University of Tennessee before starting his business at 25 with $8,000 in savings.

He wants everyone to know he is not a professional politician, but a "down home" native shaped by other Tennesseans. Humble is an understatement for Mr. Corker, who concedes that he is "not the best looking, or the most articulate in this race."

Mr. Ford, 36, by contrast arrives in a white Tahoe with two staffers riding along, but it is preceded by two black sedans and followed by a huge red, white and blue bus with "Ford for Senate" etched across the side.

"Y'all are awake. You can be a little livelier than this," Mr. Ford said when he entered, pumping up the same room of county sheriffs to whom Mr. Corker spoke a day earlier.

He talks about moving with his parents to the District at age 9, where his father would serve 11 terms in the House. He went to high school in the District and to college at the University of Pennsylvania before heading to Michigan for law school. Mr. Ford's father retires and his son, 25, runs and wins in a shocking upset of his opponent, and he has been there ever since.

But as candidates for U.S. Senate, voters here wonder why or how two men of different races and backgrounds sound so similar on the issues.

"This is going to be one of the toughest decisions we have ever had to make," said Humphreys County Sheriff Chris Davis after hearing both men speak to the Tennessee Sheriffs' Association. "Both of these guys are effective at showing us their ideas, but we have a lot of research to do on their records and on how their ideas will work in our communities."

He wasn't convinced that either man is the right one, and the association is split. The group's president, Robertson County Sheriff Gene Bollinger, said he would support Mr. Ford because he liked his father. Another sheriff said he was supporting Mr. Corker because he liked what others lawmakers said about his work as finance commissioner 11 years ago.

Fight For Control Of State Capitals Heats Up (USAT)

By Kathy Kiely

USA Today, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — For the first time since 1994, Democrats are poised to surpass Republicans in the number of state capitals where one party enjoys complete political control — holding the governor's mansion and both chambers of the state legislature.

Having the political upper hand in state capitals has enabled Republicans to draw congressional districts that are more favorable to their party's candidates, notably in Texas and Georgia.

It has also helped the party develop strong candidates for higher office. According to the non-partisan National Conference of State Legislatures, 57% of members of Congress started out as state legislators.

Republicans hold the governorships and both chambers of the state legislatures in 12 states; Democrats, in eight. Republicans' control is in jeopardy in three of those states: Ohio, Alaska and Indiana.

Democrats face the possibility of losing dominance in only one state: Maine. Meanwhile, the party has a chance for control in eight other states: Arkansas, Colorado, Iowa, Maryland, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana and Tennessee.

In Arkansas, Maryland and Massachusetts, Democrats hold majorities in the state legislature and are hoping to take the governor's mansion. In other states, races for the state legislature will decide whether the one party can take control.

That has turned usually little-noticed races into heated contests.

The Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee hopes to spend $10 million on state House and Senate races this year, up from $7 million in the 2004 campaign cycle.

DOJ_NMG_0084989

The Republican State Leadership Committee, which also funds candidates for statewide offices other than governor, already has raised close to $13 million.

Groups from the National Rifle Association (NRA), which hopes to win backers for laws supporting gun owners, to the Human Rights Campaign, which hopes to win support for laws ending discrimination against gay men and lesbians, are working to elect state House and Senate candidates.

"It's no secret that state legislatures are more active than they have ever been," says Wayne LaPierre, NRA executive vice president and CEO.

Michael Davies, of the Democratic Legislative Campaign Committee, thinks the increased interest is in part due to the role states are taking in issues such as immigration, the minimum wage and embryonic stem cell research.

"More groups are seeing more issues decided in state legislatures," he says. "More groups are figuring out that if you do something in one state, it really does tend to have a bandwagon effect."

Republicans' Far North Hope (WSJ)

By Jim Carlton

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

ANCHORAGE, Alaska -- Sarah Palin is emerging as the giant-killer of the Last Frontier state.

The Republican candidate has defeated the sitting governor and is leading in polls against his predecessor, who is seeking a comeback. She is tapping into voter anger over corruption and dissatisfaction with incumbents -- factors working against fellow Republicans in much of the country this year.

Ms. Palin, a 42-year-old mother of four, trounced Gov. Frank Murkowski in the primary in August. On Nov. 7, she faces one of the state's best-known politicians, former two-term Democratic Gov. Tony Knowles. Ms. Palin leads by a margin of 47% to 40%, according to an Oct. 9 survey of likely voters by Rasmussen Reports, an independent pollster.

That is down from the 52%-to-38% margin she held in the same survey a month earlier, a drop pollsters attribute largely to loss of a postprimary bounce. But Ms. Palin's main campaign theme of taking a tough stance on ethics is clearly resonating with many voters.

Ms. Palin's only elected experience is six years as mayor of Wasilla, a fast-growing Anchorage suburb of about 8,500 residents. Ads for the 63-year-old Mr. Knowles call Ms. Palin an "untested former mayor of a small town." Ms. Palin says: "I think up here in Alaska, people are just tired of politics as usual."

Ms. Palin is one of the surprise bright spots for Republicans in what is shaping up as a bleak election year for the party. Scandal -- such as the handling of the Mark Foley page matter as well as allegations of corruption -- weighs on Republicans, and could cost them control of one or both houses of Congress. The party could also lose the Ohio governorship in part over guilty pleas by the retiring Republican involving ties to lobbyists. Republicans now hold 28 governorships, compared with Democrats' 22. Polls in various states suggest Democrats could take a majority in November. But Alaska -- a once-promising prospect for them -- may be slipping.

With about 660,000 residents, Alaska is one of the nation's most sparsely populated states, but its elections have national implications because of its abundant natural resources, such as oil and fish.

Beyond ethics, building a natural-gas pipeline is the biggest campaign issue for Ms. Palin and Mr. Knowles. An independent candidate, Andrew Halcro, is a distant third in the polls.

With oil reserves on Alaska's North Slope dwindling, many residents say their state's future lies in building another pipeline that can ship to the lower 48 states the natural gas in the oil fields. Federal officials estimate there may be as much as 100 trillion cubic feet of gas in the North Slope, enough to meet five years of the nation's natural-gas needs.

The industry didn't consider it economical to build a new Alaska gas pipeline to ship the gas thousands of miles to market -- until gas prices surged in the past few years. Now, state officials have made a pipeline contract a priority. "This is a boom-and-bust state, and this would give us the next big boom," says Carl Shepro, professor of political science at the University of Alaska in Anchorage.

Mr. Knowles and Ms. Palin both claim to be the voters' best choice to carry out the pipeline task. Mr. Knowles says his experience negotiating with the oil industry gives him an edge. Ms. Palin has tried to turn Mr. Knowles' experience against him, suggesting that he failed to negotiate a deal for a gas pipeline during his 1994-2002 tenure as governor. "It's time for a new generation," an ad for Ms. Palin says.

The current governor, Mr. Murkowski, also has made the gas pipeline a priority. But criticism of how he has gone about it -- and run his office in general -- partly explains Ms. Palin's popularity. The governor negotiated for the pipeline to be built by the three big oil producers in Alaska -- BP PLC, ConocoPhillips and Exxon Mobil Corp. -- as part of a deal that critics say was tilted too much in favor of the companies. The state legislature narrowly rejected the deal earlier this year, but over the summer, the legislature passed a bill backed by the governor to refigure oil-tax rates in a way that critics also say favored the industry.

The Federal Bureau of Investigation, meanwhile, is looking into allegations of industry influence-peddling of Alaskan lawmakers.

Both Ms. Palin and Mr. Knowles talk of reform in the state capital of Juneau. "We are going to run a squeaky clean government," Mr. Knowles said in an Anchorage news conference. Ms. Palin said in an interview: "I would push [the legislature] for a package of ethics reforms."

Ms. Palin has some credibility on the issue in the minds of many residents, having resigned in 2004 as head of the Alaska Oil and Gas Conservation Commission over ethical grounds. Among her concerns: That the governor had appointed Randy Ruedrich, chairman of the Alaska Republican Party, to a seat on her commission while Mr. Ruedrich got to keep his partisan post. Mr. Ruedrich ended up resigning from the body after Ms. Palin, among others, disclosed he was conducting Republican business in his state job. Mr. Ruedrich said he had, and agreed to pay a $12,000 state fine.

But Ms. Palin's decision to seek Mr. Murkowski's job has put her at odds with some heavyweights in her own party. After she defeated Mr. Murkowski by a margin of 51% to 19% in the Aug. 22 primary, she called on Mr. Ruedrich to resign as chairman of the state Republican Party. Mr. Ruedrich declined, but says he supports her anyway. "She is a solid Republican candidate," Mr. Ruedrich says.

Rising Star Obama Weighs White House Run (AP-Y)

AP, October 23, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama acknowledged Sunday he was considering a run for president in 2008, backing off previous statements that he would not do so.

The Illinois Democrat said he could no longer stand by the statements he made after his 2004 election and earlier this year that he would serve a full six-year term in Congress. He said he would not make a decision until after the Nov. 7 elections.

"That was how I was thinking at that time," said Obama, when asked on NBC's "Meet the Press" about his previous statements.

"Given the responses that I've been getting over the last several months, I have thought about the possibility" although not with the seriousness or depth required, he said. "My main focus right now is in the '06. ... After November 7, I'll sit down, I'll sit down and consider, and if at some point I change my mind, I will make a public announcement and everybody will be able to go at me."

Obama was largely unknown outside Illinois when he burst onto the national scene with a widely acclaimed address at the 2004 Democratic National Convention.

In recent weeks, his political stock has been rising as a potentially viable centrist candidate for president in 2008 after former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner announced earlier this month that he was bowing out of the race.

In a recent issue of Time magazine, Obama's face fills the cover next to the headline, "Why Barack Obama Could Be The Next President." He is currently on a tour promoting his latest book, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream."

On Sunday, Obama dismissed notions that he might not be ready to run for president because of his limited experience in national politics. He agreed the job requires a "certain soberness and seriousness" and "can't be something you pursue on the basis of vanity and ambition."

DOJ_NMG_0084991

"I'm not sure anyone is ready to be president before they're president," Obama said. "I trust the judgment of the American people.

"We have a long and rigorous process. Should I decide to run, if I ever did decide to run, I'll be confident that I'll be run through the paces pretty good," Obama said.

Illinois' Obama Revisits Idea Of 2008 Run For White House (USAT)

By Richard Wolf, Usa Today

USA Today, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON — Sen. Barack Obama, the Illinois Democrat who won instant celebrity after his keynote address to the 2004 Democratic national convention, said Sunday he might run for president in 2008.

"I don't want to be coy about this," Obama said on NBC's Meet the Press. "Given the responses that I've been getting over the last several months, I have thought about the possibility." After initially ruling it out, he said, the door has opened "a bit."

The 2008 presidential race is wide open, and Obama has been urged by many Democrats, such as fellow Illinois Sen. Dick Durbin, to run this time rather than wait to gain more political experience. He said Sunday he has listened to those entreaties.

His announcement follows a spate of publicity for the freshman senator, including a tour to promote his new book, The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream. His face was on the cover of the Oct. 23 Time magazine.

Obama's candidacy would shake up the field of prospective Democratic candidates, dominated by Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York and recently abandoned by former Virginia governor Mark Warner. By keeping the option open, he could freeze the flow of money to other Democrats.

"It hurts a lot of candidates not named Hillary Clinton," says Chuck Todd, editor of the National Journal's political newsletter, Hotline. "If he got in and she ran, there'd be no room for anybody else. There'd be no oxygen left in the room."

Despite his lack of national experience — he emerged from the Illinois state Senate in 2004 by beating a weak Republican candidate — Obama might never get a better chance to win the White House, some analysts say. His opportunity is likened to that of Colin Powell, who declined to run in 2000. "You can't create these moments," says Ronald Walters, a professor of government and politics at the University of Maryland. "They come, they're ripe, and you ought to take advantage of them."

Working in Obama's favor: He's telegenic and relatively young (45), and he has few enemies. In Congress, he has reached across the aisle to work with Republicans.

Rather than big government or small government, "my instinct is that the current generation is more interested in smart government," Obama said Sunday. "If the market solution works, let's go with the market solution. If a solution requires government intervention, let's do that."

Working against him could be his inexperience and the fact that the country has never elected a black president. Presidential scholars note a short résumé didn't hurt John Kennedy in 1960 or John Edwards in 2004. Kennedy won the White House; Edwards ran second in Democratic primaries and won a spot on the ticket.

"He would not be either the youngest or the most inexperienced person who has ever sought, or even won, the presidency," said Stephen Hess, professor of media and public affairs at George Washington University. "Lightning does strike in this game."

Obama Says He's Mulling A White House Run (LAT)

By Chuck Neubauer

The Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON -- Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois said Sunday that he was considering a run for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2008, backing away from previous pledges to serve out his full six-year Senate term.

Obama, 45, told NBC's "Meet the Press" that he would not make any decision before the Nov. 7 midterm election.

"I am still at the point where I have not made a decision to -- to pursue higher office," he said, "but it is true that I have thought about it over the last several months."

As a candidate for the Senate, Obama entered the national spotlight as the keynote speaker at the 2004 Democratic National Convention. He won the Senate seat that November with 70 percent of the vote.

DOJ_NMG_0084992

Twice before on "Meet the Press" -- soon after that election and again this past January -- Obama stated flatly that he would serve his full Senate term. On Sunday, he attributed his possible change of heart to "the responses that I've been getting over the last several months" while campaigning for Democratic candidates across the country.

"He is the most in-demand speaker in the Democratic Party," said David Axelrod, a Chicago-based media consultant who advised Obama's Senate campaign. "He gets 300 invitations a week."

Time magazine recently featured a photo of Obama on its cover with the headline "Why Barack Obama could be the next president." The senator is promoting his new book, "The Audacity of Hope: Thoughts on Reclaiming the American Dream."

He told NBC that although the door to a potential candidacy had opened "a bit," he had not yet thought about a White House bid "with the seriousness and depth that I think is required."

"My main focus right now is in '06 and making sure that we retake the Congress," he said. "After Nov. 7, I'll sit down and consider -- and if, at some point, I change my mind, I will make a public announcement and everybody will be able to go at me."

Asked about his lack of executive experience -- his only previous elective office was state senator in Illinois -- Obama said: "Well, I'm not sure anybody is ready to be president before they're president. You know, ultimately, I trust the judgment of the American people that in any election, they sort it through."

According to Axelrod, Obama has "concluded that he should at least look at this ... It is certainly something that is on his radar screen."

But he has not taken any steps to hire staff or begin raising money for a national campaign, Axelrod said. "There is no active campaign going on."

A second Democratic strategist, who asked to remain anonymous for professional reasons, said it "may be difficult" for Obama to translate his popularity into a White House run after only two years in the Senate. "My guess is that he will consider (2008) too early," the strategist said. "He has a lot more presidential campaigns in him."

Still, said Joe Trippi, a veteran Democratic consultant who managed Howard Dean's 2004 campaign, "the reception he is getting and the energy he is creating has got to encourage him to go."

Last month Obama was the main speaker at Sen. Tom Harkin's Iowa steak fry, an annual political event that attracts thousands of Democrats in a state that plays a key role in presidential politics.

"He took it by storm, like a rock star hit the place," said Trippi, who has been working in campaigns in Iowa since 1979. "You felt it. It was not just his speech. It was the way the crowd surged around him ... You couldn't move if he was in the area."

Trippi said Obama "certainly has the skill, the talent and the star quality" -- and if he decides to run, "it changes the whole dynamic of the race."

The current crop of potential contenders for the nomination include Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is widely considered the front-runner at this point; the 2004 nominee, Sen. John F. Kerry of Massachusetts, and his running mate, former Sen. John Edwards of North Carolina; Sens. Joseph R. Biden Jr. of Delaware, Russ Feingold of Wisconsin and Evan Bayh of Indiana, and Govs. Tom Vilsack of Iowa and Bill Richardson of New Mexico.

Obama Says He'll Consider A 2008 Bid For The Presidency (WP)

By Dan Balz

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) opened the door to a 2008 presidential campaign yesterday, saying he has begun to weigh a possible candidacy and will make a decision after the November elections.

"Given the responses that I've been getting over the last several months, I have thought about the possibility, but I have not thought about it with the seriousness and depth that I think is required," Obama said on NBC's "Meet the Press." "After November 7th, I'll sit down and consider it, and if at some point, I change my mind, I will make a public announcement and everybody will be able to go at me."

Until yesterday, Obama, one of the brightest stars in the party since he electrified the 2004 Democratic National Convention with his keynote address, had said he planned to serve out the full six years of his Senate term, which would have ruled out a presidential or vice presidential campaign in 2008.

But Democrats around the country have encouraged him to consider a campaign, and there has been fevered speculation inside the party about the possibility that he will do so. His own advisers have been forced to adjust timetables for a possible run in later elections and have begun to do the research that will help Obama make his decision.

New York Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton is considered the early front-runner for the Democratic nomination, should she decide to run, but some Democratic strategists said yesterday that Obama immediately would become one of her principal challengers, if he decides to run.

"If he runs and Mrs. Clinton runs, I don't think there's a lot of room for anyone else," said Steve Elmendorf, who was a top adviser to former House minority leader Richard A. Gephardt (D-Mo.). "The two of them take up an enormous amount of political space."

Party strategists said that, if voters are looking for change in 2008, Obama would symbolize it better than many of the other possible candidates. But having served just two years in the Senate and seven in the Illinois state Senate, Obama has a thin rÃ©sumÃ© upon which to build a presidential candidacy. He was asked yesterday on "Meet the Press" whether he was ready to be president.

"I'm not sure anybody is ready to be president before they're president," he told moderator Tim Russert. "You know, ultimately, I trust the judgment of the American people that in any election they sort it through. We have a long and a rigorous process and, you know, should I decide to run, if I ever did decide to run, I'm confident that I'd be run through the paces pretty good."

Obama's statement that he is thinking seriously about running in 2008 represents a frank acknowledgement of how the strong reception he has received around the country this year has altered his personal political trajectory, one that did not envision a campaign for national office this soon. But his advisers stressed yesterday that he has not yet decided to make such a bid.

At this point, Obama is a political phenomenon but hardly a tested politician on the national stage. He has captured the imagination of Democrats and others mostly through a combination of glamour and intellect. He has no legislative record to speak of, given the short time he has been in the Senate and the fact that Democrats are in the minority.

Obama, 45, was elected to the Senate in 2004, and even before winning that election he became a nationally recognized politician with his keynote address at the Democratic convention in Boston. He is now one of the party's most sought-after speakers, and he has drawn sizable crowds at party events and at appearances on behalf of Democratic candidates.

He is currently on a nationwide tour promoting his new book, "The Audacity of Hope." An earlier book became a national best-seller after his address in 2004. He also has appeared on the covers of Time magazine and GQ.

Yesterday, Obama said pursuit of the presidency cannot be based on celebrity and conceit. "It can't be something that you pursue on the basis of vanity and ambition," he said. "I think there's a certain soberness and seriousness required when you think about that office that is unique."

Obama advisers said yesterday that there has been little formal analysis done in preparation for a possible campaign, and they agreed they will now accelerate that work. But they said they are confident Obama could raise the money to run and noted that he has many offers from people interested in working in a campaign.

"He understands it's a lot easier when you're the subject of speculation than when you're in the arena battling it out," said David Axelrod, one of Obama's advisers. "I think that there's evaluative work to be done, but there are a lot of encouraging signs."

Obama spokesman Robert Gibbs cautioned reading too much into the senator's comments yesterday. "It was simply the honest answer to the question. There isn't a formal process. He announced he was thinking about it. He didn't announce he was announcing."

Another adviser said the Obama team has not done a state-by-state analysis of fundraising potential, nor have they begun building organizations in early states like Iowa and New Hampshire. Several advisers denied that they had conducted focus groups about an Obama candidacy, as some other Democrats have suggested.

Personal factors may influence Obama's decision as much as political considerations, his advisers said. He has a young family and may not want to put them and himself through the rigors of a long campaign.

DOJ_NMG_0084994

A large field of prospective candidates awaits Obama, if he decides to run. It includes Massachusetts Sen. John F. Kerry, former North Carolina senator John Edwards, Delaware Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Connecticut Sen. Christopher J. Dodd, Iowa Gov. Tom Vilsack, New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson and Wisconsin Sen. Russell Feingold. Some Democrats hope former vice president Al Gore will jump in.

Former Virginia governor Mark R. Warner announced this month that he will not run.

Crowd-Pleaser From Illinois Considers White House Run (NYT)

By Adam Nagourney And Jeff Zeleny

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON, Oct. 22 — Senator Barack Obama, the first-term Illinois Democrat who has emerged this year as one of the most popular figures in his party, said Sunday that he was considering a run for the White House in 2008, a shift in position that he said had come in response to many Democrats' pressing him to join the field.

"I don't want to be coy about this: given the responses that I've been getting over the last several months, I have thought about the possibility, but I have not thought about it with the seriousness and depth that I think is required," Mr. Obama said. "My main focus right now is in '06 and making sure that we retake the Congress. After Nov. 7, I'll sit down and consider it."

The remarks by Mr. Obama sent ripples through Democratic circles and were the latest indication of how wide open the 2008 presidential field is — and how confident Democrats are that they are on the ascendancy. Should he run, Democrats said, his decision would pose a major complication to Senator Hillary Rodham Clinton of New York, who is widely viewed as the dominant figure in the field of potential candidates.

Mr. Obama opposes the war in Iraq and thus could provide an alternative for Democrats who have expressed strong concern about Mrs. Clinton's support of the war effort. In addition, Mr. Obama, who is African-American, would almost surely cut deeply into Mrs. Clinton's own political base, black voters, which could be particularly significant because the Democratic Party has decided to move the South Carolina primary to the front of the 2008 presidential nominating process.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton, Howard Wolfson, declined comment on Mr. Obama's remarks on Sunday.

Mr. Obama made his remarks in an interview with Tim Russert on NBC's "Meet the Press" after being shown a videotape from an earlier appearance on the show in which he said he would serve out his six-year term in the Senate and not run for president before he had. Mr. Obama's aides said that, because they were familiar with Mr. Russert's interviewing techniques, they had expected him show the videotape, and that Mr. Obama was prepared to pivot off it to make his statement.

Mr. Obama, who has about four years left to serve in his first term, declined a request for an interview after his television appearance.

Until now, Mr. Obama and his associates have said that he would put off any run for the White House until after he had gained the experience in government that comes from six years in Washington. As it is, they said, if he ran for president he would have to overcome the questions about whether someone who had served just two years in the Senate, was 45 years old and had no experience in foreign policy was qualified to serve in the White House.

One of Mr. Obama's potential rivals, Senator John Kerry of Massachusetts, hinted at this potential problem when asked on "This Week" on ABC if he was prepared to run against Mr. Obama. "If he thinks he's ready to run for president and wants to run and I've made a decision to run, then we'll go out and have a great contest," Mr. Kerry said.

No major party has nominated an African-American — or, for that matter, a woman — to run for president, so a Democratic field that included Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Obama would be, at the least, historically notable. One Democratic strategist close to Mr. Obama who spoke on the condition of anonymity suggested that the senator would probably look to the results in Tennessee, where Representative Harold E. Ford Jr. is trying to become the state's first black senator, to measure the obstacles Mr. Obama might face in a national election.

Mr. Obama's colleagues said he intended to reach a decision by January.

In recent weeks, he has been the subject of high-profile and largely adulatory profiles in national magazines and newspapers and has packed halls across the country while campaigning for Democrats. For months, associates — notably Senator Richard J. Durbin, Democrat of Illinois — have urged him to seize the opportunity of the wide-open 2008 presidential race.

"Opportunities like this come along once in a political lifetime," Mr. Durbin said Sunday. "What is most intriguing about this is that he is just as welcome in red states as he is in blue states."

Mr. Obama's television appearance came as he embarked on a publicity campaign for his second book, "The Audacity of Hope." Although politicians have been known to suggest they might run for president as a way of spiking book sales, Mr. Obama's political adviser, David Axelrod, said that was not the case here.

"Absolutely not," he said. "The book is doing fine. We don't need to add any mustard to the hot dog."

Democrats suggested Sunday that Mr. Obama's open flirtation with a presidential race could have been designed to send a signal to major contributors, some of whom were recently left without a candidate when Mark Warner, a former Virginia governor, said he would not run.

Mr. Obama has already assembled a team of advisers with experience in presidential politics, including Mr. Axelrod, Anita Dunn, a longtime Democratic consultant, and Steve Hildebrand, who ran Al Gore's successful campaign in the 2000 Iowa caucuses.

Since taking office in January 2005, Mr. Obama has amassed a coast-to-coast list of Democratic contacts. This month alone, aides said, he is being scheduled to help Democratic candidates in 18 states.

Last month, Mr. Obama was the featured attraction of the biggest Democratic event of the year in Iowa, Senator Tom Harkin's steak fry. It was Mr. Obama's first trip to Iowa, which traditionally kicks off the presidential nominating contest.

Mr. Hildebrand said, "The reaction that Obama got in Iowa was like nothing I've ever seen before with another politician."

A Conversation With Sen. Obama (MCT)

By Margaret Talev

McClatchy Newspapers, October 23, 2006

WASHINGTON - A conversation with Sen. Barack Obama, whose book about his experiences on the campaign trail and as a freshman U.S. senator, "The Audacity of Hope" (Crown Publishers, $25), has just been released.

Q. Why did you decide to write this book? What is your writing routine?

A. I decided to write it partly on the heels of my (2004 Democratic National Convention) speech, which had gotten a good response. I thought it would be interesting to think about what I'd been saying in the campaign and subsequent to the campaign. Basically I didn't start writing until after I'd served about six months in the Senate because it was so overwhelming. I would typically work in the evenings after I got home from work or tucked my girls into bed, and on the weekends. I'm a night owl. I'd jot notes into my computer when I got home.

Q. How was writing this different from your first book? (A 1995 memoir, "Dreams From My Father: A Story of Race and Inheritance," which was reprinted in 2004.)

A. The first book was much more introspective. I was digging into sort of my past. It was more a book of self-discovery written by a young man. This book was more a rumination on the country and where we need to go.

Q. Do you use a ghostwriter?

A. No. I wrote it all myself.

Q. At what point will you decide whether to seek a spot on the 2008 presidential ticket?

A. I've said I'm not running. I haven't changed my mind. If I change my mind I'll let everybody know ... you don't run for vice president. ... I do think America is ready for a woman president or an African-American president or a Latino president if they are the best candidate.

Q. What will be the effect on Congress if Democrats recapture the House of Representatives or the Senate?

A. We would see greater oversight over the administration's actions. And I think we would start talking about the issues I hear most often on the campaign trail: health care, education and energy.

Q. Why did you pick legislation on government accountability, co-sponsored with one of the most conservative Republicans in Congress, Senator Tom Coburn of Oklahoma, as your first bill?

DOJ_NMG_0084996

A. There are all sorts of other bills I'd love to have passed (expanding college grants and health care) but when you're in the minority you have to be opportunistic and pass whatever bills you can get. Tom is the best kind of conservative because he's a sincere conservative. ... He's not just trying to score political points. We all have an interest in making sure our money is well spent.

Q. Which Republicans in Congress do you most respect and why?

A. Senate Foreign Relations Committee Chairman Dick Lugar (of Indiana). I think he's a model of bipartisanship when it comes to foreign policy. I think people like Senator George Voinovich (of Ohio) are sincere in their efforts to solve problems as opposed to scoring political points ... and Senator Tom Coburn.

Q. What's your greatest fear or self-doubt as a politician?

A. My greatest fear, I think, is that I lose track of that voice: who I am and what my values are and what I care most deeply about. Meeting ordinary Americans and listening to them goes a long way in terms of keeping me grounded, as do my wife and two kids.

Q. You write in your book about the guilt or self-doubt you have about being there enough as a husband and father. Do you feel this question is resolved for you or still in flux?

A. I don't think you ever resolve it entirely. This is a job that requires a lot of travel, and I miss my kids and I miss my wife all the time.

Q. What did you hope to get out of your Africa trip this summer?

A. To better inform myself about where we can make the most significant progress, both economically, in Africa and from a national security perspective.

Q. How long have you been a cigarette smoker? How much do you smoke and have you planned to quit?

A. I smoked for a long time and quit, and occasionally I lapse back into it. It's an ongoing struggle.

The Obama Bandwagon (NYT)

By Bob Herbert

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

Boston

The capacity crowd on a rainy night at the John F. Kennedy Library couldn't have been happier. The guest of honor had been born the same year that J.F.K. was inaugurated, and now he was generating the kind of political delirium we have tended to associate with the Kennedys.

I was the interviewer that night, and as I arrived in a cab outside the library, the driver said, "Who's on the program?" When I said, "Barack Obama," the driver replied, "Oh, our next president."

It's a measure of how starved the country is for a sensible, appealing, intelligent, trustworthy leader that a man who until just a couple of years ago was an obscure state senator in Illinois is now suddenly, in the view of an awful lot of voters, the person we should install in the White House.

At the Kennedy Library forum on Friday night, Mr. Obama declined to rule out a run for the White House in 2008. In an appearance on "Meet the Press" yesterday, he made it clear that he was considering such a run.

With all due respect to Senator Obama, this is disturbing. He may be capable of being a great president. Someday. But one quick look around at the state of the nation and the world tells us that we need to be more careful than we have been in selecting our leaders. There shouldn't be anything precipitous about the way we pick our presidents.

That said, the Barack Obama boom may well have legs. During the forum, every reference to the possibility of him running drew a roar from the audience. He's thoughtful, funny and charismatic. And there is not the slightest ripple of a doubt that he wants to run for president.

The reason he went into politics, he said, was to be able to influence events, to make a difference. "Obviously," he added, "the president has the most influence."

I asked what thoughts run through his mind when he thinks about himself and the presidency. He said: "That office is so different from any other office on the planet, you have to understand that if you seek that office you have to be prepared to give your life to it. How I think about it is that you don't make that decision unless you are prepared to make that sacrifice, that trade-off.

"What's difficult and important for somebody like myself, who has a wonderful, forbearing wife and two gorgeous young children, is that they end up having to make some of those sacrifices with you. And that's a profound decision that we won't make lightly."

I asked if he could imagine himself, at some point, making the kind of commitment he described. He said that he could, and the crowd erupted.

I asked if he might run in 2008. He said he was focused on the coming Congressional elections.

"So you have not ruled it out," I said.

"We'll leave it there," he said.

The giddiness surrounding the Obama phenomenon seems to be an old-fashioned mixture of fun, excitement and a great deal of hope. His smile is electric, and when he laughs people tend to laugh with him. He's the kind of politician who makes people feel good.

But the giddiness is crying out for a reality check. There's a reason why so many Republicans are saying nice things about Mr. Obama, and urging him to run. They would like nothing more than for the Democrats to nominate a candidate in 2008 who has a very slender résumé, very little experience in national politics, hardly any in foreign policy — and who also happens to be black.

The Republicans may be in deep trouble, but they believe they could pretty easily put together a ticket that would chew up Barack Obama in 2008.

My feeling is that Senator Obama may well be the real deal. If I were advising him, I would tell him not to move too fast. With a few more years in the Senate, possibly with a powerful committee chairmanship if the Democrats take control, he could build a formidable record and develop the kind of toughness and savvy that are essential in the ugly and brutal combat of a presidential campaign.

After the interview at the Kennedy Library, hundreds of people lined up to have copies of Mr. Obama's book, "The Audacity of Hope," autographed. He signed as many as he could. Then he shook hands with everyone who remained and assured them that he would have their books delivered to his hotel, where he would sign them later that night.

He's 45. There's no hurry. He should take all the time he needs.

October 22, 2006, 3:53 pm Rice Asian Talk Promised

Fresh back from Japan, South Korea, China and Russia, Secretary of State Rice plans to flesh out — and defend — the administration's Asia policy in a speech Wednesday at the Heritage Foundation. Her aides say the address will be a "reflective" look at the administration approach on North Korea just after the country rattled the region by testing a nuclear bomb.

During her trip, Ms. Rice tried to rally countries to act on the new U.N. sanctions to squeeze North Korea. But she also touted as a real success of U.S. policy the fact that China stepped up to play a critical role in supporting the sanctions. Asked in Beijing if she regretted not continuing Clinton's bilateral approach toward North Korea, Rice got steamed. "China had to be part of this regime to deal with the North Korean problem," she said. And now, "China's at the center of it — not a bad couple of years' work."

Rice plans to be more measured in her Heritage speech, pointing to accomplishments in building a larger consensus to crackdown on Pyongyang but also to the need to build a new security architecture in Asia. The speech will express the US desire, in the wake of the nuclear test, to bulk up the APEC forum to make it more of a body for regional security talks. The big aim: bring China and Japan closer together while keeping Tokyo from pursuing its own nuke. –Neil King Jr.

October 22, 2006, 12:12 pm Looking Toward Election Day… 2008

Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, backing off a pledge to serve his full six-year term, said he's now considering a run for president in two years.

Obama

The freshman Democrat, largely unknown outside his state before he burst onto the national scene with a widely acclaimed speech at the 2004 Democratic convention, said on NBC's "Meet the Press" that while he is concentrating on helping his party's candidates win in this year's midterm elections, he's now open to a White House run in 2008.

"Given the response I've been getting the last several months, I have thought about the possibility" although not with any seriousness or depth, he said. "My focus is on '06. … After November 7, I'll sit down and consider it."

Asked if only two years in the Senate has prepared him to lead the nation, Obama said "I'm not sure anyone is ready to be president before they are president."

A more or less centrist Democrat, his political viability may have increased with fellow centrist and former Virginia Gov. Mark Warner's decision earlier this month to bow out of the race after months of spadework in New Hampshire, Iowa and other early primary states. – Winston Wood

Arizona Sen. John McCain may be out in front when it comes to supporting Republican candidates and laying a grassroots foundation for a potential presidential run in 2008, but he certainly has competition.

McCain

A pair of Republican governors — Mitt Romney of Massachusetts and George Pataki of New York — along with Majority Leader Bill Frist of Tennessee and Sen. Sam Brownback of Kansas are among the prominent Republican leaders crisscrossing the country, paying special attention to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and other states that kick off the primary season.

In the current election cycle, McCain's Straight Talk America PAC has given $1.2 million to state and federal candidates, followed closely by the $1 million donated by Romney's Commonwealth PAC. Frist's Volpac has contributed roughly $600,000 so far, while Pataki's 21st Century Freedom PAC has doled out more than $300,000.

About a month ago, Pataki's PAC opened offices in Iowa and New Hampshire, and the governor will visit both states, as well as South Carolina and Michigan, as part of a six-state tour starting later this month. Frist is focusing on Iowa and South Carolina amid his jaunts to his homestate of Tennessee. On Monday and Tuesday, he'll squeeze in a trip to New Hampshire and take part in a meet-the-candidates spaghetti dinner hosted by the state Republican Party.

Romney's PAC has given $1,000 checks to every Republican candidate running this year for state senate in New Hampshire, where he owns a vacation home. The PAC has also given more than $368,000 to candidates in Iowa, and Romney has traveled to Iowa and Michigan eight times this year, and he's visited New Hampshire and South Carolina six times apiece.

Former House Speaker Newt Gingrich will campaign with Republican Rep. Jim Nussle in Iowa in early November and visit New Hampshire later in the month. Former New York City Mayor Rudolph Giuliani was in New Hampshire recently supporting a citizen group working to ensure New Hampshire retains its position as the nation's first primary state, after Iowa's caucuses. – Christopher Conkey

Conservatism Doesn't Need God (USAT)

By Heather MacDonald

USA Today, October 23, 2006

"Talk about your faith!"

That was the nearly universal advice to Democratic politicians after the publicly pious George W. Bush vanquished the more religiously reticent John Kerry in the 2004 presidential election. The largest plurality of voters — 22% — had told exit pollsters that "moral values" (left undefined in the poll) were their most salient concern. Add to this enigmatic survey finding the fact that 11 states passed amendments banning gay marriage, and the result, according to gleeful Republican pundits and not a few Democratic consultants, was the exposure of a Democratic God gap.

Ever since then, Democrats have been trying to show that they, too, have God in their hearts and in their caucus rooms.

Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., has declared herself a "praying person." "I was lucky enough to be raised in a praying family, and learned to say my prayers as a very young child," she said at a benefit in Boston last year. The House's Democratic Faith Working Group, created in 2005, provides "members of strong and authentic faith" an organizing venue. The lengthy "My Faith as My Guide" section of Rep. Harold Ford's campaign website discloses that Tennessee's Democratic senatorial candidate went into politics to put his "faith and beliefs into action." Other Democratic hopefuls have testified to their religion as November draws near.

This surge of mediagenic piety is discouraging to one of the least heralded segments of the political spectrum: secular conservatives. The conservative movement has supposedly benefited from politicians who publicize their relationship to God. Non-believing conservatives, however, see this electoral gain as a Pyrrhic victory. Conservative principles, they say, are best grounded in reason and evidence, not revelation. The infusion of God talk into both parties' campaign discourse adds nothing to the public's ability to vote wisely.

What are we supposed to learn when a candidate talks about his faith: That he is a good person? The rich history of religious bounders and charlatans should give the lie to that hope. Nor has a sincere belief in God prevented behavior we now view as morally repugnant. There were few more religious Americans than antebellum slaveholders and their political representatives; their claim to a divine mandate for slavery was based in unimpeachable Scriptural authority.

Or perhaps a politician's discussion of his prayer habits should reassure the public he'll make the right decisions in office. But what if opposing candidates declare themselves supplicants of the divine will — how will a voter decide who is most likely to receive divine guidance?

If Connecticut senatorial candidate and Iraq war opponent Ned Lamont, say, were to invoke God's plan for humanity to justify withdrawing from Iraq, the Democrat would convince none of the war's supporters, who would be certain that he had misunderstood his divine prompter. Who would determine whether he had? Moreover, monumental decisions such as whether to enter or terminate a war should rest on reasons accessible to believer and non-believer alike.

President Bush says his belief that "God wants everybody to be free" informs his foreign policy. This declaration is disquieting, for it means that the president's war-making decisions are not wholly amenable to worldly evidence. Even if the Iraq adventure were to appear to human minds as patently counterproductive, reversing course would violate a higher mandate.

For the past six years, Republican pundits have declared that religious faith is what makes Republicans superior to Democrats. Secular conservatives beg to differ. It is a proven track record that makes conservative principles superior to liberalism, not the religious inclinations of their proponents.

Conservative atheists and agnostics vigorously support the two-parent family because the life chances of children raised by both their biological parents are demonstrably superior to children raised by single mothers. Moreover, when marriage disappears as a community norm, so do civilizing constraints on male behavior. It doesn't take Bible study to see this. Conservatives do not need God to prove the value of marriage; the sad state of the inner city is testament enough.

Likewise, secular conservatives look to the world as we know it to ground their support for the free market and the principles of limited government. Recent history alone shows that governments have little capacity to run an economy, produce widespread prosperity, or take over the functions of the family. The Founders crafted America's constitutional framework based on their knowledge of human nature and their commitment to Enlightenment ideals. They left God out of the Constitution. This omission horrified many of the drafters' contemporaries, who predicted that divine vengeance would follow. The Founders' faith in secularism proved wiser.

In the personal sphere, conservative atheists and agnostics lead lives as ethical as those of any believer. The Golden Rule and innate human empathy provide ample guidance for moral behavior. Indeed, it is doubtful that the fear of hell dissuades many people from, say, running a red light at 3 a.m.; rather, the innate appreciation for the fragility of the social order keeps the solitary driver waiting for the light to turn green.

Most educated people instinctively understand that a law-abiding society can easily slide into anarchy without widespread obedience to the law. The greatest conservative triumph of late 20th century America — New York City's return to civility — was achieved by appeal to secular values alone.Mayor Rudy Giuliani spoke relentlessly about the need for personal responsibility and respect for social order; he based his policies on principles that non-believers and believers alike could test against their own experience.

Invoking God in the political realm is a conversation stopper, not an invitation to robust debate. America's rules of religious etiquette demand that we acquiesce silently in a believer's claim of revelation. But conservatism doesn't need such revelation; common sense and an openness to fact will do just fine as support. Conservative principles are available to people of all faiths or no faith at all.

Reason And Faith At Harvard (WP)

By John I. Jenkins And Thomas Burish

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

What should a properly educated college graduate of the early 21st century know?

A Harvard curriculum committee proposed an answer to that question this month, stating that, among other things, such a graduate should know "the role of religion in contemporary, historical, or future events -- personal, cultural, national, or international."

To that end, the committee recommended that every Harvard student be required, as part of his or her general education, to take one course in an area that the committee styled "Reason and Faith."

Whether that becomes policy remains to be seen, but the significance of the recommendation should not be understated. Harvard is the drum major of American higher education: Where it leads, others follow. And if Harvard says taking a course in religion is necessary to be an educated person, it's a good bet that many other colleges and universities will soon make the same discovery. We hope they will.

The Harvard committee rightly noted that students coming to college today struggle with an academy that is "profoundly secular." This was not always the case, at Harvard or at many other universities. For centuries scholars, scientists and artists agreed that convictions of faith were wholly compatible with the highest levels of reasoning, inquiry and creativity. But in recent centuries this assumption had been challenged and assertions of faith marginalized in, and even banished from, academic departments and university curricula. Requiring courses in "Reason and Faith" would be a welcome step toward reintroducing faith to the academy.

What should be the content of such courses? The Harvard committee hastens to explain that its proposal is not for "religious apologetics." Rather, the courses it envisions would offer an examination of "the interplay between religion and various aspects of national and/or international culture and society." They would deal not so much with the relationship between reason and faith as with reasoning about faith, religion and religious institutions and their impact in the world.

Such courses are unquestionably needed. We are in an era in which misunderstanding, conflict and turbulence characterize our interaction with the Islamic world. Debates continue about the teaching of evolution. And religious beliefs play an important role in disputes over stem cell research, abortion, euthanasia and same-sex marriage.

At the same time, religious communities in this country are important centers for personal and communal religious growth as well as for strengthening social cohesion and civic culture and for providing a variety of community services, particularly to the needy. Today's students must understand religious beliefs and institutions if they are to meet the challenges and seize the opportunities the future will present.

But universities can do more than just familiarize students with the world's religions in survey-course fashion. The rise of religious fanaticism stems in part from a failure of intellectuals within various religious traditions to engage the faithful of their traditions in serious and reasoned reflection, inquiry and dialogue. The marginalization of faith within universities contributes to this failure.

A recent survey by UCLA's Higher Education Research Institute found that 79 percent of college freshmen believe in God, and 69 percent pray and find strength, support and guidance in their religious beliefs. Religion will remain a powerful force in the personal lives of these students long after they graduate. If faith is shunned by the institutions whose role it is to foster reason and the life of the mind, if universities do not equip students to integrate their faith with the knowledge and reasoning skills they acquire, we shouldn't be surprised if unreasonable or fanatical forces gain influence in communities of faith.

It's time for universities to explore the reasoning that is possible within a tradition of faith, and to help their students appreciate this possibility and the rich resources in great religious traditions. Such efforts would enhance the ability of those with faith to engage in thoughtful, reasoned and self-critical spiritual reflection.

At the University of Notre Dame and other academically rigorous religious colleges and universities, we strive to make room for such scholarly inquiry and discussion. We work to create classes that will convey the intellectual riches of a religious tradition and help students engage in reasoned reflection from within the perspective of faith.

This approach, too, has legitimacy within a core curriculum. Indeed, educating students on the reasoning inherent in particular faiths is critical if we want students to be able to understand and engage their own and other religious traditions in meaningful ways.

We hope that the report of Harvard's curriculum committee signals a more welcome atmosphere within the academic community for serious consideration of and engagement with issues of faith, religion and religious institutions. Our even greater hope is that some universities will join us in promoting a dialogue that truly explores the relationship between faith and reason.

The Rev. John I. Jenkins is president of the University of Notre Dame. Thomas Burish is the university's provost.

Biggest Charities Saw Giving Rise By 13% Last Year (WSJ)

By Sally Beatty

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

America's largest charities saw a surge in donations in 2005, as a strong economy and a string of major disasters boosted cash and in-kind gifts 13% to $62.7 billion, according to an annual survey of 400 charities.

The jump marked one of the largest percentage gains since the Chronicle of Philanthropy began the survey 16 years ago. The biggest increase came in 1999, when wealth fueled by the technology boom helped charities notch a 13.4% gain in donations, the publication says.

Donations to aid victims of the Asian tsunami in late December 2004 and Hurricane Katrina, which struck in August 2005, totaled $2.6 billion for the 400 charities surveyed. But even organizations not involved in disaster relief reported a healthy rise in donations. Excluding disaster-relief funds, giving rose 8.3%, after adjusting for inflation, the survey found.

Major gifts also lifted donations. The Salvation Army, for example, registered a more than doubling in giving to nearly $3.6 billion, largely reflecting the partial payment of a $1.5 billion gift made public in January 2004 from the late Joan Kroc, the widow of McDonald's Corp. founder Ray Kroc.

One of the nation's largest charities, the United Way, saw donations to it and its roughly 1,300 chapters rise 3.9% to $4.04 billion. Rick Belous, United Way's vice president of research, said the gain reflected rising donor interest in health and human services generally. The American Red Cross saw a more than doubling of donations to $1.28 billion, which it said was mostly a result of tsunami relief efforts. (Red Cross 2005 numbers are for the 12 months ended June 30, 2005; Katrina hit two months later.)

Not all charities had a good year in 2005, however. Feed the Children saw a 9.5% decline in donations to $803 million. Feed the Children President Larry Jones said the decrease reflected bankruptcies of two major food suppliers and a setback in plans to secure medical supplies.

My Father, My President:

A Personal Account of the Life of George H.W. Bush

DOJ_NMG_0085002

By Doro Bush Koch

Warner Books, 586 pp. $29.99

George H.W. Bush has long said that he will never write a personal memoir but will instead let history speak for itself. He never promised his family would sit tight.

It may be that the next best thing to hearing from Bush is reading his story through the eyes of his sixth child and only surviving daughter, Doro Bush Koch. At her father's request, Koch, 47, pulled together a warm and, not surprisingly, favorable look at Bush's eventful life, as relayed to her by many of his friends and political associates, his diaries and letters, and conversations with Dad.

Indisputably told through the lens of an adoring daughter, "My Father, My President" breaks no new ground and presents no neutral judgments. But it does offer an intimate look into one of America's political dynasties, and subtly conveys the hope of an 82-year-old man to have some say in how the story is told -- even if he doesn't want to tell it himself.

For instance, Koch gives her father plenty of space to distance himself from the Watergate scandal, which he weathered from the unenviable perch of chairman of the Republican National Committee. As the government was unraveling around him, Bush -- ever loyal -- said nothing about President Richard M. Nixon publicly but found plenty to share with his family, and his diary, thoughts first published in this book.

"The gloom in the White House is unimaginable, difficult to describe," he wrote in 1974. "It is brought dramatically home that this president is a liar, a total liar and we cannot face up to it in fairness, in the nation's interest, in any other way. . . . "

Bush admits to his daughter: "I always felt Nixon thought I wasn't tough enough. I lacked the kind of bull-doze-'em approach that some of his lieutenants had. Nixon liked the tough guy. . . . "

Koch cast a wide net in researching the book, writing hundreds of letters to her father's friends and political adversaries, as well as to world leaders, asking for impressions and anecdotes. The book takes on the feel of an oral history when she prints long portions of interviews or e-mails about specific events. She also relies on thoughtful correspondences from her father to family members and friends that confirm what many already know about Bush: that he is a decent, gracious and sentimental man.

It is refreshing to learn that despite the power and the pedigree, the Bush clan faced the same comic mishaps of any other large family -- and didn't always do everything according to Emily Post. When Jeb Bush insisted on marrying his 19-year-old girlfriend in 1974, brother Marvin-- an amateur photographer -- offered to take the official pictures to save money. The high school student, who rolled his own film spools, discovered in the darkroom that he had shot the wedding over images of a Frank Zappa concert. "Every single photo of the Bush and Garnica families had either a photo of Frank Zappa and/or members of . . . the Mothers of Invention, superimposed onto their own images," Marvin recalls. Koch further tells us that her dad did not meet Jeb's fiancee (now wife), Columba, until the rehearsal dinner.

On a painful note, Koch looks at how her parents coped with the death of their firstborn daughter, Robin, who died before Koch was born. The Bushes have never liked to talk about Robin's death from leukemia, but Koch captures the devastation through others who witnessed it. One friend from Midland, Tex., recalled to Koch how Bush continued to teach Sunday school as his daughter was failing and how often "he arrived disheveled and unshaven, to teach his class."

"Having no time to prepare the lesson, he would share with these young people his feelings on life, death, war, faith, hope, and despair."

Koch tries to explain her family's distrust of the media, and how, despite a lifetime in the public eye, they often felt under siege.

She examines a damaging story from 1992 -- "the worst political year" of Bush's life -- when the New York Times reported that the president didn't understand how a basic grocery store scanner worked, which Bush has long refuted. "The trouble is, it gets stuck in the computer, and it's still there today," he tells Koch. "It's just manufactured news -- fake history -- but there's no question that it hurt me a lot."

She describes a scene of hurt and turmoil in the family when Newsweek published its infamous cover in 1987 referring to Bush as a "wimp." She says they all felt stunningly betrayed because they had cooperated with the magazine and the reporter.

While Bush's live shouting match with Dan Rather on the "CBS Evening News" has not gone underreported, Koch offers a new, colorful version of the story as told by Roger Ailes, then Bush's media adviser, who was in the room for the interview. At one point, Ailes relates that he could see the vice president was reluctant to hit back at Rather as the anchor shouted at him over the Iran-Contra scandal. Ailes frantically held up a sign urging Bush to bring up one of Rather's more embarrassing career moments -- when he had walked off the broadcast leaving dead airtime. Bush went for the jugular, which made for one of the best moments in TV news.

Koch brings up the rumor that Bush had an affair with a longtime aide -- which he always denied. She interviewed Bush's 1988 Democratic opponent, Michael S. Dukakis, on why he fired then-aide Donna Brazille after she talked about the rumor publicly. "To hell with all that. I just said 'Look, we're not going to have any part of that,' " the former Massachusetts governor told Koch. "When you decide you're going into this business, you've got to decide who you are. . . . If folks get out of line, you can't accept that."

Koch doesn't offer any new insights into the 2000 electoral drama between her brother, George W. Bush, and Al Gore. But she reveals one hilarious story about joining protesters in front of the vice president's mansion, disguising herself in dark glasses and scarf. She said her ex-husband met her at the site where she was "standing in the freezing cold, yelling very creative and very adult chants such as 'Get Out of Cheney's House!' and 'Sore Loserman!' "

In the end, Koch cannot help but give us an extra line of sight on history because she lived it. She offers up the book her father will probably never write. But now at least, we know what he might have said.

Ohio's Bad Proposition (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

Ohio's unemployment rate is more than a full percentage point above the national average at 5.7%, and the state has recorded a net job loss of 150,000 since 2001. So you might think the last thing any responsible public official would promote is an increase in the cost of doing business there. Well, think again.

Democratic Representative Ted Strickland, who's running for Governor, is backing a ballot initiative known as Issue 2 that would amend the state constitution to raise the minimum hourly wage to $6.85 from $5.15. It also mandates annual minimum-wage increases based on inflation and contains other sneaky provisions designed to aid union organizing.

The Cleveland Plain Dealer reports that in recent years, "nearly all of the state's job growth has been in lower-paying service jobs," which tend to be the first to go when the minimum wage is increased. Mr. Strickland, whose Appalachia district in eastern Ohio boasts one of the highest jobless rates in the nation, has decided to side with Big Labor over his constituents.

Issue 2 was initiated by the AFL-CIO and national anti-business activist groups like Acorn. It is polling well and expected to pass. Proponents appear to have convinced enough Buckeye State voters that such laws lift low-wage earners out of poverty, though study after study has shown that minimum-wage mandates reduce employment prospects, particularly for younger, less-experienced and less-skilled workers.

But voters should also know that Issue 2 is about a lot more than a higher minimum wage. It's also a Trojan horse for other items on Big Labor's wish list that will only make Ohio's business climate less attractive. For example, the proposal imposes onerous and expensive record-keeping requirements on employers and says, "Such information shall be provided without charge to an employee or person acting on behalf of an employee upon request."

Nowhere is it specified who's permitted to act on behalf of an employee, which is an open invitation to union officials to search personnel records to facilitate organizing. The same goes for disgruntled employees and others who would be permitted to run up compliance costs with repeated, frivolous requests. Issue 2 also stipulates that someone "acting on behalf of one or more employees and/or any other interested party may file a complaint with the state for a violation of any provision of this section or any law or regulation implementing its provisions." Such language is music to the ears of class-action attorneys.

Voters in five other states -- Arizona, Colorado, Missouri, Nevada, Montana -- will also decide on a minimum wage referendum in November. And it's no coincidence that nearly every one of these states features a competitive Congressional or gubernatorial race.

"Labor calls it their gay marriage amendment," says Michael Flynn of the Washington, D.C.-based Employment Policies Institute. "They believe it will turn out progressive voters." Maybe so. But it will also retard job creation, and that's something a state like Ohio can hardly afford.

For Connecticut's Governor (NYT)

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

Gov. M. Jodi Rell of Connecticut, a Republican, was a political unknown when she took office in 2004 after a corruption scandal forced her predecessor to resign. Within months, she became the most popular governor in the state's history. Part of the explanation was undoubtedly relief. But residents also responded to her personal warmth and her emphasis on high ethical standards. She brought together reluctant members of both parties to pass a campaign finance law.

Now Governor Rell is running for election against Mayor John DeStefano of New Haven, a Democrat. Both Mrs. Rell and Mr. DeStefano are good candidates. But they have real differences.

Mrs. Rell has shown a good sense of priorities. She put billions of dollars into transportation, a pressing but long-ignored need. She put money into pilot programs to provide preschool to poor children and promises to expand them. She has kept state bonding in check and used a large budget surplus this year to reduce pension liabilities and state debt.

Mr. DeStefano, the underdog, has encouraged a real discussion of the state's many problems. He wants to provide health coverage for the uninsured by closing corporate tax loopholes, a priority for the leaders of the Democratic-controlled Legislature. He's talked about a windfall profits tax on energy and about lowering residential property taxes. These are good ideas. Voters will also undoubtedly notice that some of them are unnervingly expensive.

The biggest concern about Mr. DeStefano's candidacy is something that he has no control over — the enormous political imbalance created by the decline of the Connecticut Republican Party. If he is elected, Connecticut will have, in effect, one-party rule; the Democrats are two votes shy of a veto-proof majority in the Legislature.

It strikes us that Connecticut would be better off with a moderate Republican governor now. And Mrs. Rell has clinched the sale in her short time in office by showing the potential to be a great governor as well as a popular one. Her record has a few flaws. Mrs. Rell, for all her emphasis on high standards, adopted a see-no-evil approach to a lapse in ethics of her chief of staff. Her election campaign has been lackluster. She hasn't wanted to risk her lead by debating the big issues, and she hasn't appointed enough of her own people to top jobs.

When Mrs. Rell decides an issue is worth fighting for, like campaign finance reform, she's impressive. But so far her vision has been too modest. It would be a real tragedy if Mrs. Rell wasted her popularity by just tinkering with the state's big problems. She should not squander the opportunity to aim high. With that admonition, we endorse her for governor of Connecticut.

California's Bottomless Tax Well (WSJ)

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

California already ranks as one of America's five most taxing states, but if liberal activists have their way the Golden State will soon be competing for Number One. Having voted to raise the top income tax rate on the rich two years ago, Californians are this year being confronted with a slate of new ballot propositions to raise levies on motorists, smokers and property owners.

The jewel in this liberal crown is Proposition 87, which would raise taxes on oil extracted from California by 1.5% to 6%, depending on the price per barrel -- all in the name of reducing energy consumption and dependency on foreign oil. Let us run that by you again: The idea here is to tax California oil in order to get Californians to use less Saudi oil. Brilliant.

If approved, the law would raise costs on California's oil producers by as much as $4 billion over the next 10 years. California would overnight become the state with the highest tax on oil producers in the U.S. -- which makes as much sense as Vermont levying the highest tax on maple syrup. Not one penny, by the way, would go to close Sacramento's enormous government debt burden -- which may rise by another $40 billion if the multitude of bond initiatives for new public spending are also approved by voters this November.

Instead, the revenue would finance a new state agency, the Energy Alternatives Program Authority. The new energy authority would be responsible for passing out multi-million dollar checks to projects researching alternative energy. If you think corporate welfare is out of control in Washington, wait until Sacramento politicians start passing out these billions in subsidies.

A Law and Economic Consulting Group (LECG) analysis concludes the bill would in fact increase dependency on foreign oil because the tax increases the price only on domestic oil. Meanwhile, to make it seem as if the tax will be paid by "greedy" energy companies rather than voters, Proposition 87 would make it illegal for producers to pass on the tax costs to consumers.

But wait. The "Yes on 87" lobby also claims that the law would reduce California oil consumption by 25%. How does a law that doesn't allow the retail price to rise reduce gasoline consumption? These are logical niceties that no one much cares about when fads are in season -- and taxing energy is the biggest fad of them all these days.

Former President Bill Clinton is starring in a pro-87 TV ad that began running last week. Al Gore is raising money for the initiative, alongside Hollywood economists Geena Davis and Julia Roberts. Its main financial supporter is Hollywood producer Stephen Bing, who is also rich enough not to care about any increase in energy prices; his $40 million contribution is believed to be the largest individual donation to a ballot initiative in history. One co-chairman of the initiative, Vinod Khosla, a venture capitalist, has contributed $1 million to the campaign. Mr. Khosla happens to own an ethanol plant outside of Fresno -- just the operation that, who knows, might be eligible for funding from this new energy welfare fund.

The biggest impact of Proposition 87 would be to make California oil relatively more expensive to produce than Saudi, or Venezuelan, or Canadian oil. So if 87 passes, Californians will be approving the equivalent of a tariff on their own oil. So the tax would actually make America slightly more, not less, dependent on foreign oil. This is an energy plan that only Venezuelan strongman Hugo Chavez could love.

Puerto Rico, An Island In Distress (NYT)

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

After decades of economic progress, Puerto Rico is struggling, and the mainland has both missed this horrific economic slide and contributed to it through benign neglect.

Poverty on the island is rampant. The per capita income is just about half that of the poorest state in the United States. Nearly one-third of the population was unemployed in 2000. And a good quarter of all employment is in government jobs. If the goal is more than survival, the bloated public payroll will need to be significantly pared back.

The bleak picture is set out in a long-overdue, exhaustive study — "The Economy of Puerto Rico: Restoring Growth" — from the Center for the New Economy, a nonpartisan Puerto Rican research group, and the Brookings Institution.

Much of the blame can be put on Washington, which has been tone deaf to the island's needs and has miscalculated where help was needed. Even a good idea, like the Section 936 program of tax incentives, was mismanaged. Before it was phased out last year, it had succeeded in bringing many pharmaceutical concerns to the island, but produced relatively few jobs and at so high a cost that a $40,000 position cost the government $70,000.

The study is spurring a debate over welfare and other social programs. Some of the economists' prescriptions are harsh, including curtailment of food stamps. But part of the mission seems to be shock therapy. That may work and might even help to get policy makers on the search for solutions. The key to the island's future will be charting a direction that includes capitalizing on the island's open economy to create jobs for home-grown talent.

North Korea: Help From Beijing (NSWK)

By John Barry

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Beijing may have saved President Bush from a tough decision: whether to order a pre-emptive strike against North Korea's main missile-launch facility. In the wake of Kim Jong Il's nuclear test, the White House was alarmed at the prospect that Kim was planning to explode a second nuclear device while also firing off a second test flight of North Korea's Taepodong-2 missile. The first T-2 test fizzled in July. U.S. analysts, calculating from satellite pix of the T-2 on its launchpad then, reckon its stages are big enough to carry the fuel for intercontinental range: it could theoretically hit the West Coast. So successful tests of both North Korea's nuke and its ICBM would raise real fears that Pyongyang could directly threaten the United States—which would generate unstoppable political pressure for decisive U.S. action. To forestall this, one option under urgent debate inside the administration (according to senior officials, anonymous because of the sensitive situation) was a pre-emptive strike to destroy the next T-2 on its launchpad.

Meanwhile, Beijing was so angered by Kim's test—which China had publicly warned against—that it sent top national-security official Tang Jiaxuan to Pyongyang. The senior officials say Beijing threatened to cut off fuel and food supplies. How did Kim respond? Japan's Foreign Minister Taro Aso said: "Though it is not confirmed, we have obtained information that [Kim] told Mr. Tang the country won't conduct a second nuclear test." Diplomatic sources (anonymous due to the sensitive subject) say they believe Kim's pledge covers missile tests, too. But Condoleezza Rice, after her "thorough" briefing in Beijing, indicated Kim was far from conciliatory. Tang, though, seemed to feel he'd made some gain. Kim refused to see him after July's test. Last week, Tang commented: "Fortunately, this time my visit has not been in vain."

Staring At North Korea (TIME)

By Simon Elegant

Time, October 23, 2006

At first glance, the cityÂ of Dandong seems a peaceful, bustling symbol of Chinese prosperity. Brightly dressed townspeople stroll along the tree-lined promenade near the Yalu River, teenagers mixing with office workers and young families, many of them fresh from nearby malls, shopping bags at their sides. As the light fades, neon signs illuminate the city's numerous hotels and karaoke bars. Smaller lights also begin to blink on in the rows of brand-new apartment buildings that line the riverbank for miles. Behind one of the buildings, a fountain of noise and color erupts as firecrackers and exploding rockets mark a wedding banquet.

Look a little closer, however, and it becomes evident why Dandong (pop. 2.4 million) is anything but a normal Chinese city--and why it's a crucial front in the world's struggle to contain a nuclear North Korea. A few hundred yards across the river lie the dilapidated low-rise buildings of the North Korean city of Sinuiju, many of which seem deserted, their window frames empty of glass, their doors agape. A few peasants dressed in blue jackets and trousers can be seen laboring in the fields in front of the town, but otherwise an eerie stillness pervades. As evening advances, only a few feeble lights come on in Sinuiju, and the town's forlorn structures are soon swallowed up by the darkness. Only the incongruous shape of a long-unused Ferris wheel is visible in the dying light.

The proximity of such desolation goes to the heart of China's quandary about how to deal with North Korea and its leader, Kim Jong Il. Dandong is the main crossing point on China's 880-mile border with North Korea, making it the most active hub for the $1.6 billion in annual trade between the two countries. That trade is critical to the survival of Kim's regime: some 90% of Pyongyang's daily oil supply and just under half its food imports come from China. Although the U.S. believes that tightening the financial squeeze on Pyongyang is necessary to persuade Kim to abandon his newly tested nuclear arsenal, Beijing fears that a cutoff in aid would bring about the collapse of the North's economy, touch off civil unrest and lead to an influx of millions of poor, hungry refugees on its borders. In response to Kim's test on Oct. 9, the U.N. Security Council demanded that North Korea eliminate all its nuclear weapons and other weapons of mass destruction, as well as ballistic missiles. The U.N. also authorized inspection of cargo to and from North Korea.

Making those sanctions meaningful depends on China. China said last week that the country's four main banks will cease handling transactions from North Korea. It also says it had increased inspections of goods passing from China to North Korea by land, although there will be no inspections of seaborne cargo. Chinese newspapers reported last week that authorities had closed all border crossings with North Korea except for the most heavily trafficked one, at Dandong.

And so if China really intends to exert pressure on Pyongyang, Dandong will be the place where the hammer will drop. But there's reason to doubt China's readiness to take further steps toward squeezing North Korea. One reason is self-interest. Trade with the North is vital to border cities like Dandong, which has registered double-digit growth in recent years, according to local government statistics. Much of that is due to its trade with North Korea, which has more than quadrupled since 1999. Others have benefited from doing business with the North: energy and fuels constitute the bulk of China's exports to the North, accounting for nearly $300 million last year. Significantly, food was the second largest product, at about $150 million, followed by electrical and other machinery and plastics.

The importance of the North Korean market to the Chinese helps to explain why officials have been relatively slow to enforce the U.N. sanctions. At Dandong's three-story customs compound, a plump, middle-aged man who calls himself Li and says he is a truck driver gestures toward the 15 or so vehicles waiting to be inspected before driving onto the bridge over the Yalu. "The inspections are a little stricter, but it's really just for show. They poke around a bit and then let you go."

What scares Beijing most about sanctions is less what they would mean to China's economy than what damage they could do to North Korea's. In the mid-1990s, North Korea suffered a severe famine that lasted for several years and left perhaps hundreds of thousands dead. Although increased trade and relatively good harvests in the past couple of years mean the current situation is fairly stable (Pyongyang doesn't publish reliable economic statistics, but most estimates put GDP growth in recent years in the 1%-to-2% range), the North remains dependent on outside food aid. According to the Brussels-based International Crisis Group, conditions could deteriorate quickly. A forthcoming report warns that "a perfect storm may be brewing for a return of the famine." The report notes that Pyongyang last year reintroduced the same public food-distribution system that had collapsed in the 1990s, and rejected assistance from international aid groups. Those problems have been further exacerbated by summer floods that damaged crops and infrastructure.

The prospect of a humanitarian crisis is not lost on Chinese officials, who find themselves trying to engage North Korea while at the same time walling it off. Above Dandong sits a watchtower whose stone battlements are silhouetted by the dying rays. The tower is one of the first outposts of China's Great Wall, remnants of which wind up and down the hills leading to Dandong. Now China is building another wall, a fence along its entire border with North Korea. But even when that structure is complete, it seems unlikely that Beijing will pay much more than lip service to imposing the kind of severe sanctions that, while they would teach North Korea a lesson for its nuclear adventures, could also bring about renewed famine and the prospect of hundreds of thousands of refugees.

It's revealing that even in the wake of Kim's nuclear detonation, most Chinese in places like Dandong regard their neighbor with pity more than fear. On the highway leading out of the city, a farmer sits astride a brand-new bright blue motorbike and waits as a fruit seller packs up three large bundles of apples and pears. "I'll take this down to the river tonight, and the North Koreans will be there to trade as usual," he says. He says he swaps the fruit for sheets of copper, most probably stolen, usually one piece of fruit at a time because his buyers can't afford more. "These are the people who are allowed to live near the border. They have to pass loyalty tests," he says, shaking his head. "And still they are smuggling and crossing into China. Imagine what the rest of the country is like."

A Shadowy Nuclear Saga (NSWK)

By Mark Hosenball And Christopher Dickey

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

North Korean diplomats in Berlin are easy to spot: they wear badges with portraits of "Great Leader" Kim Il Sung. The bigger the official, the bigger the badge. But it's rarely so simple to track other agents suspected of shopping for nuclear components. The supply lines used by secret proliferators are almost as complicated as the weapons themselves, and neither the U.N. watchdog International Atomic Energy Agency nor the intelligence services of the United States and other powers—let alone the international legal system—is fully able to meet the challenge.

"We are still grappling with the clandestine network we discovered a few years back," IAEA Director General Mohamed ElBaradei said last week, referring to the web created by AQ Khan of Pakistan. "When we know now that on a CD-ROM you have designs for centrifuges [capable of enriching uranium to weapons-grade] and possibly even weapons designs, that makes you very worried." So does the record of even the most successful investigations so far.

Follow the trail of the Tinner family. The area around Haag, Switzerland, near the Liechtenstein border, holds a nest of precision-engineering firms known among investigators as Vacuum Tube Valley. Friedrich Tinner, owner or player in several of these companies and a longtime Khan acquaintance, denies ever intentionally helping produce components for clandestine nuclear programs. But one of his sons, Urs Tinner, allegedly had a pivotal role: first making vital parts for Libya's secret nuclear program, then, as a CIA informant, helping to expose it.

Urs Tinner's story began in the 1990s, according to U.S. and European officials who worked closely with the CIA's efforts to penetrate these operations. Those sources (asking not to be named because of the sensitive subject) say U.S. intelligence gained potential leverage over the Tinners in the 1990s, when Urs ran afoul of French authorities. One of the French security services tipped off the Americans.

In 2002, Urs went to work for Scomi Precision Engineering (SCOPE), a company set up in Malaysia by Khan associates to produce high-tech components, ostensibly for use in the oil industry. Urs supervised production of pieces for centrifuges, according to a detailed report issued by the Malaysian police in 2004. The components were loaded on the BBC China, a Libya-bound ship—which was intercepted in October 2003 by a team of U.S. and other agents. Within weeks, Libyan leader Muammar Kaddafi, his operations now exposed, ended his nuclear program and gave up a trove of intelligence about his suppliers. The incident remains the biggest counterproliferation coup on record.

The CIA kept its eye on Urs, along with his brother Marco and their father, the intelligence officials say. But a few months after the BBC China bust, German border police arrested and jailed Urs, apparently unaware of his CIA ties, and then extradited him to Switzerland, where Marco and Friedrich were later picked up. The old man was freed, but his sons remain in detention, pending possible charges under a Swiss law banning traffic in nuclear tech from Swiss soil.

Before the arrests, the brothers denied any wrongdoing. A family spokesman said Urs had worked for SCOPE but had no idea that parts were going to Libya. The CIA declines to comment on the case. What's clear is that the Tinners are now useless, either as moles or as surveillance targets, to investigators trying to discover where AQ Khan's seeds of destruction might still be sprouting.

Direct Talks Urged With N. Korea (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

Two Republican senators, including the chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, yesterday called for direct U.S.-North Korea talks over Pyongyang's nuclear program.

Meanwhile, the panel's top Democrat said the other four nations in the six-party negotiations -- China, Russia, South Korea and Japan -- have privately urged the same path on the United States, which has long rejected bilateral talks with North Korea.

"I believe that is going to happen," said Sen. Richard G. Lugar, Indiana Republican and Foreign Relations chairman, in an appearance on "Fox News Sunday."

"I hope it happens sooner rather than later. But I think it is inevitable, if this is to be resolved diplomatically," he said.

Sen. Arlen Specter, Pennsylvania Republican, also broke ranks to endorse bilateral talks with Pyongyang's reclusive communist regime.

"North Korea wants to pound its chest. Well, let's talk to them," he said during an appearance on CNN's "Late Edition." "The issue is serious enough with North Korea, with their having nuclear weapons and the capacity to deliver them, that I think we ought to use every alternative, including direct bilateral talks."

Mr. Lugar was joined in his appearance by the other three top-ranking senators on foreign-policy issues -- Sens. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican; Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat; and Carl Levin, Michigan Democrat.

Mr. Biden and Mr. Levin, the ranking members on the Foreign Relations and Armed Services committees, respectively, also support direct U.S. talks, with Mr. Biden saying that representatives from all the other nations involved in negotiations with North Korea have endorsed direct talks to resolve the standoff.

"Every single party we're working with, every one of them, from Japan to [South] Korea to Russia, has encouraged us privately to talk directly with North Korea," he said.

But the State Department would have to conduct the talks, and the White House has repeatedly rejected earlier calls, mostly from Democrats, for direct talks with North Korea.

Only Mr. Warner, the Armed Services chairman, had unequivocal praise for the administration's North Korea policy.

"The president was right: Negotiations must be left to the six-party talks. Conversations on the side take place, as all of us know, in diplomatic areas. That's fine, conversations," Mr. Warner said. "Negotiations, he's been right, leave it to the six. Because we do not want the other powers to point to us and say, 'You didn't handle this right, USA. It's your fault; now you take care of the problem.' "

But Mr. Levin added that a mix of direct and group negotiations was an alternative.

"That is not inconsistent with our having direct talks with the North Koreans," he said. "As a matter of fact, the Chinese and the South Koreans are allies, and South Korea wants us to have one-on-one, direct discussions with the North Koreans."

DOJ_NMG_0085009

Meanwhile, Assistant Secretary of State Christopher R. Hill, the top U.S. nuclear negotiator, arrived in Hong Kong yesterday for talks on freezing North Korean bank accounts in Macau, a special administrative region of China, according to a spokesman for the U.S. consulate-general. Mr. Hill's visit occurred on the heels of a regional visit by Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

The U.S. banned transactions between Macao-based Banco Delta Asia and American financial institutions in September 2005 after accusing Banco Delta Asia clients of engaging in smuggling and counterfeiting operations on behalf of North Korea. North Korea has denied the charge and has said it will not return to the six-party talks until the ban is removed.

Recent reports have indicated that North Korean leader Kim Jong-il told a Chinese envoy that he had no "immediate plans" to carry out further nuclear tests, but that those plans hedged on the level of U.S. pressure. The North Korean dictator has repeatedly stated concern that the U.S. intends to overthrow his regime through military force.

After her trip, Miss Rice said she doubts Pyongyang will honor such a promise and that Chinese officials had not informed her of any proffered deal.

Lugar, Dems Urge U.S.-N. Korean Talks (AP-Y)

By Foster Klug, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 23, 2006

Two leading Republican senators joined Democrats on Sunday in calling for direct talks with North Korea aimed at easing a nuclear standoff.

Sen. Richard Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, said direct talks, which the North long has coveted and which the Bush administration refuses, are "inevitable if this is to be resolved diplomatically."

Calls for such talks have grown louder following North Korea's nuclear test Oct. 9 and as diplomats worry about a second detonation.

The administration says it will only have such talks during six-nation negotiations meant to persuade North Korea to abandon its nuclear programs. Those talks have been stalled for nearly a year.

GOP Sen. Arlen Specter of Pennsylvania, chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee, said the "issue is serious enough with North Korea, with their having nuclear weapons and the capacity to deliver them, that I think we ought to use every alternative, including direct bilateral talks."

One day, said Lugar, R-Ind., an American president will be talking directly to North Korean leader Kim Jong Il "and his people and saying, in essence, in terms they can understand, 'We are not going to overthrow you; we are not involved in regime change; you're going to stay.' ... I hope it happens sooner rather than later."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday ended a weeklong trip to Asia and Russia to rally support for enforcing a U.N. Security Council resolution that punishes North Korea for the nuclear test.

A report Sunday said Kim told a Chinese envoy that future nuclear tests will hinge on U.S. policy toward his country. Kim also said he thinks Washington is trying to crush North Korea with its hostile policy and complained about U.S. financial penalties, the Kyodo News agency in Japan reported.

Sen. Joseph Biden, the top Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee, said Japan, Russia, China and South Korea — the other members of the six-nation talks — have privately urged the United States to allow direct talks with the North.

Biden, D-Del., questioned what he said was the administration's policy of trying to persuade the North to give up its nuclear bombs while also pursuing a change in government.

"It's either you want regime change or conduct change," Biden said. "You don't say to somebody: 'By the way, put down the very thing that can keep us out of your hair militarily, and, by the way, after you put it down, we're going to take you out.'"

Lawmakers from both parties linked the crisis in North Korea to Iran, with whom the United States also is in a nuclear standoff with. Lugar and Specter joined Biden in calling for direct talks with Iran.

"Whether it's deserved or not, there's a big feeling around the world about ugly Americans," Specter said. "Iran wants to be part of the nuclear club; North Korea wants to pound its chest. Well, let's talk to them."

DOJ_NMG_0085010

Sen. John Warner, however, supported Bush's policy of keeping direct talks between North Korea and the United States within the framework of the deadlocked six-nation negotiations.

"He's been right: Leave it to the six. Because we do not want the other powers to point to us and say: 'You didn't handle this right, USA. It's your fault; now you take care of the problem,'" said Warner, R-Va., chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee.

Warner, Lugar and Biden appeared on "Fox News Sunday," while Specter was on CNN's "Late Edition."

U.S. To Cede More Wartime Control To South Korea (WSJ)

By Evan Ramstad

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

SEOUL -- Even as North Korea challenges the military balance in northeast Asia, Seoul and Washington are moving ahead on a plan to pass more military responsibility to South Korea in the event of war.

Defense ministers from the two countries agreed over the weekend that South Korea will take wartime control of its military, which is part of a joint command office led by a U.S. general. The change is scheduled to take place between late 2009 and early 2012, but both sides deferred deciding the precise time until next year.

The change has been informally discussed for several years by the two countries but was put under formal review a year ago. U.S. Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and South Korean Minister of Defense Yoon Kwang Ung signed off on the change at a meeting in Washington on Friday.

The U.S. fought alongside South Korea in the Korean War from 1950 to 1953 and has maintained a military presence in the country since. The two countries signed a mutual-defense treaty in 1954.

South Korea took charge of peacetime control of its 600,000-person military 12 years ago. Mr. Rumsfeld said he believed South Korea "has the ability to assume responsibility for wartime operational control roughly in the time frame of 2009."

For the U.S., a speedy transition will more quickly allow it to send personnel associated with Korean war planning and logistics to other places. The plan also allows current commanders in the region to take charge of the transition, rather than leaving it to others who, in normal duty rotations, would be brought in.

South Korean President Roh Moo Hyun has said his country is ready to take wartime control anytime, calling it "the core of a self-reliant national defense."

Many South Koreans worry the change is prelude to withdrawal by the U.S. military from the country and urged Mr. Roh not to let it happen.

"As soon as the control is passed, the U.S. will leave," Lee Soo Bong, a retired Korean naval officer, said at a protest over the issue last month.

The U.S. is near the end of a five-year reduction of its forces in South Korea, to 25,000 people by the end of next year from 37,500 in 2002. U.S. leaders have repeatedly said the country will live up to its promise to protect South Korea.

"The opinion of the Korean Ministry of Defense as well as the Korean public is that 2012 is the best year in terms of having perfect conditions for security on the Korean peninsula," the South Korean defense chief, Mr. Yoon, said at a news conference Friday.

North Korea's nuclear-weapons test didn't appear to affect the decision. The U.S. provides a so-called nuclear umbrella for South Korea, agreeing to use its nuclear weapons against anyone who attacks the South with such weapons. For years, the U.S. had nuclear-tipped missiles in South Korea, but removed them in the early 1990s.

A Test Of Wills Over Pyongyang's Nuclear Program (MCT)

By Warren P. Strobel

McClatchy Newspapers, October 23, 2006

SHANNON, Ireland - Now the test of wills begins.

North Korea has made itself an uninvited member of the nuclear club and dared the world to kick it out.

DOJ_NMG_0085011

The world's leading powers, divided over Iraq, Iran and much else, have responded with uncharacteristic speed and unanimity to bracket North Korea's Kim Jong-Il with some of the toughest sanctions imposed on any nation since the 1991 Persian Gulf War, at least on paper.

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice on Sunday completed a four-nation trip to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia in an effort to cement the initial outrage at North Korea's October 9 nuclear test into a durable diplomatic wall. It remains to be seen, however, whether the U.S. and the other four nations, acting together, separately or both, can persuade the unpredictable Kim to curb his nuclear appetite.

A senior official accompanying Rice was privately skeptical. "He lives in a different world from us," the official said.

The stakes are enormous.

A nuclear-armed North Korea could prompt Japan, South Korea or even Taiwan to develop their own nuclear deterrents, triggering an East Asian arms race. It would shred global nonproliferation efforts. And the cash-starved North might sell nuclear technology, material or even a weapon to others.

Kim, whose country is the most isolated on the planet and has only the nuclear card to play, is unlikely to back down soon or to return to six-nation talks whose goal is to persuade North Korea to halt its pursuit of nuclear weapons in return for a host of rewards.

"I think we'll be at this for a long while," Rice told reporters after talks in Beijing. "I can't tell you how long."

That means that the sanctions will have to stay in place for a long time, too.

Kim appears to be calculating that he can ride out the backlash from his nuclear weapons test, as India and Pakistan did after their 1998 blasts.

The key, U.S. officials acknowledge, will be China, which has sustained and sheltered North Korea since the late 1940s, sacrificing thousands of soldiers on Pyongyang's behalf in the 1950-53 Korean War.

The relationship has cooled considerably in recent years, and there are signs that Beijing's leaders may be nearing the end of their rope with Kim, who ignored China's warnings not to conduct a nuclear test.

Chinese President Hu Jintao sent a top-level delegation to Pyongyang last week to tell Kim, in essence, cut it out.

Senior U.S. officials, briefed by the Chinese on those talks and speaking only on the condition of anonymity, said that Kim didn't, as widely reported, promise not to conduct more nuclear tests. Instead, they said, the North Korean leader said he'd refrain from more tests for now if the United States didn't do anything provocative - a much flimsier pledge.

China seems unlikely to abandon North Korea overnight, although Kim himself could be a different matter. As a rising world power, China has more important things to do than prop up a capricious dictator: maintain good relations with the United States, ensure stable trade and energy supplies; and, perhaps above all, ensure that rival Japan doesn't go nuclear.

Words are extremely important in China, and U.S. officials took note when Foreign Minister Li Zhaoxing said at an appearance with Rice that China, like the United States, is a "stakeholder" in global affairs.

"I don't think that there is any doubt that Chinese attitudes about North Korea are evolving," Rice told reporters en route from Beijing to Moscow, her last stop. But, she said, "I don't expect that overnight you're going to have a 180 degree turn in the China-North Korea relationship. ... China also seems to be trying to use that relationship to bring about more responsible North Korean behavior."

Rice's mission to Japan, South Korea, China and Russia was a high-wire act on an extremely thin wire.

She had two contradictory objectives: persuade North Korea's neighbors to hang tough and enforce the U.N. sanctions, and assuage their fears that the U.S. wants to squeeze Kim's regime until it implodes.

At every stop, Rice insisted that she wasn't bearing a list of American demands about how to enforce the sanctions. She also strove to dispel the notion that Washington wants a Cuban Missile Crisis-style naval quarantine around North Korea.

U.S. officials traveling with Rice said that North Korean ships would be stopped and searched in international waters only if there's a specific tip that they're carrying banned cargo. Other checks will be conducted at foreign ports and borders.

The sanctions ban Pyongyang from exporting or importing nuclear- and ballistic missile-related materials; other weapons such as tanks and artillery; and luxury goods for Kim and his cronies.

Still, Rice is trying to hold together a motley coalition that may not last.

DOJ_NMG_0085012

Japan is the most hawkish, seeing itself as a primary North Korean target. South Korea wants to maintain its "Sunshine Policy" of engagement with the North. China fears instability in North Korea, which could send thousands more refugees fleeing across its border. Russia seems willing to cooperate with Washington, at least on this issue.

N. Korean Economy Not Easily Gauged (USAT)

By Barbara Slavin

USA Today, October 23, 2006

SEOUL — At a kindergarten in Hyangsan, a small city near North Korea's capital, dozens of colorfully dressed children put on a calisthenics display this month for visitors from the U.N. World Food Program.

The children, full of corn porridge and high-protein biscuits provided daily by the aid agency, jumped, stretched briskly and looked healthy, said Jean-Pierre DeMargerie, the top program official in North Korea. Kids in the front rows looked especially good, he said. “Those 20-30 yards back were not as well groomed or dressed.”

“It's always difficult to get a clear picture,” DeMargerie said. “The North Koreans don't like to expose those that might be sick or weak. You build your assumptions on a relatively small sample.”

North Korea, one of the world's most isolated nations, is a hard society to fathom even for the few foreigners who visit regularly. Whether it is on the verge of economic collapse or resilient in the face of decades of adversity and deprivation remains a matter of conjecture.

The shroud that keeps North Korea hidden makes it virtually impossible to judge whether the limited sanctions the United Nations imposed after North Korea claimed to have conducted a nuclear weapons test Oct. 9 will have any effect on the regime of Kim Jong Il.

The Bush administration hopes the sanctions and international rebuke, particularly from China, North Korea's main source of trade and investment, will prompt Kim to halt his nuclear program and resume negotiations on a diplomatic solution. “I think (the North Koreans) were surprised by a 15-0” vote on sanctions by the U.N. Security Council, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said Saturday. “We'll see whether or not they are prepared.”

DeMargerie and a half-dozen others who visited North Korea recently say it is better off than a few years ago and may be able to withstand sanctions.

The sanctions could reduce the amount of hard currency North Korea receives, but market reforms in place since 2002 and stockpiling of excess cash, food aid and fuel may give Kim a cushion to defy the U.N.

In 2005, North Korea “received a surplus of a half-million to 600,000 tons of grain” from China and South Korea, said Kenneth Quinones, a former U.S. intelligence expert on North Korea who teaches at Akita International University in Japan. “It looks like most of that went into storage.” North Korea also had a decent harvest this year after two consecutive bumper crops, he said.

Marcus Noland, a Korea specialist at the Institute for International Economics in Washington, said millions of dollars in Chinese investment went into North Korea during the first half of 2006, more than the country could absorb.

Signs of progress are evident to Steve Linton, 56, who has made more than 50 trips to North Korea in the last 15 years. The son and grandson of Christian missionaries, Linton heads the Eugene Bell Foundation, which has delivered medical equipment to about 70 hospitals throughout the country.

“It used to be that people were visibly thinner in the spring,” when food from the previous year's harvest had run out and new crops were about to be planted, said Linton, who last visited North Korea in May. Now, he said, “that distinction has pretty much disappeared.”

Linton has noticed that North Koreans are better dressed and that there are more bicycles in a country where a decade ago, nearly everyone traveled on foot. “It's not lightning speed, but it's gradual change,” he said.

Pyongyang, a gloomy capital of bland concrete high-rises and little commerce a decade ago, has a few dozen shops and many sidewalk stalls selling ice cream, cookies, flowers, even videocassettes, said Simon Cockerell, manager for Beijing-based Koryo Tours, which organizes trips to North Korea.

Cockerell said there are four or five billboards for cars, the first commercial advertising in the country. Electricity blackouts, once common, are rare in the capital, he said.

Other indicators of an economic cushion include:

•A resumption of a state-run rationing system that hands out about half a pound of grain daily to city residents, who make up 70% of North Korea's 22 million people. DeMargerie said North Korean officials told his organization that rationing, which collapsed during a famine in the 1990s, resumed last year. It provides corn or rice to make porridge, a mainstay of the North Korean diet.

•Diversification of oil suppliers. China provides about 80% of North Korean fuel, and Iran and Indonesia supply most of the rest, Quinones said. That gives supply alternatives should China carry out threats to restrict deliveries. Noland said North Korea also may have stockpiled diesel fuel that South Korea provided in 2004.

Noland, who spent several weeks in China last summer along the 880-mile border with North Korea, said economic progress is notable for one group of new entrepreneurs: managers of shuttered state-owned factories who are trading coke, coal and iron ore for cheap Chinese consumer goods and food, which they then sell to fellow North Koreans.

"A lot of small-scale activity in North Korea is done by state-owned enterprises," Noland said. "They have transformed themselves into retailers. I call it the 'Wal-Martization' of the North Korean economy."

On the negative side, trade with China, which totaled more than $1.5 billion last year, is down about 30% this year because of the difficulty of transferring funds to North Korean bank accounts, said Nam Sung Wook, head of North Korean Studies at Korea University in Seoul. The problem stems from U.S. action last year to freeze North Korean accounts in a bank in the Chinese enclave of Macau linked to counterfeiting and money laundering.

"There is some confusion among traders in Dandong," a Chinese city across the Yalu River from North Korea that has become a center of cross-border commerce, Nam said. He forecasts negative growth for the North Korean economy this year after 2.2% growth last year. Even so, new sanctions "will not collapse the North Korean economy," he said.

Those likely to suffer most are salaried urban professionals, said Nam, who visited Pyongyang in July. He said he heard grumbling from technocrats and professors, whose average monthly pay comes out to about $33 at the official exchange rate but only $5 on the black market.

North Korea also has massive infrastructure needs that make it difficult to sustain economic gains. DeMargerie said only 20%-25% of households have access to clean running water, and the sanitation system is becoming a serious health hazard.

Still, Noland predicted, "They can make it through the winter. They are hunkering down and believe they can survive until the world accepts them as a nuclear power."

Rice conceded that sanctions are no certain solution. "I think we'll be at this for a while," she said. "I can't tell you how long."

Rice Gets Cool Response In Russia For Iran Policy (WSJ)

By Neil King Jr.

The Wall Street Journal, October 23, 2006

MOSCOW -- Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice ended her round-the-world trip on a chilly note in Russia, finding limited support for her next big international challenge: imposing sanctions on Iran over its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice came here at the end of a trip -- focused mainly on North Korea -- in which she repeatedly praised China for its help in winning United Nations trade sanctions against Pyongyang. Ms. Rice said China's willingness to crack down on a longtime ally was just one example of how Beijing was beginning to work alongside the U.S. on a number of big issues.

"I cannot conceive of even a short time ago China agreeing to call North Korea's behavior a threat to international peace and security," she told reporters on her way to Moscow from Beijing.

Her stop in Moscow was more strained, indicative of pricklier ties between the U.S. and Russia that are coloring the debate over how to grapple with Tehran's nuclear ambitions. The U.N. Security Council this week plans to begin full debate over a sanctions package meant to pressure Iran to suspend its uranium enrichment and return to international talks.

But before Ms. Rice's arrival here, Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told a Kuwaiti news agency that Russia "won't be able to support any attempts to use the Security Council to punish Iran...in order to promote the ideas of regime change there." A senior aide traveling with Ms. Rice expressed frustration over Russia's stance on Iran, saying Russian officials continue "to proceed at a measured pace, and our view is we want them to act."

Russian officials have told U.S. diplomats that they are willing to back a first set of very focused sanctions to limit Iran's access to certain nuclear and missile technologies. But the Bush administration is concerned that token steps against Iran will have little impact, and that a limited first resolution must be backed by clear resolve to follow up with tougher measures if Iran doesn't bend.

Ms. Rice said on her trip that the U.N. consensus to sanction North Korea for its Oct. 9 nuclear test should give an impetus to diplomacy on Iran. "No one is going to want to have a successful resolution against North Korea and no action against Iran," she said.

Yet Iran is a touchier subject than the deeply isolated and impoverished North Korea. Iran's role as a major oil supplier and significant market for European and Chinese goods -- along with its growing sway in the Middle East -- makes U.N. diplomacy over its nuclear program far more delicate. China and some countries in Europe are also leery of pushing Iran too hard.

Ms. Rice arrived in Moscow at a moment of tension over press and civic freedoms in Russia as well as a feud between Russia and Georgia. In an apparent poke at the Kremlin, she requested an audience with top editors of Novaya Gazeta, who came to see her Saturday at her hotel. The weekly newspaper is one of Russia's few independent media outlets and the employer of respected reporter Anna Politkovskaya, who was murdered outside her apartment earlier this month.

"Unfortunately, there is not much left of independent television in Russia," Ms. Rice told reporters before arriving in Moscow.

Ms. Rice, who made no public remarks while in Russia, met with Mr. Lavrov, President Vladimir Putin, and a gathering of Russia's top national-security officials.

A Different Tactic For Rice: Speaking Softly Without The Stick (NYT)

By Thom Shanker

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

SHANNON, Ireland, Oct. 22 — With North Korea's nuclear test presenting one of her greatest diplomatic challenges, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has taken an approach that allies say they have seen not often enough from the Bush administration: an effort to persuade and to build consensus, rather than to dictate terms or press for immediate agreement.

On Sunday the secretary concluded her around-the-world mission to urge American negotiating partners, some with complex relationships to North Korea or to the United States, to start strict enforcement of United Nations military sanctions on North Korea.

There had been widespread indications that some of the major players were unwilling to take the steps necessary to enforce the sanctions. But as she flew back to Washington, Ms. Rice tried to convey a sense that she had done what was necessary to preserve the required, if nominal, unity among Japan, South Korea, China, Russia and the United States, members of stalled six-party talks with North Korea over its nuclear program.

Ms. Rice and her foreign counterparts announced no concrete steps to fire up a new embargo machine that could press North Korea, although commitments to a set of initial goals emerged. Thus she was able to contend that important progress had been made toward a new "nonproliferation regime," whose core would be a vastly enhanced regional system of monitoring and inspecting cargo to and from North Korea.

"We could be — probably will be — in this regime for a long time," Ms. Rice said. While "it's quite important what happens on Day 1," she said, her public diplomacy tried to manage expectations about what was and was not possible from her first foreign lobbying campaign for the sanctions.

This was not a trip planned to culminate with agreements signed or even boxes checked off, she said. "An effective way to monitor and scrutinize and deal with North Korean transfers" of weapons material, nuclear bombs and missiles will "have to evolve over a period of time," she said.

DOJ_NMG_0085015

Her call for patience and perspective in carrying out sanctions to press North Korea to give up its weapons program and return to six-party talks — each is anything but inevitable — echoed a folk maxim about patience and perspective, and also about inevitability, that could be heard on Moscow streets as she met with Kremlin leaders on Saturday and Sunday.

Ms. Rice, a student of Russian language, history and politics, is familiar with the old saying Russians quote as the skies turn to slate and chilled rain hits a frosty earth: "Winter doesn't begin until the third snow."

As Ms. Rice enters the autumn months of the Bush administration's tenure in office, she dropped early administration mantras — like other nations are "either with us or against us" — on this trip, and instead repeated at each whistle-stop, "I did not come here, nor will I go anyplace else, to try and dictate to governments what they ought to do in response to Resolution 1718," the United Nations Security Council resolution on North Korea.

The Bush administration's struggle to rethink a faltering Iraq strategy hung over her entire trip like a shadow. Given that the Bush administration has been more reticent all along to take strong action toward North Korea, her more collegial approach was not entirely unexpected. And her approach may have been more necessity than virtue.

The administration may simply be in no position to press its partners in a tougher way over North Korea. To paraphrase a comment — not entirely well received — by Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld, Ms. Rice's cabinet colleague at the Pentagon, a nation goes off to diplomatic negotiations with the bargaining chips it has, not the ones it might like to have or will be able to have at a later date.

But Ms. Rice's tempered message played well across Asia, and extremely well in Japan, whose policies were already mostly in line with those of Washington.

Unexpectedly, the Chinese responded warmly, too, prompting fresh assessments from senior State Department officials that the North Korea crisis may, in the end, bring the United States and China into closer partnership on other issues.

In the three-dimensional chess of diplomacy, deterrence and sanctions, China's broad endorsement of the American position — at least as put in resolution form by the Security Council — was in no small measure encouraged by a clear statement from Ms. Rice reaffirming the United States' military commitment to the defense of Japan. That statement helped preclude, at least for now, any serious move by Japan to start its own nuclear weapons program, which China knows would jumble its security calculus in the region.

The United States and China are now on the same page on this issue in ways they have not been before, and any solution to the North Korea crisis leads through Beijing. But the United States and China still have stark differences over whether the ultimate goal is to peacefully manage a status quo relationship with a denuclearized North Korea, as China prefers, or whether to add pressure to the point where a change in its leadership may occur.

China fears that if North Korea came unglued, millions of refugees would flood across its border.

South Korea, not China, was the odd man out. America's military ally on the lower half of the tense Korean Peninsula was reluctant in its public endorsement of the positions urged by Washington. South Korea feels most threatened by North Korea's nuclear program, but also the most exposed politically, and a number of South Korean opinion leaders are doing all they can to rescue their policy of engaging, not isolating, North Korea.

Ms. Rice acknowledged during her journey that Iran, with its own nuclear ambitions, was watching her efforts. She left one senior adviser in Asia to continue discussions of sanctions, while another spent time at the working-group level to devise specific goals and rules for monitoring and inspecting North Korean cargo.

Administration officials say those initial steps forward may already be influencing North Korean decisions about whether to hold off on a second test, even as they acknowledge the absolute unpredictability of the leadership. Over time, they hope, a strict sanctions architecture can be erected to contain its nuclear ambitions and prevent the transfer of weapons to another state or to terrorists.

All that may be true, but only if winter does not begin until the third snow.

Europe's Long Legal Tether On Russia (WP)

By Peter Finn

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

DOJ_NMG_0085016

MOSCOW -- For seven years, the Salvation Army battled a ruling by Moscow city authorities that the Christian charitable group, whose members wear uniforms and call their leader a general, was a foreign "paramilitary organization" that must cease operations in the capital.

Each step of the way in Russia's courts, the Salvation Army lost. In 2000, a Moscow court, noting the group's "barrack-room discipline," suggested it might involve itself in the violent overthrow of the state, court records show.

"The reasoning was unbelievable and sickening," said Vladimir Ryakhovsky, a lawyer at the Slavic Center for Law and Justice in Moscow who defended the Salvation Army.

This month, the European Court of Human Rights ruled that the city of Moscow had interfered with the group's freedom of religion and assembly. The Salvation Army's structure and norms were "particular ways of organizing the internal life of their religious community," the court said, and "it could not seriously be maintained that the applicant branch advocated a violent change of constitutional foundations."

Suddenly, the stance of Moscow officialdom changed. "Because of the ruling, we must register them, and we will," an official in Moscow's registration office said, speaking on condition of anonymity.

While President Vladimir Putin has been marginalizing Russia's parliament, opposition, media and human rights groups, this international court sitting 1,250 miles away in Strasbourg, France, has emerged as a powerful check on the excesses of the Russian bureaucracy and failures by the country's own investigative organs and courts to follow Russia's laws.

The European Court enforces the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, drawn up by the Council of Europe, an international body founded in the wake of World War II to defend human rights, parliamentary democracy and the rule of law. Russia ratified the convention in 1998, agreeing to accept the court's decisions as binding.

"Much of what you see in the Russian justice system harks back to Soviet days," said Carroll Bogert, associate director of Human Rights Watch. "If you're a human rights group, you can report on human rights excesses or publicize abuses in the press or meet with government officials, but it's hard to make a dent. One of the really effective tools now is the European Court, and it produces tangible and immediate results."

Bogert noted that in August Russia halted the deportation of 13 Uzbeks to their home country, where they faced a real risk of torture or execution, after the men appealed to the European Court. The former Soviet republic of Kyrgyzstan, which is not a member of the Council of Europe, ignored international appeals not to send Uzbeks home, and the fate of the men it deported remains unknown.

Following European Court decisions in recent years, Russia improved conditions in pretrial detention centers and trimmed the powers of federal or local authorities to reopen ostensibly completed cases that they have lost in domestic courts. Torture victims have been compensated, and in at least one case, police officers were jailed for abuse after the Strasbourg court took up the matter.

"The court represents the end of impunity," said Olga Shepeleva, a lawyer with Demos, a human rights research center in Moscow. "There's a growing recognition that the court is a place where justice will be done. The authorities may not always be happy, but they pay attention to the results."

The European Court has entered Russian popular consciousness as a port of last resort for those seeking justice because the Russian state does bow to its judgments -- albeit with some very public grumbling.

While Russia is quick to pay any compensation ordered by the court, the country has been criticized by the Council of Europe's parliamentary assembly for failing to carry out systemic and deep reforms as a result of court rulings. On Chechnya in particular, human rights activists say they would like to see a dramatic improvement in the pursuit of soldiers and officials responsible for atrocities.

"We consider some rulings of the European Court to be politicized," Russian Foreign Minister Sergei Lavrov told journalists in Strasbourg this month. Russia currently chairs the Council of Europe. "But I repeat that despite the fact that we do not agree with certain rulings of the court in principle, we do comply with them."

Russians now file more complaints with the court -- 10,583 in 2005 -- than people from any of the 46 countries that make up the Council of Europe, according to court statistics. The vast majority of these cases will never be heard because the court is overwhelmed with potential plaintiffs, receiving more than 45,000 petitions last year.

Since 2002, the court has issued 362 judgments concerning Russia -- on issues ranging from environmental degradation to, most recently, abductions, disappearances and killings in Chechnya, the southern Russian republic that has been racked by two wars and a brutal, continuing insurgency. All but 10 judgments have gone against Russia, according to court statistics.

"The administration in Russia wants to be seen as being part of the good company of European law-abiding democratic countries," said Ole Solvang, executive director of the Russian Justice Initiative in Moscow, which helps Chechen plaintiffs bring cases before the court.

"The Russian authorities care about the Council of Europe and the court, and they take it seriously," Solvang said. "We see that in our cases. There is a complete change in attitude towards a case, a disappearance case, for example, when the government learns the case has been filed with the European Court."

For Alexei Mikheyev, redress came even before the court ruled. In 1998, he was subjected to nine days of torture, including electric shock, in a local police station after being picked up as a suspect in the disappearance of a 17-year-old girl in the central Russian city of Nizhniy Novgorod.

Mikheyev confessed to raping and killing the girl but retracted his statement after he was taken to the prosecutor's office. Returned to the police station and facing more torture, he threw himself out of a third-story window and was left partially paralyzed. The girl he had confessed to killing returned home the next day.

Prosecutors opened and then dropped 23 preliminary investigations into the police force's treatment of Mikheyev, in what human rights activists call an effort to stymie any trial. After the European Court agreed to hear Mikheyev's case in 2004, prosecutors reopened the case and finally secured the conviction of two police officers, who were given four-year sentences for abuse of power. In January, Mikheyev was awarded approximately $300,000 in compensation.

"I want this country to accept responsibility for the actions of its police," Mikheyev said in an interview last year. "And I don't want this to happen to anyone again."

Shepeleva, one of the lawyers who represented Mikheyev, said charges of police abuse in Nizhniy Novgorod reportedly declined after the ruling.

Russia lost its first case on Chechnya in early 2005. The court found that relatives of two plaintiffs, Magomed Khashiyev and Roza Akayeva, had been tortured and killed by Russian troops in 2000, and it called the investigation "seriously flawed and delayed." In two other cases, the court ruled that relatives of four Chechen plaintiffs had been killed by indiscriminate airstrikes.

The six plaintiffs were awarded compensation, which the Russian government paid promptly.

When it loses a case, the government is obliged to write an action plan laying out how it will rectify the failings identified by the court and prevent recurrences. In a submission to the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe, which monitors implementation of court decisions, Russian officials wrote that they had reopened investigations into all three Chechen cases, were educating troops on human rights law and were circulating the court's decisions to judges and prosecutors.

But lawyers for the plaintiffs, while welcoming the reopening of the cases, say they want to see particular officers, named by the court in its decision, brought to justice. They also want the Russian army to change its basic manual, which contains no concept of proportionality regarding the use of force when civilians are at risk.

Instead, the manual reads, "Shame on the commander who, fearing responsibility, fails to act and does not involve all forces, measures and possibilities for achieving victory in battle."

"No one has been punished," Tatyana Kasatkina, executive director of the leading Russian human rights group, Memorial, said of the Chechen cases. "Long-lasting and slow criminal cases have been opened, but I doubt those responsible will be given up."

Reports by the Council of Europe's parliamentary assembly have criticized countries from Ukraine to Britain for dragging their feet on reforms. Philip Leach, director of the European Human Rights Advocacy Center, which specializes in bringing Russian cases before the court, said the Council of Europe needs to be much tougher in forcing member states to implement court decisions.

But on balance, activists praise the leverage they get from the Strasbourg rulings. "Our authorities have started to move faster," Kasatkina said. "They understand that there is a body above our courts which can make real decisions and attract international attention to problems, so it will keep them tense and responsive."

Tensions Rise Between Palestinian Factions (NYT)

By Dina Kraft

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

TEL AVIV, Oct. 22 — Tensions between rival Fatah and Hamas loyalists continued to smolder Sunday in the form of a deadly shooting, a kidnapping and tire-burning protests as an informal cease-fire quickly disintegrated.

In Jerusalem, some Israeli cabinet members, citing concerns about weapons smuggling, called for retaking control of Gaza's southern border with Egypt. The government is expected to meet midweek to discuss the possibility of expanding the military campaign in Gaza.

In Gaza City, stalls that would normally be crowded with shoppers buying sweets for Id al-Fitr, the holiday that marks the end of Ramadan, were shuttered. Outside, thick smoke rose in the air from tires set ablaze by Palestinian policemen aligned with the Fatah faction in protest of going unpaid by the Hamas-led government, which has been denied aid from the West and tax revenue and customs duties collected by Israel.

A meeting on Friday between Hamas and Fatah officials led to an agreement to stop the violence between the sides. But President Mahmoud Abbas left Gaza for the West Bank after a brief visit over the weekend without seeing Prime Minister Ismail Haniya of Hamas.

On Sunday, Mohammed Shahadeh, 27, who is a member of a Fatah-aligned militant group, was found shot to death in the Bureij refugee camp, and another Fatah member was kidnapped in the Jabaliya refugee camp. Hamas denied any role in either episode.

After the Israeli cabinet met, some officials called for more action in Gaza than the incursions the military has made since June, when Palestinian militants crossed into Israel and killed two soldiers and captured one who has yet to be freed. They said Israel should take over security along the Gaza-Egypt border, where Israel says the militants smuggle in weapons used against Israel.

"Action must be taken without hesitation," said Eli Yishai, the Israeli trade minister and member of the religious Shas Party. "Any hesitation is dangerous, and we must act immediately."

Along with Mr. Yishai, Rafi Eitan, the minister in charge of pensioners' affairs, also called for Israel to retake the passage along the Gaza-Egypt border. Isaac Herzog, the tourism minister, stopped short of such a call but did tell reporters that "precise and decisive" action was imperative in Gaza.

Yom-Tov Samea, a retired major general who is on assignment as deputy chief of Israel's southern command, advocated that Israel step up its military efforts in Gaza to both retake and widen the corridor. Israeli officials have said that smugglers, using tunnels as deep as 65 feet, have carried antitank rocket launchers, antitank rockets, explosives and, possibly, shoulder-fired antirocket missiles into Gaza since Israel's withdrawal last summer.

The weaponry is part of a "whole production line of ammunition later targeted toward Israel," said Capt. Noa Meir, an Israeli Army spokeswoman. Palestinian officials suggested that the Israeli warnings to take over the border area might be part of a plan to retake all of Gaza.

Shimon Peres, Israel's deputy prime minister, was among those who strongly advocated the pullout from Gaza, 38 years after Israel captured the territory during the 1967 war with Egypt.

Over a year after the withdrawal, things looked very different than he had imagined they would, and he blamed Hamas.

"The situation in Gaza looks very bad," Mr. Peres said after the cabinet meeting. "They cannot behave like this — to be wild, to fire, to shoot, to refuse to respect agreements."

In the West Bank, a Palestinian man was killed and two others were seriously wounded Sunday in the village of Tamun, near Nablus, during clashes with Israeli soldiers, Palestinian security and medical sources told Agence France-Presse.

An Israeli Army spokesman's office confirmed that soldiers did open fire on a group of Palestinians during an arrest operation in the village after the soldiers came under gunfire. They said the group also detonated explosives and hurled rocks and Molotov cocktails at the Israeli forces.

Also on Sunday, according to an official who briefed reporters, the Israeli defense minister, Amir Peretz, said Israeli jets would continue to fly over Lebanon despite calls to stop by the French and the Lebanese.

DOJ_NMG_0085019

The official said Mr. Peretz had told the cabinet that the flyovers would continue as long as attempts to smuggle weapons into Lebanon from Syria continued.

Yaakov Edri, the minister who serves as the liaison with Parliament, meanwhile confirmed reports that the army used phosphorous shells on some Hezbollah guerrilla targets during the war, the newspaper Haaretz reported.

Once it ignites, white phosphorous creates such a high level of heat and smoke that it has been banned in use against civilians or civilian areas by the Geneva Conventions.

Stricter Policy Splits West Bank Families (WP)

By Scott Wilson

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

RAMALLAH, West Bank -- The last time Adel Samara saw his wife, Enayeh, was the morning in late May when she pulled away from their home in Beit Ur in a taxi bound for the border. Her trips to Jordan had become routine, never lasting more than a few days.

In order to renew her tourist visa, Enayeh, a U.S. citizen, had left the West Bank every three months during their three-decade marriage. For years, Israeli officials had denied her residency applications, so shuttling across the border to get a fresh visa in her U.S. passport was the only way Enayeh, 56, could live legally in the place she was born. This time, they refused to give her the tourist visa.

Since then she has moved in with a sister in Chicago, leaving Adel to shutter her beauty salon on a hectic street here. Their case highlights a change in Israeli policy that has left thousands of U.S. citizens of Palestinian descent locked out of the occupied territories where they work, invest and have families.

"At first she thought it was just a mistake," said Adel Samara, 62, a bespectacled former U.N. official and political activist who holds a doctorate in economics. "Then we realized it was not and that it was actually a very large problem. I never knew it before."

For decades, Palestinian foreign nationals have entered the West Bank and Gaza Strip on three-month tourist visas, renewing them regularly, because residency cards were difficult to obtain. But in recent months Israel's Interior Ministry has refused in many cases to grant new visas, separating thousands of family members from their relatives inside lands the Jewish state occupied in the 1967 Middle East war.

The tightening has coincided with the rise this year of Hamas, a radical Islamic movement, to head the Palestinian government, which most foreign donors have cut off from economic aid. Palestinian officials and Israeli human rights groups contend the shift will undermine private investment in the territories -- investment the Bush administration is seeking to encourage -- while potentially driving out the professional class most likely to have relatives abroad.

"It is a policy that can only be seen in the context of population control," said Nabeel Kassis, president of Bir Zeit University near this city, who along with 10 other Palestinian university presidents warned in an open letter this month that the policy is depleting faculties, student bodies and exchange programs. "They are taking away a segment of the population that could help most with state-building."

Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice, in a recent speech to the American Task Force on Palestine, pledged to guarantee that all "American travelers receive fair and equal treatment." The State Department raised the issue with Israel's government earlier this month, and a campaign by Palestinian Americans to reverse the policy has emerged here.

"The policy has not changed in the last years, but rather the implementation has," said Sabin Hadad, a spokeswoman for Israel's Interior Ministry. Hadad said visitors to the territories have always been required to secure a special permit from the civil administration, Israel's military government there. But she acknowledged that "this is a rule we did not follow with precision" until the Justice Ministry ordered them to do so earlier this year. Israeli human rights groups say an estimated 70,000 foreign nationals are awaiting visitor permits, which the military rarely issues.

"I know there have been problems," Hadad said. "Now anyone who arrives at the border without a visitor permit is prevented from entrance. It's not important where you come from."

DOJ_NMG_0085020

Demographics and refugee claims have played a central role in the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and advocates of an independent Palestinian state in the territories watch for any changes in Israel's complex permit and immigration policy. Many of them see this shift as the most significant in years.

Throughout the occupation, Israel has controlled the registry of all Palestinians living in the territories and decided their residency status, even after the 1993 Oslo accords established the semiautonomous Palestinian Authority. Applying for and maintaining Palestinian residency has been a complicated, frequently changing process.

Palestinians counted in Israel's first census after the 1967 war were given residency cards that had to be renewed regularly. Relatives who were abroad at the time were allowed to apply for family unification, a process that gave as many as 50,000 Palestinians residency status in the first years after the war.

The number of those granted residency steadily declined until Israel established a quota system that, by 2000, granted 4,000 family-unification requests a year. When the Palestinian uprising broke out in September 2000, Israel stopped processing the applications, citing security concerns.

Since then, a backlog of 120,000 applications has accumulated, according to the Palestinian Interior Ministry, which passes them on to the Israeli government. But Israeli officials looked the other way when foreign nationals updated their tourist visas every three months with quick trips abroad.

Israeli officials now say the boycott of the Hamas-led government that took office in March makes collaboration on the pending applications impossible.

"This trouble all started after this business with Hamas," Najah Odeh, 75, said from her living room in Ramallah overlooking the Muqata, the Palestinian Authority presidential compound. "Why does everyone have to be punished because of this choice?"

Odeh's daughter, Aidah, was born in Toledo, Ohio, and moved here last year to help her mother recover from back surgery. When she attempted to renew her tourist visa in July, she was turned back at Ben-Gurion Airport, an entry point off-limits to Palestinian residents but not U.S. citizens.

Aidah and her husband spent the next two months in Amman, Jordan, trying to find a way to return. Earlier this month, their attempt to cross at the Allenby Bridge was denied, and the couple moved to Toronto. Her employer, IBM, had a job waiting for her there.

"She didn't do anything wrong," Najah Odeh said. "She's not a politician. She doesn't even like Hamas."

Sam Bahour, a business consultant born in Youngstown, Ohio, lived on his tourist visa for nearly 13 years until Israeli officials wrote "Last Permit" in his U.S. passport in late July. He took his case to the U.S. Consulate in Jerusalem, where he told officials that they were "allowing our strongest ally in the region to discriminate on its borders."

A broad man with a neatly trimmed mustache who calls himself "as American as the president," Bahour arrived here in 1994 to help the fledgling Palestinian Authority privatize the telecommunications system. He has since developed a $10 million shopping mall and opened a thriving business consultancy, gaining an MBA through a joint program run by Tel Aviv University and Northwestern University.

Bahour lives in the adjacent city of El Bireh with his wife, a Palestinian resident, and their two young daughters, who attend the Friends School, where the Australian who teaches seventh grade has been blocked from entering the territories.

A few months after receiving his last permit, Bahour challenged the Israeli decision by trying to cross again. Without explanation, he was given another three-month visa.

The uncertainty, Bahour said, makes it impossible to plan more than a few months ahead and will discourage private investment from Palestinians abroad. He is not sure he or others like him will be able to remain.

"This falls into a much larger scheme of unilateralism by Israel to force not a government collapse but a societal collapse," Bahour said. "We're not looking to end the occupation, we're not looking for the right of return. We are looking to do business here, to be with our families."

Plan For U.S.-style Rule Gains Currency In Israel (LAT)

By Richard Boudreaux

JERUSALEM — Does Israel need a strongman?

Since the summertime war in Lebanon, Israel's leadership has been in turmoil. The government, widely blamed for mismanaging the conflict, is fracturing. Corruption and sex scandals are shaking people's faith in politicians. Israelis tell pollsters the system is broken.

On Sunday, the postwar angst pushed an idea with growing appeal onto the Cabinet's agenda: Israel should scrap its parliamentary system, which tends to produce shaky coalition governments and throw them out with dizzying speed, in favor of American-style presidential rule.

The Cabinet voted 12 to 11 to endorse the proposed overhaul and send it to the Knesset, the parliament.

But passage is far from certain, in part because the sponsor is a right-wing politician with extreme views, growing popularity and leadership ambition. If Avigdor Lieberman were to benefit from his own proposal, his critics say, he might turn Israel's democratic free-for-all into an autocracy.

An immediate consequence of the Cabinet's decision was to bring Lieberman and his Russian-immigrant-based party, Yisrael Beiteinu, or Israel Our Home, a step closer to joining the government. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, elected in March, has been trying since the war ended Aug. 14 to shore up his beleaguered coalition.

One of Lieberman's conditions for joining was Cabinet backing for his bill, regardless of its fate in parliament.

Olmert lobbied hard for approval of the measure despite his misgivings. His centrist Kadima Party faces a possible revolt by its leftist coalition partner, the Labor Party; he needs a new ally to preserve his majority in parliament and avoid new elections that polls show he would lose.

Instability has always been a hallmark of politics in Israel, which theoretically elects its leaders for four years but has changed governments 31 times in its 58-year history.

Voters elect a parliament, and the parliament's 120 members elect the prime minister and Cabinet from among their ranks. Governing coalitions with a parliamentary majority are formed after painstaking negotiations among many parties but fall apart with chronic ease, allowing parliament to force new elections.

Israel's leaders, said Tel Aviv University's Gideon Doron, "have to spend 80% of their time investing in their survival." Those who survive the longest, he said, are those who risk doing the least.

As a result, Doron and other political scientists said, the system discourages decisive government action on a wide range of needs, such as modernizing the school system or the public transport network. In the postwar fallout, Israelis have blamed their leaders for failing over the years to upgrade the military and confront the armed might of the Hezbollah militia in southern Lebanon.

"A prime minister doesn't need an agenda," Olmert told Israeli reporters last month. "He just needs to run the country."

For Lieberman, that is exactly the problem.

Under his bill, the prime minister would be elected directly by voters and name a Cabinet from outside the ranks of parliament, with no need for parliamentary approval. Parliament would also be stripped of its power to call early elections. It could dismiss a prime minister only by a vote of 80 or more members; under that scenario, the deputy prime minister would take over.

The measure would give Israel's leader powers similar to those of the U.S. president, except that he would still be called prime minister. Israel's current presidency, a ceremonial post, would be abolished.

Lieberman's proposal has been around for years but gained currency after his party finished a strong fourth in the March election, taking 11 seats in parliament. A new book by Doron, the Tel Aviv political scientist, advocating a "presidential regime" made a splash in academic circles this summer, boosting the movement. Recent polls show that most Israelis want stronger leadership.

Some critics of the proposal call it a recipe for gridlock between a prime minister and an opposition-controlled parliament. Others reject it as a formula for dictatorship by an unfettered ruler in a country without a constitution or complex system of American-style checks and balances.

"In a country with a weak democratic culture like Israel, the president could govern by coercion and violence, without consent," said Tom Segev, a leading historian. "A presidential system is one of solitary decisions, not one of compromises, and is therefore harmful to minorities and exacerbates disputes and schisms. Everything will be personal."

DOJ_NMG_0085022

Such misgivings are reinforced by Lieberman's extreme nationalist views. A 48-year-old immigrant from Moldova, he proposes redrawing Israel's border in a way that would strip 150,000 Arabs of their Israeli citizenship and transferring the towns they live in to the Palestinian Authority. In return, he would annex the largest Jewish settlements in the West Bank.

Israeli liberals who might otherwise welcome more power for a prime minister say they are alarmed by such a proposal from Lieberman.

Speaking to reporters last week, Lieberman offered a rebuttal: "It is not scary. On the contrary, it is the lack of political stability that is scary.... Political instability in Israel is harming the very ability to make decisions and run things in a reasonable manner."

But his bill is unlikely to pass in its current form. To get the Cabinet's grudging approval Olmert promised that his own party's milder proposal — giving the prime minister less autonomy than Lieberman wants — would be submitted to parliament at the same time. Leaders of several parties said a compromise would be likely.

Khartoum Expels U.N. Envoy Who Has Been Outspoken On Darfur Atrocities (NYT)

By Warren Hoge

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

UNITED NATIONS, Oct. 22 — Sudan's government on Sunday ordered the chief United Nations envoy to leave, saying he was an enemy of the country and its armed forces.

Secretary General Kofi Annan said that he was reviewing the letter from the Khartoum government and had asked the envoy, Jan Pronk, to return to New York for "consultations."

The Sudanese order said Mr. Pronk had to leave by Wednesday. United Nations officials confirmed he would depart before then and said he would need the permission of the Sudanese government to return.

Mr. Pronk, a blunt-spoken former Dutch cabinet minister, has been outspoken in reporting on the killings, rapes and other atrocities in Darfur, the region in the western part of the country where at least 200,000 people have died and 2.5 million have been driven from their homes.

He has become increasingly pointed in his comments about the government, as violence in the region has increased despite a May peace accord between Khartoum and a major rebel group and as the government continues to refuse to allow United Nations peacekeepers into the country. The United Nations force would take over the duties from African Union troops, who have been mostly unable to stop the fighting.

Mr. Pronk is known as a forceful presence at the United Nations from his frequent appearances before the Security Council, where he often delivers unflinching accounts of the continuing mayhem and political breakdown in Sudan in a rhetorical style that includes finger jabbing and dramatic pauses for emphasis.

Sunday's action against him was apparently provoked by an entry he made in his blog (www.janpronk.nl) last weekend that said the armed forces had suffered two major defeats with extensive casualties against rebels in Darfur in the past six weeks. He also reported that generals had been cashiered, morale had sunk and the government had collaborated with the feared janjaweed Arab militias, which are held responsible for pillaging villages and killing and raping their residents.

The Sudanese armed forces on Thursday cited the blog entry in calling Mr. Pronk a threat to national security and asking that he be expelled.

The fact that one of its top officials has put delicate findings in a personal blog has embarrassed the United Nations. When the matter arose Friday, they resisted rebuking Mr. Pronk for the practice for fear that it would appear to be a vote of no confidence in the mission, rather than just a reprimand for his professional lapse.

Questioned Friday over whether the United Nations stood by the statements in Mr. Pronk's blog, Stéphane Dujarric, Mr. Annan's spokesman, said the opinions were Mr. Pronk's "personal views."

Mr. Dujarric indicated that this was not the first time the problem with Mr. Pronk's blog writing had come up. "There have been a number of discussions with Mr. Pronk regarding his blog and the expectation of all staff members to exercise proper judgment in what they write in their blogs," he said.

DOJ_NMG_0085023

The conflict in Darfur began when black African rebels took up arms in early 2003, accusing the government of neglect. Khartoum responded by arming and financing Arab militias who conducted a campaign of violence against civilians that the United Nations has called ethnic cleansing and the Bush administration has called genocide.

In a statement distributed Sunday by the official Sudanese news agency, the country's Foreign Ministry accused Mr. Pronk of demonstrating "enmity to the Sudanese government and the armed forces" and of involvement in activities "that are incompatible with his mission."

The activity in question was apparently a trip that Mr. Pronk made into Darfur to make direct contact with rebels.

In his Oct. 14 blog entry, Mr. Pronk wrote that losses suffered by Sudanese armed forces in two recent battles "seem to have been very high," adding, "Reports speak about hundreds of casualties in each of the two battles with many wounded and many taken prisoner."

"The morale in the government army in North Darfur has gone down," it continued. "Some generals have been sacked; soldiers have refused to fight. The government has responded by directing more troops and equipment from elsewhere to the region and by mobilizing Arab militia."

Victor Tanner, a professor at Johns Hopkins' School of Advanced International Studies who returned from Sudan a week ago, said the blog's references to defeats suffered by the Sudanese Army had caused a furor there.

"Comments on the disarray that seemed to be reigning within the Sudanese armed forces was an amazing thing to see in the blog of a U.N. official," he said. "Refreshing, but wild.

"That the armed forces had suffered these losses was something that everybody was talking about as a rumor swarming around Khartoum and Darfur, but it took on a new reality and became 'the truth' when it was uttered in print by Pronk."

In Washington, the State Department said it was withholding comment until it learned more from Khartoum about the incident.

In London, the Foreign Office also denounced the decision and called for it to be reversed. "This step is counterproductive and will contribute nothing to solving the problems of Sudan," said Lord Triesman, a foreign office minister for Africa.

In what has become a standoff with the United Nations, Sudan has adamantly refused to accept the deployment of 22,000 United Nations soldiers and police officers despite global public outcries over the increasing danger in Darfur.

The force, called for in a Security Council resolution on Aug. 31, would replace the 7,200-member African Union force. In light of Sudan's defiance, the African Union agreed a month ago to strengthen its force and extend its presence in Sudan until Dec. 31.

Omar Hassan al-Bashir, Sudan's president, has characterized the United Nations' plan as an American-inspired plot to recolonize his country and plunder its oil, and he has threatened to attack any United Nations soldiers sent to Darfur.

At the United Nations in September, Mr. Bashir said the reports of deaths and displacements in Darfur were "fictions" spread by international aid groups and Jewish organizations to raise money to benefit themselves.

And commenting on the international campaign that has arisen to try to end the violence in Darfur, he said, "Those who made the publicity, who mobilized the people, invariably are Jewish organizations."

Sudan Orders U.N. Envoy To Leave Country (AP)

By Mohamed Osman, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 23, 2006

The Sudanese government Sunday ordered the chief U.N. envoy out of the country after he wrote that Sudan's army had suffered major losses in recent fighting in Darfur.

Jan Pronk was given 72 hours to leave — an order that is likely to complicate international efforts to halt the killings, rapes and other atrocities in the strife-torn region of western Sudan.

"The presence of the United Nations is vital to hundreds of thousands of citizens of the Darfur region," said a European Union spokesman, Amadeu Altafaj Tardio, in Brussels.

DOJ_NMG_0085024

In a statement distributed by the official Sudan News Agency, the country's Foreign Ministry accused Pronk of demonstrating "enmity to the Sudanese government and the armed forces" and of involvement in unspecified activities "that are incompatible with his mission."

In New York, U.N. spokesman Stephane Dujarric said Secretary-General Kofi Annan had received a letter from the Sudanese government asking that Pronk be removed from the post.

"The secretary-general is studying the letter and has in the meantime requested that Mr. Pronk come to New York for consultations," Dujarric said.

Pronk, a blunt-speaking former Dutch Cabinet minister, drew sharp criticism from the Sudanese armed forces after he wrote this month in his blog, http://www.janpronk.nl, that Sudan's military had suffered heavy losses in recent fighting with rebels in northern Darfur.

"Reports speak about hundreds of casualties in each of the two battles, many wounded soldiers and many taken as prisoner," he said.

The Sudanese armed forces said Thursday that those remarks amounted to "psychological war against the Sudanese army" and declared that Pronk was "persona non-grata."

One day later the military demanded an official apology.

Even before the blog appeared, Sudan's government had been at odds with Pronk over Western efforts to get Sudan to allow a U.N. force of 20,000 troops to take over peacekeeping in Darfur from a 7,000-member African Union force.

Violence has risen dramatically in recent weeks in Darfur, where more than 200,000 people have been killed and 2.5 million displaced in three years of fighting.

U.N. officials have said the African Union force is too small and ill-equipped to cope with the violence and protest civilians from rape, murder and pillage.

But President Omar al-Bashir has rejected a U.N. peacekeeping force, branding it as simply a bid to restore colonial rule.

Despite the move against Pronk, the official news agency said Khartoum was "committed to cooperate" with the U.N. and would work with a new envoy "in accordance with signed treaties with the U.N. and the current principles of international law."

In Geneva, Switzerland, U.N. spokeswoman Marie Heuze noted that Pronk's comments were on his private blog and reflect "only his personal views."

Britain condemned the decision and urged the Sudanese to reconsider.

"This step is counterproductive and will contribute nothing to solving the problems of Sudan," Lord Triesman, the Foreign Office minister for African issues, said in a statement.

Last June, the Sudanese suspended the work of all U.N. missions in the Darfur except UNICEF and the World Food Program after claiming the U.N. had transported a rebel leader in violation of agreements.

The next day, the government reversed the decision following a meeting between a representative of the Sudanese Foreign Ministry and the United Nations.

Darfur, a largely arid plateau in western Sudan about three-quarters the size of Texas, has been in turmoil since February 2003, when ethnic African tribes rebelled after years of neglect by the Arab-dominated government in Khartoum.

The government responded with a military campaign in which pro-government Arab militia, the Janjaweed, are alleged to have committed widespread atrocities. Khartoum denies supporting the Janjaweed.

A peace deal this year was signed by the Sudanese government and the main rebel group, the Sudanese Liberation Movement.

But a breakaway faction and another rebel group rejected the deal and fighting has escalated, causing increasing numbers of aid workers to withdraw, leaving the refugees without food and medicine.

U.S. Sen. Barack Obama, D-Ill., said Sunday that the United States should do more to help stem violence in Darfur.

"When you have situations involving genocide, it is important for us as a world community — and the United States is the world's sole super power — for us to take that seriously, and to make commitments of resources to deal with it," Obama told NBC's "Meet the Press."

Grim New Turn May Harden Darfur Conflict (NYT)

By Lydia Polgreen

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

ON THE CHAD-SUDAN BORDER, Oct. 20 — Haroun Abdullah Kabir stepped from one bloodied corpse to another on the parched, rocky battlefield. He searched the soldiers' decomposing faces for an aquiline nose, fair complexion or fine, straight hair: telltale Arab features.

Instead Mr. Kabir, a field commander of the Darfur rebels fighting the Arab-dominated Sudanese government, found among the Sudanese soldiers his men had felled only the dark-skinned faces of southern Sudanese and Darfurians. He looked away in disgust.

"You see, they send black men to kill black men," he said. "We are waiting for them to send Arabs for a real fight."

This is the new battlefield in Darfur, a blood-soaked land in which at least 200,000 people have died since early 2003, many of hunger and disease, as a result of a campaign of violence the Bush administration and others have called genocide.

For the first time in more than two years, rebels fighting the government for more autonomy are making brazen, direct and successful attacks on soldiers, and are declaring that all previous cease-fires are no longer in effect.

The latest peace agreement, signed in May and heavily backed by the United States but approved by only one rebel faction and the Sudanese government, is in disarray.

The government vows to crush the rebellion, and as its military struggles to fend of attacks, it will likely turn again to Arab militias called janjaweed to wage its counterinsurgency campaign, analysts say.

A visit to the site of the newest fighting, the first by a journalist, revealed a hardening conflict that is increasingly taking place along porous borders among some of the least stable countries in Africa, threatening to ignite a wide conflagration in the heart of the continent.

The Darfur rebels are flush with arms taken from the Sudanese military in raids and bought through allies in Chad and Eritrea. They say that because Sudan has blocked a United Nations force from entering Darfur to protect the 2.5 million people forced from their homes there and in eastern Chad, they have a duty to stop attacks on non-Arab tribes.

"The international community will not do it," said Gen. Khatir Toor Khala, a rebel field commander based on the border. "So it is for us to protect the innocent civilians of Darfur."

With the two sides apparently bent on all-out war, and millions of displaced people and refugees caught in the middle, the people of Darfur and the aid workers who have been trying to help them await the next, seemingly inevitable onslaught.

"We don't know what will happen next, we only fear for our lives," said Kaltuma Ardy, who fled attacks by the janjaweed on her village in Darfur near the Chad border three years ago. She now lives in Oure Cassoni refugee camp, a few miles from the site of the battle between rebels and government soldiers. "We need the U.N. to come and help us so we can have peace and go back home."

The prospect of new talks to settle the crisis has dimmed, and the involvement of Chad and now the Central African Republic, where Sudan reportedly supports rebels hoping to topple Chad's government, is spawning a complex, connected set of conflicts.

Now that the rains have ended, and the rushing seasonal rivers have dried up, clearing the way for the truck-mounted guns that are at the heart of any African ground war, combat has started anew.

The rebel alliance, now known as the National Redemption Front, has inflicted at least two humiliating defeats on the Sudanese Army.

One of those battles took place on Oct. 7 in an army camp 13 miles northeast of Bahai, a sleepy border outpost in Chad that is home to one of the region's largest refugee camps. The camp was strewn with the bodies of dozens of Sudanese soldiers.

Some lay in contorted poses of flight, others were in jumbled heaps in trenches, apparently gunned down in their fighting positions — a still-ticking watch and shattered eyeglasses glinting in the sun. At least one soldier appeared to have been killed while still in bed, sprawled half on, half off a bed in a straw hut, his trousers unbuckled, swollen belly bursting forth. Another seemed to have been caught while playing cards, a jack of spades lay just beyond his extended index finger.

Rebel commanders led a reporter and a photographer to the spot of their triumph clearly wanting to trumpet their victory, but they also seemed disappointed that almost all of the dead soldiers appeared to be non-Arab recruits, mostly southerners and Darfurians. "All of them are Sudanese, they are black people, they are our brothers," Mr. Kabir said. "The government sent them here to kill us, but we pity them. The janjaweed don't like to die and make war with us. They are cowards attacking women and children."

The rebels had picked the camp clean of matériel, carrying off several senior Sudanese field commanders as prisoners, they said, as well as significant caches of heavy weapons, machine guns, fuel tankers and pickup trucks.

At a hide-out a few miles away, soldiers preened with their new weapons: Chinese-made rockets, grenade launchers and antitank guns.

"We took this from Sudan, and we will use it to kill them," boasted Salah Arjah Boush, a rebel fighter, cradling a small gray rocket like a baby in his arms.

Adam Shogar, a spokesman for the National Redemption Front based in Ndjamena, the capital of Chad, said that the new rebel alliance was not bound by any previous cease-fires and was ready to fight if the government refused to open new negotiations. The May agreement was not acceptable, he said.

"It is all-out war," Mr. Shogar said. "There are no agreements."

Exactly what shape the conflict will take is not clear, and the methods the government and rebels choose to attack each other will have grim consequences for the millions of Darfurians pushed from their homes.

The battle in Darfur has long been a proxy, fought with villages and towns as battlefields and civilians as its primary victims. Rebel groups — at least half a dozen factions and splinter groups have surfaced since the conflict began — occupy villages, which the government attacks by air with Antonov bombers and gunships. The rumble of the aircraft gives the fighters plenty of time to escape, but the less-mobile civilians bear the brunt of the aerial attacks.

Because Sudan's large army is mostly made up of non-Arab foot soldiers who are unwilling to carry out brutal counterinsurgency tactics on fellow non-Arabs, the government has used Arab militias as ground troops in Darfur, paying them in cash and loot from the villages they raid. But now the fighting appears to be entering a new phase, in which the rebel groups, somewhat unified militarily under the banner of the National Redemption Front, are making increasingly brazen direct attacks on government troops.

The government is likely to respond to this new boldness with familiar tactics, said Colin Thomas-Jensen, Africa advocacy and research manager at the International Crisis Group, an independent organization that seeks to resolve armed conflict.

"Clearly Khartoum is still intent on pursing a military solution, and just because the latest offensive seems to have hit a roadblock doesn't mean they are going to give up," Mr. Thomas-Jensen said. "The strategy in the past has always been to arm and train and support local militia groups. In all of this the consequences from a humanitarian standpoint are devastating. In Darfur it is ultimately among the civilians that there will be the greatest cost."

So far, in this part of Darfur, the response has been mostly aerial attacks. Bombers have flown incessantly over Bahai and other border towns, dropping bombs on areas suspected of being rebel hide-outs.

The rebellion is bracing for a new onslaught from the government and its allied militias, meeting in Birmaza, a town in North Darfur, to cement their alliance and discuss strategy, said Jar al-Nabi Abdul Karim, a commander of the National Redemption Front, in a satellite telephone interview from there. "We are united, and we are strong," he said. "We are ready to fight."

With the peace agreement signed in May moribund, and with those who declined to sign returning to the battlefield, finding a way out of Darfur's crisis seems harder than ever, Mr. Thomas-Jensen said.

"It is going to be difficult, and is going to require a great deal of diplomacy and pressure," he said. "For the rebels, a lot of cajoling, and for the government, they have got to be under pressure. And you need a strong mediator, someone who can knock heads if necessary. It is not going to be easy, but ultimately there is no way out of this conflict without a renewed political process."

Chavez Claims Victory Of Sorts At U.N. (AP)

By Christopher Toothaker

AP, October 23, 2006

President Hugo Chavez said Sunday that Venezuela achieved its objective at the United Nations by preventing Washington's preferred candidate from winning a seat on the U.N. Security Council.

Venezuela is trailing Guatemala after 35 rounds of secret balloting in which both countries have failed to garner the two-thirds majority required to win the seat.

Despite falling behind Guatemala in the race for contested seat, Caracas has successfully challenged U.S. interests, Chavez said.

"We have taught the empire a lesson," Chavez told thousands of supporters in Valencia, an industrial city about 65 miles west of Caracas. Even if "Venezuela isn't able to enter the Security Council, we've done damage to the empire. That was our objective."

The U.N. General Assembly is slated to resume voting on Wednesday.

Guatemala has led Venezuela in 34 of 35 of the votes by the 192-nation General Assembly. Chavez says his country will not withdraw, vowing to continue confronting the U.S.

"Venezuela is not going to give up," Chavez said.

The nomination of a third candidate to break the stalemate has been informally discussed, but both candidates would have to step down. Guatemala has also pledged to remain in the race.

Chavez — a close ally of Cuban leader Fidel Castro — has promised to use a seat on the council as a platform to speak out against the U.S.

Chavez has claimed that the U.S. has tried to coerce nations into voting for Guatemala.

In recent months, Chavez collected pledges of support as he visited about a dozen countries including Russia, Belarus, Iran, Vietnam, Qatar, Mali, Benin, China, Malaysia and Syria. Top Guatemalan officials and U.S. diplomats also have been busy with their own international lobbying efforts.

Venezuelan opposition leaders accuse Chavez of squandering millions of dollars in an effort to garner international backing for Venezuela's bid, saying he has neglected domestic problems such as rampant crime and widespread poverty.

The critics accuse Chavez of offering cheap, subsidized oil to other countries to influence their U.N. vote, a charge that the Venezuelan leader has denied.

The 10 non-permanent seats on the council are filled by the regional groups for two-year stretches. The other five are occupied by the veto-wielding permanent members: Britain, China, France, Russia and the U.S.

The United States claims that Chavez, whose left-leaning government also has friendly ties with North Korea and Iran, would be a disruptive force on the Security Council.

Panamanians Vote To Expand Canal (NYT)

By Marc Lacey

The New York Times, October 23, 2006

GUATEMALA CITY, Oct. 22 — Panamanians on Sunday overwhelmingly endorsed a plan to modernize the country's aging canal, won over by government arguments that the $5.25 billion project would generate jobs and keep the canal relevant for future generations.

"Panama is betting on its future," said President Martín Torrijos, chief backer of the plan, after casting his ballot on Sunday morning in a nationwide referendum.

The overhaul, to begin next year, will double the canal's capacity by adding a third set of locks that are 40 percent longer and 60 percent wider than the current ones. Constructed by the United States in 1914, the canal these days is congested and too small to handle the world's largest container vessels and tankers.

Opposition to the project was vigorous as skeptics questioned the government's cost estimates and raised fears that corruption would doom the project.

But the government's campaign for the expansion, the largest modernization of the canal in its history, was even more intense. Officials portrayed a "sí" vote as a vote for the children of Panama. Without an expanded canal, officials predicted, shipping traffic would find other routes and Panama's growing economy would dry up.

The canal, 50 miles long, employs 8,000 Panamanians and is a source of national pride, as well as foreign currency. But even as skyscrapers go up at a furious pace in a downtown Panama City that has hints of Miami, 40 percent of the country's three million residents live in poverty.

All the same, preliminary results gave the expansion plan just shy of 80 percent support, far more than the simple majority required. A referendum is required for major changes to the canal, a provision of the law meant to give the people ownership of a resource that had long been in the hands of foreigners. Still, most voters stayed away from the polls Sunday, with turnout estimated at about 40 percent.

The approval is a victory for the Torrijos administration, which staked its reputation on the project. The current president's father, Gen. Omar Torrijos, negotiated in the 1970's for the United States to hand over the canal to the Panamanians. The canal changed hands in 1999.

The government backed off an earlier overhaul plan that would have displaced thousands of Panamanians by expanding the lake used to raise and lower ships as they navigate between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. No residents will be displaced under the current proposal, officials said.

The expansion, which will be financed by loans and higher fees charged to shippers, is scheduled to be completed in 2014. Canal officials predict that a decade afterward the expanded canal will generate $6 billion a year, far more than the $1.4 billion expected this year.

"We've gotten a clear mandate," Jorge Quijano, the Canal Authority's maritime operations director, said in a telephone interview Sunday night. "We now have an opportunity to continue to grow."

Ferdinand de Lesseps, a Frenchman who was the builder of the Suez Canal, began work on the Panama Canal in 1880 but abandoned it after the project went bust. Leaders in Washington, eager to control the Americas, took over the project in 1904 and finished it within a decade. It cost $375 million, making it the most expensive project the government had ever undertaken.

American vessels remain the biggest users of the canal, followed by Chinese and Japanese ships, according to the Panama Canal Authority, the operator. The canal handles about 4 percent of global trade.

The expansion will not rely on the aid of foreign governments, an outgrowth of Panama's desire to go it alone after decades of standing by as the Americans operated the canal. Many foreigners and Panamanians alike doubted that the Panamanian government could handle operation of the canal. But profits have grown over the last seven years, and operations have continued smoothly.

Nicaragua announced last month that it was planning its own canal, although analysts doubt that its $18 billion public-private project, which would use the 60-mile-wide Lake Nicaragua, has much chance of success. Its chances might have improved had the Panama Canal expansion been rejected.

As they lined up around the countryside to weigh in on the canal's fate, most Panamanians seemed to have concluded that their futures and that of the canal were one.

"This country needs this project to join the first world," Joaquín Rodríguez, 48, a businessman wearing a green "yes" T-shirt, told [a news organization].

Faustino Ortega, 41, a mechanic, agreed. "If you've got a business, you've got to do what you can to improve it, make it more competitive," he told The Associated Press. "The canal is big business for all of Panama. Widening it will help the economy."

But concerns about the project remain, even among those who voted for it. "The expansion is necessary, but we all have to watch closely, make sure there isn't embezzlement and corruption," said Igor Meneses, 34, an advertising executive. "With that kind of money, there's a lot to steal."

Voters Approve Panama Canal Expansion (AP)

By Will Weissert, Associated Press Writer

AP, October 23, 2006

Voters overwhelmingly approved the largest modernization plan in the 92-year history of the Panama Canal on Sunday, backing a multi-billion dollar expansion that will allow the world's largest ships to squeeze through the shortcut between the seas.

More than 78 percent of Panamanians voted in favor of the expansion with 94 percent of polling stations counted by the country's electoral tribunal. Only about 22 percent opposed the plan. Almost 57 percent of the country's more than 2.1 million voters did not turn out.

Thousands of supporters in green "Yes" T-shirts cast ballots endorsing the $5.25 billion overhaul which would allow the canal to handle modern container ships, cruise liners and tankers that are too large for its current 108-foot-wide locks. The plan is to build a third set of locks on the Pacific and Atlantic ends by 2015.

The Panama Canal Authority, the autonomous government agency that runs the canal, says the project will double capacity of a waterway already on pace to generate about $1.4 billion this year. Expansion will be paid for by increasing tolls and take in more than $6 billion annually in revenue by 2025.

"We are going to serve the world better and that means we are going to serve Panama better," canal administrator Alberto Aleman Zubieta told The Associated Press. "Everyone's a winner. The shipping industry, the Panamanians and all of the countries that will benefit from international shipping commerce."

A large chunk of canal revenues go to education and other Panamanian social programs. Still, critics contend that as drawn up, the expansion plan benefits the canal's customers more than Panamanians, and worry that costs could balloon for this debt-ridden country.

"Voting 'no' is like closing the door on the canal. It's the top source of income for Panama and improving it means more money for the government and less poverty," said Leonardo Aspira, a boat salesman who sported a "Yes" shirt and baseball hat in Kuna Nega, a largely Indian town of dirt roads and banana trees on the outskirts of Panama City.

The canal employs 8,000 workers and the expansion is expected to generate as many as 40,000 construction jobs. Unemployment in Panama is 9.5 percent, and 40 percent of the country lives in poverty.

Critics contend the expansion will benefit the canal's customers more than Panamanians, and fear it will stoke corruption and uncontrolled debt if costs balloon.

"The expansion is necessary, but we all have to watch closely, make sure there isn't embezzlement and corruption," said Igor Meneses, a 34-year-old advertising executive who was waiting to vote in Panama City. "With that kind of money, there's a lot to steal."

President Martin Torrijos, an outspoken supporter of expansion, called the referendum "probably the most important decision of this generation," after voting.

Opponents of the expansion plan complained about electoral foul play.

On the sweltering streets of Panama City, some wore red shirts and smocks supporting a 'No' vote. But they were far outnumbered by those in shirts, bandanas, caps and vests supporting expansion. Cars and trucks with "Yes" bumper stickers and flags jammed streets.

Former President Guillermo Endara, who dressed in red from head to toe to show his opposition to expansion, complained that polling place workers wore "Yes" clothing and handed out cards with directions on where and how to vote with propaganda supporting the plan printed on the opposite side.

"That's vote-buying," Endara said.

School buses and vans with "yes" signs stuck to the side were also seen whisking voters from poor, crowded neighborhoods to polling places to vote.

But polling place and transportation workers showing which side of the referendum they were on apparently did not constitute a violation of Panama's electoral laws.

The United States arranged for Panamanian independence from Colombia to build the canal, and ran the canal from 1914 to 1999. Torrijos' father, strongman Omar Torrijos, signed a treaty with President Carter in 1977 to cede control of the waterway back to Panama, a decision that also was approved by Panamanians in a referendum.

Panama Canal Widening Wins OK (WT/AP)

PANAMA CITY -- Voters yesterday overwhelmingly approved the largest modernization project in the 92-year history of the Panama Canal, backing a multibillion dollar expansion that will allow the world's largest ships to squeeze through the shortcut between the seas.

About 78 percent of Panamanians voted in favor of expansion, with 90 percent of polling stations counted by the country's electoral tribunal. Only about 22 percent opposed the plan. Almost 57 percent of the country's more than 2.1 million voters did not turn out.

Panamanian President Martin Torrijos, an outspoken supporter of expansion, said after voting that the referendum was "probably the most important decision of this generation."

International observers had predicted a low turnout among the country's voters, and opponents of the expansion plan complained about electoral foul play.

On the sweltering streets of Panama City, some wore red shirts and smocks supporting a 'No' vote. But they were far outnumbered by those in shirts, bandanas, caps and vests supporting expansion. Cars and trucks with "Yes" bumper stickers and flags jammed streets.

Former Panamanian President Guillermo Endara, who dressed in red from head to toe against the expansion, complained that polling-place workers wore "Yes" clothing and handed out cards with directions on where and how to vote with propaganda supporting the plan printed on the opposite side.

Canal administrator Alberto Aleman Zubieta said a defeat for the plan could have grave consequences for Panama. "Shippers will have to look for other routes, because Panama won't have the capacity for them," he said.

Panamanian Voters Approve Canal Expansion (LAT)

By Chris Kraul

The Los Angeles Times, October 23, 2006

PANAMA CITY, Panama — Panamanian voters on Sunday overwhelmingly approved a $5.2-billion proposal to expand the country's national treasure, the Panama Canal.

With 64 percent of votes counted, ballots in favor of the project led those opposed by 78.7 percent to 21.3 percent, prompting Panama's electoral tribunal to declare the yes vote victorious. That gave the green light to the first major modification to the 50-mile waterway since it opened in 1914.

President Martin Torrijos staked his considerable popularity on voters approving the proposal, which he described in a recent interview as the "chance of a lifetime" for Panama. In a telephoned response to the tribune's declaration Sunday evening broadcast over Panamanian television, Torrijos declared the vote a victory for Panamanian democracy and the nation's future.

Little construction is planned over the next several months, as the Panama Canal Authority, the quasi-independent administrative body, prepares an environmental impact report and final construction blueprints. But the project ultimately is expected to take eight years and create 7,000 jobs, with employment for thousands more people tied indirectly to the proposal.

By late next year, excavation will begin on the expansion's single largest component: a four-mile bypass of the southernmost locks of the canal to permit the passage of container ships capable of carrying 8,000 shipboard containers, or twice the cargo that fits through the existing waterway. On the Caribbean side, the new shipping lane will occupy a partially completed trench excavated from 1939 to 1942.

Later, two sets of parallel locks half again wider and longer than the existing sets will be built.

"Panamanians have taken a courageous vote, and the canal authority will use all its resources to meet their expectations," Ricaurte Vasquez, the canal authority's board chairman, said in an interview Sunday.

Torrijos' government has promised voters that the expanded canal and the added ship traffic would make Panama the "Singapore of South America."

Panamanian and international investors expect the project to stimulate economic growth. The vote is expected to touch off several private and public construction projects that have been in abeyance until the balloting.

Dozens of high-rise office and residential towers are planned for the capital, including three structures over 80 stories tall. The canal's sixth container port, west of the Pacific entrance, is also expected to go forward, at an estimated cost of $600 million.

The government is expected to ask Panama's congress to approve hundreds of millions of dollars to build a new sewage system to clean up highly polluted Panama Bay, which fronts the capital. The money also would fund a four-lane highway to connect Panama City, on the Pacific, with the city of Colon on the Caribbean side.

Fill dirt from the bypass excavation would be used to build a highway called the Coastal Strip, across Panama Bay.

But some analysts worry that expectations about the project's positive impact are unrealistically high, with too many Panamanians viewing the canal expansion as a cure-all for a country where an estimated 40 percent of the population is living below the poverty line.

The government faces daunting social problems, including unemployment, substandard education and a troubled health care system.

"The expansion will raise the stakes for Panama's democracy, because in a few years when the project is finished it will be unacceptable to say that the Panamanian state does not have the resources to improve the conditions of the people," said Jorge Giannareas, professor of constitutional law and consultant to UNICEF in Panama.

Interviews Sunday morning with a dozen voters at polling places around Panama City -- from upscale private schools to the poor barrio called Chorrillo -- reflected strong support and optimism for the measure.

"I voted `yes' for my grandchild. She will be one to fill the professional jobs that the expansion creates, not me," retired government worker Rosa Garcia said in Chorrillo. "I voted for globalization, for progress."

Said golf caddy Juan Renteria as he voted in the blue-collar Caledonia section of the capital: "This will help the poor of Panama, the peasants who come to the city and find no work. Panama has to do something for them,"

Although he thinks the canal should be expanded, accountant Samuel Godoy said he voted `no' because he had little confidence in the government's ability to manage the project honestly and efficiently.

"The leaders are just loading the nation with debt," he said. "All this propaganda of creating more jobs I don't believe."

Muslim Veils Prompt Bans Across Europe (WT)

By Elizabeth Bryant

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

PARIS -- When Nora Labrak arrived at a private employment agency in the summer near the French city of Lyon, the first question she was posed was not about her resume.

"I was asked to remove my head scarf at the lobby," Miss Labrak recalled in a telephone interview. When the 29-year-old refused, she was hustled to the door.

Long and short, sober black and brightly hued, the Muslim veil is drawing growing criticism in much of Europe. It has been chased from public schools in France and Belgium, and its strictest, face-concealing variation, the niqab, has been outlawed in a smattering of European towns.

Even in multicultural Britain, the niqab has sparked ferocious debate after the suspension of a Muslim teaching assistant and remarks by top government officials that the niqab encourages an unsettling social rift.

That debate began politely but has since grown ugly and rancorous, the chairman of Britain's Commission for Racial Equality said yesterday.

"We need to have this conversation, but there are rules by which we have the conversation which don't involve this kind of targeting and, frankly, bullying," said Trevor Phillips in a British Broadcasting Corp. interview.

Feeding the controversy are a series of incidents pitting Europe's Muslim population against its Christian majorities: Last year's riots in France, the Danish cartoons of the prophet Muhammad, the slaying of Dutch filmmaker Theo Van Gogh, honor killings in Germany, terrorist attacks in Britain and Spain, and Europe-wide concerns about illegal immigration.

"There's a rise in Islamo-skepticism," said Franck Fregosi, a specialist on Islam at France's National Center of Scientific Research. "There's a fear and tension that's installed in certain parts of the population, and I don't think it bodes well for the future."

In Brussels, 41-year-old Nicole Thill shares that foreboding.

"I haven't had problems until now, but things are changing," said Mrs. Thill, who converted to Islam and adopted the veil in 2001. "People's looks are increasingly hostile. And there's less and less respect. People don't mind jostling you on the street because, after all, you're only a veiled woman."

A July survey by the Pew Research Center found most European Muslims did not sense hostility from non-Muslims. But a significant chunk -- including 39 percent in France, 42 percent in Britain and 51 percent in Germany -- reported otherwise.

Perhaps more than any other symbol, the veil sets Muslims apart. Worn by a minority of Muslim women in Europe, it is an easy target for stereotypes.

In interviews with a halfdozen veiled women in Europe, all said they braced themselves going out in public. Several cited the veil as a barrier to employment.

"I have some friends who agreed to take their head scarves off or to wear a bandana to get a job, but not by choice," said Miss Labrak. She has filed charges against the job agency that expelled her from its premises, and is awaiting a court ruling.

European politicians critical of the veil cite the importance of integrating ethnic African, Arab and Turkish immigrant populations. That was the message behind French legislation two years ago banning the head scarf and other religious symbols in public schools.

And it was one reason why Jan Creemers, mayor of the city of Maaseik in Belgium, outlawed wearing the face-concealing niqab in public earlier this year. Several Belgian towns have followed suit, while a number of Belgium public schools have banned students from wearing any kind of veil to class.

"We have many old people, and they were very afraid when they saw these women wearing the veil," said Mr. Creemers. "It's very important in our town and in our Western culture that people see each other face to face."

Public wearing of the niqab is similarly banned in Italy under anti-terrorist laws, which make it an offense to hide the face in public. In Germany, four states have outlawed public school teachers from wearing head scarves -- a ban that applies to all civil servants in the German state of Hesse.

Women employed in the public sector in France also are barred from wearing veils at work. The legislation has drawn widespread support, including from many Muslims.

"If you're in Europe, you need to live according to European customs. Either you adapt or, if you want to wear Middle Eastern clothing, you leave," said Khadija Khali, head of a French Muslim women's group. A practicing Muslim who has gone to Mecca five times, Mrs. Khali does not wear a veil.

TERRORISM NEWS:

Radical Islam Finds US 'Sterile Ground' (CSM)

By Alexandra Marks

The Christian Science Monitor, October 23, 2006

NEW YORK

The Islamist radicalism that inspired young Muslims to attack their own countries - in London, Madrid, and Bali - has not yielded similar incidents in the United States, at least so far.

"Home-grown" terror cells remain a concern of US law officers, who cite several disrupted plots since 9/11. But the suspects' unsophisticated planning and tiny numbers have led some security analysts to conclude that America, for all its imperfections, is not fertile ground for producing jihadist terrorists.

To understand why, experts point to people like Omar Jaber, an AmeriCorps volunteer; Tarek Radwan, a human rights advocate; and Hala Kotb, a consultant on Middle East affairs. They are the face of young Muslim-Americans today - educated, motivated, and integrated into society - and their voices help explain how the nation's history of inclusion has helped to defuse sparks of Islamist extremism.

"American society is more into the whole assimilation aspect of it," says New York-born Mr. Jaber. "In America, it's a lot easier to practice our religion without complications."

In a nation where mosques have sprung up alongside churches and synagogues, where Muslim women are free to wear the hijab (or not), and where education and job opportunities range from decent to good, the resentments that can breed extremism do not seem very evident in the Muslim community. Since 9/11, however, concern is rising among Muslim-Americans that they are becoming targets of bias and suspicion - by law enforcement as well as fellow citizens. It's a disquieting trend, say the young Muslims - one that might eventually help radicalism to grow.

It's impossible to pinpoint the factors that produce home-grown terrorists, analysts say. But it's also impossible to ignore the stark contrast between the lives of Muslims in European countries where bombings have occurred and those of Muslims in America.

"What we have here among Muslim-Americans is a very conservative success ethic," says John Zogby, president of Zogby International in Utica, N.Y., whose polling firm has surveyed the Muslim-American community. "People come to this country and they like it. They don't view it as the belly of the beast. With very few exceptions, you don't see the bitter enclaves that you have in Europe." Life in America vs. life in Europe

Part of what so shocked Spain about the Madrid train bombers, and then Britain after the London subway and bus bombings in July 2005, was that most of the perpetrators were native sons. In each case, the young men, allegedly inspired by Al Qaeda ideology, came from poorer neighborhoods heavy on immigrants. (By contrast, a plot foiled in August to blow up airplanes over the Atlantic involved suspects from leafy, middle- and upper-middle-class neighborhoods in Britain.)

America, too, has poorer neighborhoods with large Muslim concentrations, but they tend to be interspersed with other ethnic groups and better assimilated into society. Another difference, some suggest, is the general profile of Muslims who have come to the US and raised their families here.

Most Muslim immigrants came to America for educational or business opportunities and from educated, middle-class families in their home countries, according to an analysis by Peter Skerry of Boston College and the Brookings Institution. In Europe, the majority came to work in factory jobs and often from poorer areas at home.

European Muslims today live primarily in isolated, low-income enclaves where opportunities for good jobs and a good education are limited. In the US, 95 percent of Muslim-Americans are high school graduates, according to "Muslims in the Public Square," a Zogby International survey in 2004. Almost 60 percent are college graduates, and Muslims are thriving economically around the country. Sixty-nine percent of adults make more than $35,000 a year, and one-third earn more than $75,000, the survey showed.

In Britain, by contrast, two-thirds of Muslims live in low-income households, according to British census data. Three-quarters of those households are overcrowded. British Muslims' jobless rate is 15 percent - three times higher than in the general population. For young Muslims between 16 and 24, the jobless rate is higher: 17.5 percent.

"The culture is qualitatively different [in the American Muslim community] from what we've seen from public information from Europe, and that actually says very positive things about our society," says Jonathan Winer, a terrorism expert in Washington. "We don't have large populations of immigrants with a generation sitting around semi-employed and deeply frustrated. That's a gigantic difference."

Jaber, the AmeriCorps volunteer, who is studying to become a medical doctor, says he has not experienced anti-Muslim bias. In part, he says, that may be because he doesn't have an accent or look particularly Middle Eastern - his father is Palestinian and his mother Filipino. But he also credits America's melting-pot mentality, as does Ms. Kotb, the Middle East consultant.

"We weren't isolated growing up. We were part of the culture," says Kotb, who grew up outside Washington in a family that inculcated a success ethic. "Religion was important, but not so much that you'd have to cover your head or if you don't pray five times a day, that's it - nothing like that. There were a lot more progressive attitudes" within her local Muslim community.

In mosques in America, it's fairly common for imams to preach assimilation, says Mr. Zogby. That's not as true in Europe, particularly in poorer neighborhoods where sermons can be laced with extremism.

"The success of ... Saudi-inspired religious zealotry in Europe was in large part because the Saudis put up the money to build mosques and pay for imams," says Ian Cuthbertson, a counterterrorism expert at the World Policy Institute at the New School for Social Research. "The American Muslim community was rich enough not to require Saudi money to build its mosques."

In Europe, it's estimated that millions of second- and third-generation Muslims have not been well assimilated in their adopted countries, so have little or no fealty to either the European country they live in or the one their parents were born in. "They are much more susceptible to the Internet, returning jihadist fighters, and extremist imams," says Thomas Sanderson of the Center for Strategic and International Studies in Washington. "There's no doubt that Europe has an incubator environment and we have a somewhat sterile environment for radicalism."

To be sure, the United States has brought charges in several terrorism-related cases involving American Muslims. Some have resulted in convictions, notably the 2002 case of six Yemeni-Americans from Lackawanna, N.Y. Other cases are pending. (See chart on Page 2.)

Identifying and tracking home-grown terrorists is a complicated task - one that risks alienating or even infuriating the general Muslim-American citizenry if tactics are seen as unfair. Feeling a chill

The young Muslims interviewed for this story chose their words carefully, but their inference is clear: They worry that suspicion toward Muslims has been building since 9/11, and they suggest that US intervention in Iraq and its support for Israel cause angst among many Arab-Americans.

US foreign policies "in the long term are going to hurt the US," says Mr. Radwan, the human rights activist, who works in Washington. "They, along with the crackdown on Muslim-Americans [by law enforcement], feed a feeling of resentment and the perception that the US acts on the basis of a double standard."

Indeed, America's Muslim community would wage the war on terror differently. According to the 2004 Zogby survey, three-quarters say the best way is for the US to change its foreign policy in the Middle East by recognizing a Palestinian state and being less supportive of Israel.

A newer concern for America's Muslims is their standing in post-9/11 society. Many sense that the ground under their feet is shifting - and young people like Florida-born Radwan, in particular, feel it. A 2001 graduate of Texas A&M University, Radwan wanted to become a doctor and began working as a medical researcher. One month after the 9/11 attacks, he was let go - at the end of a three-month probationary period. Afterward, he says, he couldn't get even an interview for a job that used his biochemistry degree or research skills. Eventually he abandoned his hopes of a medical career and shifted to human rights work.

That experience leads him to suggest another reason the US hasn't seen European-style homegrown terror cells: the intense scrutiny the FBI has focused on Muslim-Americans. "That is good in the short term, but bad in the long term," he says. "The Bush administration policies feed resentment that ... will stay in the Arab- American psyche for a long time."

The FBI says it doesn't target any community, neighborhood, or religion. Agents simply go where the leads take them, says John Miller, the FBI's assistant director of public affairs. But he adds: "We have put a growing effort into community outreach because we understand the discomfort the amount of pressure our attention can bring to a community." The 'home-grown' threat: Is it overstated?

A small but growing number of analysts believe that some US officials have overstated the threat of homegrown Islamist radicalism in the United States. While Al Qaeda and foreign terrorists remain determined to attack in America, they say, the focus on potential American cells may be leading the US to misdirect its antiterror efforts.

"My theory as to why we haven't found any [homegrown Islamist terrorist cells] is because there aren't very many of them.... They aren't the diabolical, capable, and inventive people envisioned by most politicians and people in the terrorism industry," says John Mueller, a political scientist at Ohio State University. "The danger is that we've wasted an enormous amount of money with all of the wiretaps [and] investigations, and diverted two-thirds of the FBI from criminal work to terrorism work."

DOJ_NMG_0085038

The FBI calls such conclusions "uninformed," citing alleged plots by radicalized US citizens. The most notable was the case of the Lackawanna Six, so named for the six Yemeni-Americans from Lackawanna, N.Y., who went to Al Qaeda training camps in the spring of 2001.

"The people who make these claims [about threats being exaggerated] are never the ones responsible for preventing these attacks," says John Miller, the FBI's assistant director of public affairs. "The point is that if you're the dead guy, or you're a family member of one of those guys, all you know is that you wanted someone to develop the intelligence and take the actions to prevent it."

Still, a lack of public evidence pointing to extensive Islamist extremism in the US is leading a small but growing number of experts to agree with Professor Meuller's assessment. Like Meuller, though, they add a cautionary note.

"There's not zero threat in any community, but it is good news and we have to hope that reflects an underlying reality that [homegrown extremist cells] don't exist here," says Jonathan Winer, a terrorism expert in Washington. "You've always got lone nuts in every imaginable ethnic group grabbing every imaginable ideology to justify terrorism."

Singing For Your Sleep (NSWK)

By Dan Ephron

Newsweek, October 23, 2006

Sgt. Ben Allbright knows something about sleep deprivation. During the first six months of the Iraq war, his job was to guard prisoners in Al Qaim, a makeshift base near the Syrian border where U.S. troops conducted aggressive hunts for Saddam Hussein's weapons of mass destruction. Every day, soldiers hauled in about 20 new detainees for questioning by military interrogators or CIA operatives. To "get them out of their comfort zone" before the interrogation, Allbright told NEWSWEEK recently, the drill was to keep the Iraqis awake for 24 hours or longer. The guards would stand the prisoners up in old shipping containers, their hands tied behind their backs and their faces blindfolded and facing the wall. "After a while you'd see their knees buckling, or you'd see one of them lean forward and put his forehead against the wall to try to sleep." When that happened, Allbright would holler into the container or bang on the metal side with a stone or a club.

Is that inhumane? Is it legal? President George W. Bush signed the Military Commissions Act into law last week, laying down guidelines for Guantánamo prisoner tribunals and addressing the issue of interrogation tactics. Before the law was passed, the president had stressed the need to give CIA interrogators clear guidelines for questioning suspects. Most legal experts believe the new law criminalizes the harshest techniques used by the CIA since the attacks of September 11, including the mock drowning measure known as waterboarding. But the bill also creates a broad gray area in which some of the less dramatic methods—sleep deprivation, along with forced standing, hooding and stress positions—might still be part of the interrogation package. Neither the Pentagon nor the CIA would comment on their techniques, but the wiggle room bothers critics. "It seems pretty clear that they want to keep a gray area so that tactics can continue to be used that fall into that area," says Lt. Cmdr. Charles Swift, a prominent military defense lawyer.

Many experts question whether such methods are even effective. Sleep deprivation in particular has been used as an interrogation tool in different places around the globe throughout the past century, with questionable results. In America's Prohibition era, cops in the Chicago Police Department were known to sleep-deprive suspected criminals to extract confessions, many of which turned out to be false. In Northern Ireland, British troops used it in crackdowns on the IRA until a European court ruled in a minority opinion that it constitutes torture. When the CIA studied the utility of various interrogation methods in a broad 1960s survey known as Kubark, the agency concluded sleep deprivation made suspects more apathetic under questioning, not necessarily more compliant. Yet by 2001, the measure was being used on Afghan guerrillas in secret CIA detention centers, according to the testimony of both prisoners and soldiers.

Part of the problem is that sleeplessness inhibits clear thinking and can trigger hallucinations. "It's a little like getting drunk," says Mark Mahowald, a neurologist who heads the Minnesota Regional Sleep Disorder Center. While little is known about why humans need sleep, Mahowald says, the effects of deprivation have been widely studied. Within 24 hours, parts of the brain that control higher-level tasks—judgment, reasoning, self-monitoring—become impaired. Beyond a day, the subject actually slips into a state of semiconsciousness—something akin to a sleepwalker who can perform physical activities but has limited cognitive power. "Those kinds of changes might help an interrogator get someone to talk," Mahowald said. "But the things he says should not be counted on as reliable." What happens when sleep is deprived for longer stretches? Researchers have never subjected humans to more than a few days of sleeplessness. But when the University of Chicago deprived rats of sleep in a seminal study in the 1990s, the rodents survived three weeks without a wink, then died.

In CIA prisons, the record for sleep deprivation is shorter—but apparently not by much. Human Rights Watch, which interviewed the lawyers of 20 detainees held in a secret prison in Afghanistan as late as 2004, says some of them were sleep-deprived for up to two weeks, though sometimes allowed short naps. The facility, known among detainees as "the dark prison," was among the harshest run by the United States since the start of the war on terror.

Not everyone dismisses the effectiveness of sleep deprivation. The Israelis think it can help to pry valuable information from reluctant captives. Though Israel's Supreme Court banned torture in a 1999 ruling, interrogators regularly use sleep deprivation against Palestinians. Avi Dichter, Israel's minister of Public Security and the former head of Shabak, Israel's FBI, defends the technique: "When you're tired, is it easier to question you? I think yes. And I think we're all built the same, including terrorists."

Allbright, the sergeant who served in Afghanistan, has doubts. By the time questioning of sleep-deprived prisoners began, he recalls, they were so desperate to nod off they'd provide whatever answers the interrogators wanted to hear. Confessions included details about WMD that didn't exist. Allbright, a reservist who now studies law at the University of Arkansas, Little Rock, also believes sleep deprivation leads to a slippery slope. In sessions he says he witnessed, when interrogators couldn't wrench information from tired suspects, they'd resort to threats and in some cases to physical abuse. Allbright had read the Geneva accords on his breaks from guard duty, and complained to superiors about the breach of conduct. "They'd either laugh it off or they'd tell me it's above my pay grade," he says. (The Pentagon had no comment on Allbright's allegations.) Eventually, he was transferred to another base and given a different job. That was in late 2003, when the war in Iraq was still fresh and the procedures often vague. With a new law now in place, only some of them are clearer.

WAR NEWS:

Lawmakers To Bush: Push Iraq On Militias (AP-Y)

By Deb Riechmann

AP, October 23, 2006

Republicans and Democrats urged the White House on Sunday to increase the pressure on Iraq's prime minister to crush militias blamed for the rising bloodshed.

President Bush expressed unwavering confidence in Nouri al-Maliki's ability to come to grips with the sectarian violence. Yet continued instability and rising casualties have led to calls, growing louder as the Nov. 7 elections near, for Bush to overhaul his war plan.

"I don't believe that a shift in tactics ought to wait until after the election," said Sen. Arlen Specter, R-Pa., the chairman of the Senate Judiciary Committee. "There are too many casualties there. If we have a better course, we ought to adopt it sooner rather than later."

Two U.S. troops were killed in fighting, the military said Sunday, raising the death toll in October to 80, the highest of any month this year. The overall U.S. death toll has surpassed 2,780

Sen. Jack Reed, a member of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the Bush administration's Iraq policy was failure. "What we have is a situation where this government over the last few months is deteriorating," said Reed, D-R.I.

While agreeing al-Maliki is the best leader to support in Iraq right now, lawmakers from both parties said he must do more to find a political solution between warring Shiite and Sunni sects, or peace will remain out of reach.

Bush said in his judgment, "Maliki has got what it takes to lead a unity government." But the president noted the urgency the new government faces to stop the killing. "I'm patient. I'm not patient forever, and I'm not patient with dawdling," Bush said. "But I recognize the degree of difficulty of the task, and therefore, say to the American people, we won't cut and run."

He added it would be a sign of surrender "if you pull the troops out before the job is done. Absolutely."

Sen. John Kerry, Bush's opponent in the 2004 presidential race, said a political rather than military solution is needed.

"Either they resolve the political differences within this year because they want to or they don't want to. If they don't want to, there's nothing American troops can do," said Kerry, D-Mass.

Sen. John Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, said setting a withdrawal timetable could leave a security vacuum that terrorists would fill. But Warner, R-Va., has said a change in course may be necessary if the security situation does not improve soon.

He urged the Iraqi prime minister to give the Iraqi army more authority to improve security. "It is their job, not the U.S. coalition forces' to subdue and get rid of these private militias," Warner said.

Sen. Carl Levin of Michigan, the leading Democrat on the Senate Armed Services Committee, said the administration must pressure the Iraqis to make political compromises on power and oil resources.

"If they don't want to do that, if they're going to have a civil war, we have to tell them, `You're going to do that without us,'" said Levin, who wants to see U.S. troops begin to leave Iraq by the end of the year.

The White House took issue with a report in Sunday's New York Times that said the head of the U.S.-led Multinational Forces in Iraq and the U.S. ambassador to Iraq were working on a plan that probably would — for the first time — outline milestones for disarming sectarian militias and meeting other political and economic goals. The newspaper said the blueprint to be presented to al-Maliki by the end of this year would not threaten Iraq with a withdrawal of U.S. troops.

The White House said the article was not accurate. It said the administration was constantly developing new tactics to help the new Iraqi government sustain, defend and govern itself.

Defense Secretary Donald H. Rumsfeld said Friday that U.S. officials are working with the Iraqi government to develop projections as to when they can take over various areas of responsibility so the Iraqis do not grow dependent on U.S. troops.

Democrats say it's past time for a change. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., said the administration was hinting at doing so because Democrats were threatening to capture control of Congress in the upcoming election.

"Let's hope that at long last we'll have a true change of policy by the administration and not just a political feint to get by in a tight election," Kennedy said.

To Kerry, a decorated Vietnam veteran, "It's immoral to have the lives of young Americans being put on the line, waiting for an election day event or strategy. If you've got a better strategy, Mr. President, we deserve to have it now."

Bush and Kerry appeared on ABC's "This Week." Reed and Specter were on CNN's "Late Edition," while Warner and Levin spoke on "Fox News Sunday."

Troops To Remain In Iraq, Bush Says (WT)

By Eric Pfeiffer

The Washington Times, October 23, 2006

President Bush implicitly acknowledged yesterday that the war in Iraq will continue for several years, saying he could not see any way that U.S. forces could be withdrawn from the country while he is president.

In a taped interview with ABC's "This Week," moderator George Stephanopoulos asked Mr. Bush, "Can you imagine any circumstances where U.S. troops are going to leave Iraq before you leave the presidency?"

"No. I cannot," Mr. Bush said. "You mean every single troop out? No."

The president's interview aired in the wake of widespread reports last week, based on leaks from a U.S. task force headed by former Secretary of State James A. Baker III, that the Bush administration is preparing for a "course correction" in Iraq in the coming months, with some of the options being the partition of Iraq and a military coup against Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki.

Administration spokesmen already had played down those reports, but Mr. Bush yesterday noted that Mr. al-Maliki has only been in office four months and expressed his support, while noting that it wouldn't last forever.

"I'm patient. I'm not patient forever. And I'm not patient with dawdling. But I recognize the degree of difficulty of the task, and therefore say to the American people: We won't cut and run."

In an appearance yesterday on "Fox News Sunday," Sen. John W. Warner, Virginia Republican, said the Iraqi military needed to crack down harder on the private militias that have fought a low-grade civil war, with daily body counts in the dozens. Yesterday, the militias killed more than 40 Iraqis, with the bloodiest attacks coming against police recruits and holiday shoppers. The U.S. military also announced the deaths of a Marine and two soldiers, raising the October death toll to 81.

"It is their job, not the U.S. coalition forces' to subdue and get rid of these private militias," said Mr. Warner, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, adding that a change in course may be necessary if the security situation does not improve soon and that "I think the administration is constantly revising and looking forward."

For his part, Sen. Richard G. Lugar, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, told Fox News that criticism of Mr. al-Maliki is not the solution.

"We're talking about putting pressure on Maliki, but he doesn't have much clout," the Indiana Republican said. "Now, we probably need to think through how we, the United States, can give this prime minister more clout."

However, in his own "Fox News Sunday" appearance, Sen. Joseph R. Biden Jr., Delaware Democrat, said a more drastic approach is necessary.

"The truth of the matter is, there's a need for radical change in policy. There's a need for a political solution in Iraq and a bipartisan solution here at home," the ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee said. "Without those two things happening, there is no possibility, in my view, we succeed in Iraq."

Mr. Bush rejected the notion that he has been unwilling to adjust U.S. strategy in Iraq.

"Well, listen, we've never been 'Stay the course.' We have been -- 'We will complete the mission, we will do our job and help achieve the goal.' But we're constantly adjusting the tactics, constantly."

DOJ_NMG_0085041

In recent campaign appearances, Mr. Bush has described the Democrats as wanting to "wave the white flag of surrender" in the war on terror. When asked whether he could name any Democrats who have uttered such a phrase, Mr. Bush referenced Sen. John Kerry, Massachusetts Democrat, his opponent in the 2004 presidential election.

"I can name a Democrat who said there ought to be a date certain from which to withdraw from Iraq, whether or not we've achieved a victory or not," Mr. Bush said.

"That's reprehensible. It's a lie," Mr. Kerry said during his own appearance on "This Week," when asked about Mr. Bush's surrender comments. "The administration has lied in the walkup to the war. They've lied in the conduct of the war. And they have made America less safe. And the president just misled America again in that interview."

When asked whether Iraqi insurgents are trying to affect the midterm elections, Mr. Bush said, "My gut tells me that they have all along been trying to inflict enough damage that we'd leave. And the leaders of al Qaeda have made that very clear. ... They believe that if they can create enough chaos, the American people will grow sick and tired of the Iraqi effort and will cause [the U.S.] government to withdraw."

Deepening Disarray Over US Policy In Iraq (FT)

By Guy Dinmore

Financial Times, October 23, 2006

Leading Republicans and the Bush administration on Sunday projected a deepening sense of disarray over Iraq, as they argued with each other over the current state of affairs and the way forward.

Several senators took issue with the administration's policies in Iraq, distancing themselves from the White House in the run-up to next month's mid-term elections to Congress.

Spokesmen scrambled to deny media reports that ran contrary to the official line.

Senator John Warner, chairman of the armed services committee, who had described Iraq as "slipping sideways", on Fox News declared the situation to be worsening as Shia turned on Shia, Sunni on Sunni and al-Qaeda moved into the western Anbar province.

Mr Warner congratulated US military commanders for acknowledging that the Baghdad security plan was not working. But he did stand by the administration in rejecting calls for a timetable of withdrawal.

Senator Arlen Specter, head of the judiciary committee, said a New York Times report on Sunday – denied by the White House – had all the hallmarks of accuracy. According to the report, the administration is preparing a timetable for the Iraqi government to address sectarian divisions and take on a larger security role.

Mr Specter said that was the right approach and the government of Nouri al-Maliki had to be told the US would not be there for ever.

"We have to face the facts," he said, declaring Iraq to be in a civil war, at odds with official pronouncements.

Senator Richard Lugar, who chairs the foreign affairs committee, said Mr Maliki lacked "clout" but was "probably the best horse to ride on in the situation".

A Nadir Of U.S. Power (WP)

By Sebastian Mallaby

The Washington Post, October 23, 2006

It's not exactly morning in America.

In Iraq, things get ever uglier, and the old remedy of extra troops now seems tragically futile. The Bush team has recently tried putting thousands of additional soldiers into Baghdad, and the result after two months is that violence there has increased.
